Alabama wished to see "marching across the Atlantic" to take the place of our seven million deported Africans. We think too kindly of the Armenians to wish to see them engaged in any such perilous adventure. Pharaoh's trouble with the Red Sea should have been a warning to Senator Morton in this matter.

Rev. Stephen H. Camp of Brooklyn writes for the American Hebrew "A Christian View of the Jubilee" of the Temple of Emanu-El referred to in our "Editorial Notes." Mr. Camp says: "He cannot be fairly reckoned an outsider whose inward life has been so much refreshed as mine has in that sacred home of prayer. And I make no mistake in saying that it is not my testimony alone. I have always been greatly impressed with the large, fine hospitality of the Temple Emanu-El. Its recognition of the vital questions of the time; its readiness to take up all living problems whose study has to do with the real issues of life; its wise, reverent care of the young; its desire and purpose to promote a wholesome regard for spiritual claims; its tender thought for the aged,—nay, in all possible ways it has proved its right to bear the sacred and greatly cherished name. It has, indeed, been also a very Bethel to the hearts ministered unto there, and these not all born in the sacred faith of Israel."

A LETTER FROM DR. MARTINEAU.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The following letter from Mr. Martineau on the occasion of Mr. May's recent birthday is so beautiful and fitting that it well deserves a place amid the other memorials of his wonderfully vigorous and sunny old age.

NATHANIEL SEAVER, JR.

Dear Mr. May,—Old age, like yours and mine, no doubt bedims the foreground of the present; but, with a wonderful inversion of perspective, it brings into startling light the figures of the far-off past. No sooner was I told of your completing this day a term of years within five of my own than the manly and godly young Samuel May who first delighted my heart, I know not how long ago, stood before me, as if I could speak to him and clasp his hand. The fewer we lingering veterans become, the more closely, it seems to me, are we drawn together in thought and affection, the nearness of our time-experience availing more to unite us than the distance of lands to separate. I live in thought more with such contemporaries as you and Furness and Parker and Farley and Dewey and Hedge than with recent pupils of my own (much as I love them and expect from them) who have yet their crowns to win.

But, without prosing on the compensations of declining years, let me join in the chorus of reverence and congratulation which this day will bring you, and assure you that no one can have followed your course of noble conviction through trying times with love and honor more genuine than mine for the blended enthusiasm and graciousness which have left on it the indelible Christian stamp.

Accept the fraternal benediction of one who, a little in advance of you, waits with like trust for the fellowship of souls no longer severed by the bounds of time and space. Meanwhile believe me, with every wish for evening light and peace,

Affectionately yours,

JAMES MARTINEAU.

To Rev. Samuel May.

CHILD LIFE INSURANCE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

In the article of Gov. Long upon "Child Life Insurance" in your issue of April 18 I notice that he charges you with having made a "misleading statement" when you stated that "few disinterested persons have opposed the bill" to prohibit child insurance; and he first claims that "nearly all the opponents of the bill, and they are legion, are disinterested." He then gives the names of three clergymen, four physicians, with five other names, two of them being of persons not citizens of Massachusetts, and concludes his statement in this way: "city physicians, overseers of the poor, and a multitude more,—an entirely disinterested class."

Who comprise this "multitude" of persons not produced as witnesses and not named, and whether they are really disinterested, we cannot know: we can only look at those whom the governor produced as witnesses at the State House. To support his case, he introduced quite a number of letters,—whether from interested persons or not it was of course impossible to determine; but the majority of those letters were negative in character. He also brought forward twenty-one witnesses who testified. One was the president of the Prudential, one the vice-president of the Metropolitan, and one the medical examiner of the John Hancock,—all three, of course, intensely interested witnesses. Of the remainder of the twenty-one, seven, including three clergymen, were or had been insurance agents or in some way connected with these very insurance companies; and one represented a newspaper which makes a specialty of insurance matters. Thus, out of those twenty-one witnesses, eleven, or more than one-half, could hardly be said to be disinterested; and, of the remaining ten witnesses, several testified that they knew but little about child insurance and the very poor districts.

The governor is a fluent speaker; and perhaps he used the words “multitude,” “an entirely disinterested class,” without due consideration. But, under the light of examination, his cloud of disinterested witnesses seems to have faded away. The striking list of distinguished citizens of this State which appears on the first page of your last issue, favoring the passage of this bill, stands in marked contrast with the names brought forward by Gov. Long.

Gov. Long then reiterates the statement that the petitioners claim that child insurance results in child murder, and wrongfully says that I based my case from the opening upon the claim of child murder. This has been the cry of the numerous attorneys for the insurance companies throughout the hearings; and it would seem as if they had prepared their defence upon that ground, and could not and dared not meet our true position,—that helpless living children were suffering and neglected through the evils of child insurance. That was my contention, and the claim of child murder was disavowed by me again and again throughout the hearings.

But, Mr. Editor, I scarcely know which of Gov. Long’s specious statements next to consider, since the space which you are able to allow me in this issue of your paper is so limited, and since so many of his statements are misleading or erroneous. In 1891 our Massachusetts Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children did not “speak well” of child insurance. The report merely stated that it had found no evidence of intent to commit child murder in this State, and Gov. Long’s statement is misleading.

The system has not been always “given a larger field in England,” as Gov. Long says. It has been seriously questioned there; and, although the attempts to abolish it have not yet met with success, modified and better methods have already been introduced.

Gov. Long says pauper funerals have diminished; but the overseers of the poor of Somerville, in their last report, state that “funeral expenses are less, as it has become the custom among the poorer classes to insure; but this saving is counterbalanced by the number of applicants for food,” thus directly supporting our contention that paying the insurance premiums causes want of food in the families, and so neglect and cruelty to children.

Gov. Long says that none of the industrially insured appeared to support the bill; but poor Mrs. Coakley, with her fifteen lapsed policies on her five little children, who testified that she had had to stint her children on their bread in order to pay the insurance money,—did she not appear!

I am sorry to see these misleading statements coming from Gov. Long, but I more regret the use by him of the words with which he closed his argument. He asked the committee to reject the bill, “not merely as counsel,” but “as an officer in the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children”! The board of directors of this society, on Feb. 6, 1895, by a formal vote, at a duly called meeting, unanimously voted to favor with counsel the passage of this bill before the legislature. Gov. Long was and is a vice-president of this society. Nevertheless, without first severing his connection with the society, he accepted a retainer from a rich corporation, and led a contest against the society. And, more than that, he asked the Committee on Insurance to reject the bill, not merely because he was counsel for the insurance companies, but for the very reason that he was an officer in the charitable society against which he was leading the attack, which society had duly voted to favor the bill!

This personal argument was an extraordinary one, to say the least; and that Gov. Long should have felt obliged to use it argued that his cause was indeed desperate!

And the Insurance Committee, by a majority vote, promptly so decided, found against the insurance companies, and reported the bill to the legislature.

FURNESS AND MARTINEAU.

TO DR. WILLIAM HENRY FURNESS,
Who will be 93 years old on the 20th of April; while his friend, Dr. Martineau, will be 90 on the 21st.

BY JOHN W. CHADWICK.

How beautiful when stars that move
On paths diverse through heaven’s height
Draw nearer each to each until
They shine with interblended light!

Conjunction sweet and fair; but far
More beautiful is that to me
Which close together draws my thought,
Dear friend, of Martineau and thee.

One April day thy birthday marks
With quickening life in flower and field:
The next to his brings daisies bright
As only English meadows yield.

And never pass these April days
But stir, like yearnings of the sod,
A gladsome mood of love and praise
For you, great witnesses for God.

As stars that shine with different light,
Unlike your intellectual ray,
Yet both rejoice the lingering night,
And guide us on our homeward way.

Whatever port of truth or good
We seek with steadfast heart and mind,
Whatever error understood
We leave upon the track behind,

Some brightness from your spirits lends
A gleam to cheer the lonely dark,
Some earnest of your purpose sends
Our spirits nearer to the mark.

Bright heralds of the coming dawn,
A little longer guide us here,
And then, to deeper skies withdrawn,
Send down some word of lofty cheer.

JAMES MARTINEAU, D.D., LL.D.

As announced to our readers in our last issue, the present number of the Christian Register is largely devoted to a recognition of the life and work of Dr. James Martineau, who last Sunday, April 21, completed his ninetyeth year. A biographical sketch prepared by Rev. A. W. Jackson, a special student of Dr. Martineau’s works, gives an outline of his personal and professional career, which is followed by a generous expression of appreciation from many admirers, embracing a remarkable list of distinguished names of eminent theologians, scholars, preachers, editors, and literary men.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

BY REV. A. W. JACKSON.

ANCESTRY AND EARLY HOME.

The ancestry of Dr. Martineau is Huguenot; and he dates his English line from a French refugee, who, driven by the persecutions which followed the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, crossed the Channel and settled in Norwich. Of the fourth generation from him was Thomas Martineau. He settled down in his ancestral city, and engaged in manufacture. The story has gone abroad that he was a wine merchant, but it is untrue. He found a wife in Elizabeth Rankin, a woman of hardy Northumbrian stock, vigorous, affectionate, and capable; and to them, April 21, 1805, the seventh of their eight children, the lion of this tribe of Judah, was born.

Upon the early home life we want to bestow at least a passing glance. In general circumstance there was neither superfluity nor want. The father immersed in business, the management of the family fell mainly on the mother. A mother with eight children may be as a sun in the domestic firmament that shines on all alike; but, though each has all her love, they must of necessity divide her care. And so they must early learn the useful lesson of caring for one another. Thus was it in this household. The general discipline was of the older and stricter sort, though—Dr. Martineau himself shall testify—“in the process of change to more genial ways that Norwich home was in advance of the average.” The religious discipline was graver than is common in like households now, and we can imagine the compulsory Bible-readings and the severely decorous Sabbaths. Yet that the severity was less than might have been looked for at that date the following anecdote may show. The mother, going to church one evening, left the children at home with direction to read the Bible. On returning, she asked James what he had read; and he answered, “Isaiah.” “Why, you could not have read the whole of Isaiah.” “Yes, mother, I have, skipping the nonsense.” Many of us of later birth took our Bible as it came, and did not dare to skip the nonsense or even find it. Theologically, the family had departed widely from the Calvinistic standard of their Huguenot ancestry. Their church stood for English Presbyterianism, the root whence English Unitarianism has sprung.

EDUCATION.

Of the useful institutions of Norwich is a grammar school, a foundation of the fourteenth century. To this young James was sent as a day scholar from ten to fourteen years of age. The emphasis of the school was upon classical studies, and in these he made rapid progress. He also learned the French language. His most eager interest was in mathematics, the pursuit of which, to any considerable extent, was not allowed him here. The way opened for his transfer to another school, that of Lant Carpenter at Bristol. This was one of the most important periods of his life. Mr. Martineau has never been stingy in recognition of the keepers of his intellect, but to none other has he confessed a debt so large as to his Bristol schoolmaster. Under his stimulus his whole nature was aroused. Two years only were allowed him here. His parents had decided that Apollo should do farm work for Admetus,—in other words, that he should be an engineer; and he was sent to Derby to learn his craft. Fortunately, he fell into incompetent hands, which made him dissatisfied with his work. Fortunately, too, the spell of Lant Carpenter was upon him. At the end of a year he announced his desire to become a minister. Though this announcement was unwelcome to his parents, they were too wise to oppose him; and he was sent to Manchester College, then at York, for his education. Here he studied five years under John Kenrick and Charles Wellbeloved, to whose great service to him he has borne most generous testimony. They were years of the severest application. John Kenrick twice mentions his “intemperate study.”

HIS MINISTRY IN DUBLIN.

In 1827 Mr. Martineau completed his college studies, and was “admitted to preach,” but did not enter immediately upon his work. For a year he took upon himself the labors of his Bristol schoolmaster. At the close of the year he was invited to the Eustace Street Presbyterian Church in Dublin as assistant pastor. The call was a most gratifying one. His ordination, Oct. 26, 1828, was according to Presbyterian usage; and it was as a Presbyterian—of the English, not the Scottish type—that he began his work. At Christmas following his ordination Hellen Higginson, whom he had met at Derby, became his wife. With the aid of a friend he purchased a house in expectation of a long period of work. Anon a baby Hellen came to them, an angel visitant that did not tarry long. Erelong a son, Russell, was born to them, destined to the scholar’s quiet toils and honorable success, now an Orientalist of fame and assistant keeper in the British Museum.

That he entered on his work with enthusiasm goes without saying. He prepared a hymn-book for his church, “Hymns for Christian Worship,” published in 1831. In 1830 he delivered an address on “Peace and Division,” the earliest of his published productions. Though assistant pastor, practically all the pastoral labor devolved upon him; and he successfully discharged it. In the pulpit he had, indeed, no Whitefield popularity; but for the serious and earnest he had the magnetizing word. The freshness of youth was upon his features, the maturity of wisdom was on his lips, the light of genius in his eye.

A difficulty, however, arose between him and his church, which dis severed him from it after a brief ministry of three years. The senior pastor died; and he, succeeding to his office, found that it meant to him £100 addition to his salary. This was his share of the Regium Donum. Inquiring as to this, he found it to be a bounty paid to the Presbyterians of Ireland, and, with various discrimination, to the nonconformists of England generally. At first of the nature of a bribe for their fealty, it had gone on for more than a hundred and fifty years. But here were the Catholics taxed to pay it, taxed to support a ministry which they repudiated. His keen moral sensibilities were troubled by this; and he asked his people to relinquish the bounty, signifying that, if they did not do so, he must cease to be their minister. The contest was earnest, and in the issue Mr. Martineau was defeated by one vote. True to his word, he promptly resigned. Property valuations had declined, and he must part with his house at a large sacrifice. With a burden of debt and a young family and no occupation, he must face the future.

HIS MINISTRY IN LIVERPOOL.

By his attitude toward the Regium Donum, Mr. Martineau was disqualified to minister to the Presbyterians of Ireland. Visitors from England, however, had heard him preach. Visitors from Dublin had told in England of the new man that had come. Very soon after giving up his pastorate in Dublin, he was invited to become the colleague of Rev. John Grumby, who was settled over the Paradise Street Chapel in Liverpool. Mr. Charles Wicksteed, writing in 1877, remembered how the pulpit was quietly ascended by a tall young man, thin, but of muscular frame; pale, but not delicate complexion; a countenance full in the repose of thought, and in animation of intelligence and enthusiasm; features belonging to no regular type or order of beauty, yet leaving the impression of a very high kind of beauty; and a voice so sweet and clear and strong, without being in the least loud, that it conveyed all the inspiration of music without any of its art or intention.”

About this time he began to exercise his hand as a reviewer. In 1833 he contributed to the Monthly Repository an article on “Joseph Priestley.” In 1834 he printed in the same magazine an article on “Bentham’s Deontology,” a ringing proclamation of the doctrines of necessity and utility. He came into great demand for public occasions,—a speech here, an address there. In 1833 he delivered a course of lectures on chemistry before the Mechanics’ Institute in Liverpool. New domestic experiences were brought him here. In 1833 a daughter, Mary Ellen, was born to him, who now presides over his home. Two years later another son was given, and the next year taken. Three children more were to come to him,—Gertrude, now an artist and a clever writer; Basil, a London solicitor; and Edith, his latest born, also an artist.

In 1837 he published his first original book, “The Rationale of Religious Inquiry,” a thin volume about the size of Emerson’s “Nature,” and, like that, a proclamation of original power. In 1839 an event took place which brought him into a good deal of prominence. It was the Liverpool controversy, whereof the echoes have not wholly died away. Of this controversy it is impossible, save in the most general terms, to tell here. It was precipitated by the appearance in print of a circular invitation “to all who call themselves Unitarians in the town and neighborhood of Liverpool to attend a course of lectures in which the errors of Unitarianism were to be exposed.” The tone of the missive was popish, and it abounded in phrases in which orthodox oppugnancy to Unitarianism was plainly rather than delicately shown. Dr. Martineau had then two fellow laborers in Liverpool,—John Hamilton Thom and Henry Giles. Jointly they met the circular with a challenge to debate, which, after various skirmishing, was accepted; and in the final arrangement the three were pitted against thirteen. The odds seem Thermopylaean. Theological sympathy will incline the reader to one side or the other, independently of any consideration of weight of learning or cogency of argument. But the readers are surely few who will not say that, though the odds were Thermopylaean, the polemic victory was Spartan.

Among the marvellous features of this controversy was the vast labor it implied in a period so brief. The first lecture was given on the orthodox side, February 6: the last was given by Mr. Martineau on the 7th of May. And between these dates the whole labor must be compressed. Yet the shortest of Mr. Martineau's lectures, if given in full, could fall but little short of three hours in delivery; and one of them would reach four. And these lectures were not crudely thrown together, but thoroughly organized and nobly elaborated and adorned.

In 1840 he did great service to his denomination, and to many others, by publishing a second hymn-book, "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home." This year, however, is marked with peculiar emphasis in his career by his appointment to the chair of mental and moral philosophy in Manchester New College. Here for forty-five years he was to toil at the problems of Plato and Kant. The college was now at Manchester, having just returned from York; and thither he went two days each week for the delivery of his lectures. Occupied with church and college, it is not strange that during the next five years he did little critical labor. In 1841 he printed an essay on "Five Points of Christian Doctrine," an eloquent presentation of his attitude as a Unitarian theologian. In the same year he wrote a letter on Lant Carpenter, published in the memoirs prepared by his son, and one of the fairest tributes a pupil ever bore his master. The year 1843 dates a blessing to many minds,—the publication of the first series of "Endeavors after the Christian Life," a collection of his pulpit discourses. In 1845 he resumed those critical studies by which he was to become so widely known, with elaborate discussion of "Thomas Arnold," "Church and State," "Whewell's Morality," and the next year "Whewell's Systematic Morality" and "Theodore Parker's Discourse." In 1847 appeared the second series of "Endeavors," and so runs on the story.

Under his faithful ministry his congregation had outgrown their place of worship, and so the beautiful Hope Street Church was built. While it was building, he seized upon the opportunity for a period of rest and study in Germany. Here he sat down at the feet of Trendelenburg, the eminent Aristotelian; and the "metaphysic of the world came home" to him. He returned in season to dedicate his new church, and plunged at once into his church and college labors. The critical labors began again. In the next two years he published seven or eight of his more elaborate papers, among them the sadly famous "Mesmeric Atheism."

IN LONDON.

A change came. Manchester New College was moved to London; and, though four hours distant from Liverpool, for four years he kept appointment with it. In 1857 he was invited to come to London, and devote himself entirely to it. Accordingly, he said good-by to his Liverpool flock after twenty-five years of service with them. At this time it is probable that he did not look for further ministerial labor, but it was before him. The year after he went to London the incumbent of the Little Portland Street Chapel died; and he and the principal of the college, John James Tayler, undertook its ministries together. This relation continued till 1869, when Mr. Tayler died. Mr. Martineau, though now with the added cares of principal of the college, toiled on in the pulpit ministries alone till 1872, when, becoming aware that his strength was overtaxed, after forty-two years of preaching he left the pulpit.

The ebbing strength which led him to give up the pulpit did not at once return; and, though he kept at his college tasks, his friends were anxious. The fact was that he was living under a shadow whose chill was deep. At length, in 1877, after a lingering malady, the wife of nearly fifty years dropped at his side. After her death his health returned, and for seven more years he kept appointment with the college. Those seven years brought him to 1885, when the octogenarian felt that it was "Time to grow old,

To take in sail,"

and, after forty-five years of service, laid down his college burden.

HIS WORK AS A WRITER.

Of his literary labors that have come to us in book form I have mentioned the "Rationale," published in 1837; "Hymns of the Church and Home," published in 1840; the first series of "Endeavors," published in 1843; and the second series, which appeared in 1847. As has been often the case with distinguished English men of letters, he won his first more emphatic recognition in this country. In 1852 Crosby & Nichols of Boston gathered from the English magazines a volume of his essays, under the title of "Miscellanies." In 1858 the American Unitarian Association brought out another and a fuller volume, entitled "Studies of Christianity." In 1866 and 1868 W. V. Spencer of Boston gathered and published two other volumes, under the title of "Essays, Theological and Philosophical." In 1874 he brought out another hymn-book, entitled "Hymns of Praise and Prayer." In 1876 he published the first series of "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things," and in 1879 the second series.

It was his frequent custom to open the college year with an address. The opening address of 1874 was notable for itself and for what followed it. The subject was "Religion as affected by Modern Materialism," and he embraced the opportunity to pass in review certain evolutionary doctrines. Prof. Tyndall, no feeble knight, saw opportunity to do battle for the faith, and pitched in. Pitching in may be a holiday diversion; but it involves the melancholy liability of being pitched out, which was the issue in this case. Mr. Martineau's rejoinder, under the title of "Modern Materialism," was a smiling annihilation.

In 1882 came a volume on "Spinoza," embracing the pleasantest account of his life and the toughest analysis of his doctrine. His retirement from the college gave him opportunity to gather up the results of his labors; and that same year the Clarendon Press brought out his "Types of Ethical Theory," in two volumes,—perhaps the most comprehensive discussion of philosophical ethics of the century. Two years later came the two immortal volumes of "The Study of Religion." Here most of us supposed his labors must end; but in 1890 came the tremendous volume, "The Seat of Authority." In 1891-92 he gathered from the English magazines four volumes of his choicest essays, embracing with them the "Miscellanies" and the "Essays, Philosophical and Theological," before mentioned. These were published under the title of "Essays, Reviews, and Addresses." In 1893 came the little volume of "Home Prayers," his "Pax Vobiscum."

HONORS.

Academic honors were tardy, but they came. The first, we rejoice to say, was from America. In 1872 Harvard College conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Laws. In 1874 the University at Leyden made him a Doctor of Sacred Theology. Some time later Edinburgh gave him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Later still Oxford crowned him Doctor of Civil Laws. And there was another honor, something more than academic: on his eighty-third birthday he received a testimonial to his great service as a philosophical and religious teacher, signed by something like seven hundred of the more distinguished scholars and thinkers of Europe and America, without distinction of school or sect. It was such a tribute as, perhaps, none other ever won.

Record of these later years it is not necessary to make. Like all the other years, we may dare to say they have been consecrated to what is noblest and holiest; and we take leave of the nonagenarian, cared for by filial tenderness, looking with smiling heart upon the world he has served, and back upon the vanished rank of children, kinsmen, friends, he doubts not to rejoice.

TRIBUTES TO DR. MARTINEAU.

I.

FROM REV. WILLIAM ROUNSEVILLE ALGER.

Please accept my thanks for the invitation to take part in what the Register will say pertaining to the ninetieth birthday of Dr. Martineau. But having already, at various times and in various places, given full expression of my estimate of his pre-eminent genius and works, I will avail myself of this opportunity only to say that I do not believe that any living person feels more largely indebted to James Martineau than I do, or cherishes a deeper reverence and admiration for him, or has a more vivid pleasure in the prolongation of his beautiful old age, still bearing such vigorous fruit as his brilliant article in the last number of the Nineteenth Century on the "Foundation of Belief."

II.

FROM REV. PHILIP S. MOXOM, D.D., OF SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Dr. Martineau has done more than any man during the past fifty years to destroy the materialistic philosophy that rose into new vitality with the rapid development of the physical sciences which marks our era. He has also done work of the highest order in stating and explicating the fundamental principles of religion and ethics. But to myself he has appealed most strongly, perhaps, in his meditative and devotional writings. His "Endeavors after the Christian Life" and "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things" have taken a secure place among the best of those books which peculiarly nourish and strengthen the spiritual life. These books have been of constant service to me since I first knew them. Had Dr. Martineau written no other books than these, he would have accomplished enough to command the perpetual gratitude of all who would live according to the spirit.

III.

FROM E. BENJAMIN ANDREWS, LL.D., PRESIDENT OF BROWN UNIVERSITY.

Dr. Martineau is, in many respects, one of the phenomena of our age. But in no respect is he more remarkable than in that prophetic endowment of his, while it has enabled him to foresee, amid all the clouds with which socialism has obscured the theological sky, that there was light ahead for the Christian faith. When few other great men dared do so, he told us that the unbelieving bent of thought through which we have been passing for a quarter of a century would be temporary, would give way to an era of strong, healthy conviction as to the reality of a spiritual world and a living God. It must be a great delight to him to see his prophecy fulfilled in the renewed interest in religion now manifest among the leaders of thought in works like Kidd's "Social Evolution" and Balfour's "Foundations of Belief." How much it would have rejoiced the late President Hill, too, had he lived to read these and similar works!

IV.

FROM REV. WILLIAM HAYES WARD, EDITOR OF THE "INDEPENDENT."

In response to your inquiry of April 13, I would say that I have always been impressed in Dr. Martineau's writings with the golden candor of the man, with his thoroughness in thinking out and presenting a subject, and with the fine balance between his intellectual or philosophical nature and his devotional and ethical nature. It has seemed to me sometimes that he found it difficult to believe in dogmatic statements or in historical facts, where he

FROM MR. H. M. ALDEN, EDITOR OF "HARPER'S MAGAZINE."

There are many aspects of his religious thought that appeal to me; but I would read anything from his pen with delight, simply for his vigorous English.

VI.

FROM PROF. BORDEN P. BOWNE OF BOSTON UNIVERSITY.

I have always found great value in Dr. Martineau's writings, especially in those of a devotional and religious character. Even when I found myself differing from him, I have always recognized the unity of the spirit.

VII.

FROM REV. J. H. MORISON, D.D., BOSTON, MASS.

For almost sixty years I have had a great and increasing admiration and respect for Dr. Martineau,—for the man, and for what he has done.

VIII.

FROM REV. W. H. FURNESS, D.D. PHILADELPHIA, MASS.

I'm one day older than our friend Martineau. April 20 is my birthday. How many years I don't know. Is it two? I hold with Wordsworth: I can't analyze the character of one I love and revere. The sentiments of veneration and love that Dr. Martineau inspire are an all-sufficient warrant of the worth that inspires them. God bless him!

IX.

FROM REV. GEORGE BATCHELOR, SECRETARY OF THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

You desire to call attention to the various aspects of Dr. Martineau's character and writings, whether devotional, philosophical, or ethical. It gives me great pleasure to call attention to one aspect of Dr. Martineau's work which may possibly be overlooked by others, but which, I think, is most important of all. Dividing the religious life into four parts, represented by ideas, sentiments, emotions, and action, one might say that Dr. Martineau has been eminent in them all; but it is especially in the second class that I should put his greatest work. Human character in its highest forms is wholly a bundle of sentiments, or, rather, an organism made up of sentiments. There have been many philosophers in the world who have produced great ideas. There have been no philosophers who have been more successful in converting great ideas into noble sentiments than Dr. Martineau. Emotions attend the manifestation of sentiments, and actions proceed from them. He, then, is greatest in the kingdom of heaven who thinks great thoughts, and then transforms them into permanent modes of affection. When, for instance, the idea of reverence, which Dr. Martineau puts first in his system of ethics, is by him transmuted into a sentiment of reverence, all the world takes note of the revelation. One might go through all the sentiments which are found in the highest forms of the saintly character under the law of freedom, such as justice, pity, honor, chastity, etc., and find that Dr. Martineau had been the agent of the transformation by which the appropriate ideas in each case have clothed themselves with the forms of sentiment and life. Saying that, I say that which, from my point of view, is the highest praise.

FROM REV. C. A. BARTOL, D.D.

The ninetieth birthday of Rev. James Martineau brings to us a sense of debt that began early in life, but which no lapse of time can wipe out. He outlives those who should note his career. I bear in mind Andrews Norton who spoke fifty years ago of "Endeavors after the Christian Life" as an attempt to note what other scholars had already clearly described. I remember well Theodore Parker's first essays, which Martineau held as philosophic in form, but not in fact. As the sea is restless, but keeps its place, dissolving the vales and the hills, so the deluge of thought wastes the shores, and remains the same. The flood of inquiry outlasts the fixtures of opinion, which it lays low and sweeps away. It binds and blesses those who feel that it is held in the same limits that contain every mountain and cape. Our speculations are governed by the same law by which our conclusions are held. If our certainties diminish, our trusts increase: confidence in principles is our certificate of facts.

XI.

FROM REV. R. S. STORRS, D.D.
I am very sorry not to be able to write anything about Dr. Martineau which I should be content to write or you to print. I am not quite in usual vigor, and my hands are over full this week of pressing work. I wish that I could say fairly and sympathetically what I deeply feel about one from whom I have often greatly dissented, but by whom I have been enriched and animated in thought and spirit for many years. But it cannot be done now.

XII.

FROM REV. G. GOTTHEIL, D.D. RABBI OF TEMPLE, EMMANUEL, NEW YORK.
I am not sufficiently acquainted with the writings of Dr. Martineau to be entitled to pass an opinion on them. But as much as I do know of them proves that their author deserves the gratitude of all who love soul liberty and desire pure religion and undefiled to spread in the earth. Whatever his theories may be, they are subservient to the defence of the native rights of the human mind and the uplifting of the highest ideals of a perfect manhood. I heartily congratulate the Unitarian Church in the possession and preservation of so valiant and so gifted a defender of her cause, so indefatigable a pathfinder in the new regions of thought and experience, and so trustworthy a torchbearer as that senior minister of hers has shown himself to be. Of such as James Martineau the Psalmist sang:—
The righteous man shall flourish like a palm-tree,
And lift up its head like the cedar on Lebanon.
Planted in the house of God,
They shall bloom in the courts of the Lord.
They shall still bring forth fruit in old age;
They shall be full of sap and flourishing.

XIII.

FROM PRESIDENT WILLIAM F. WARREN, BOSTON UNIVERSITY.
It is highly fitting that the ninetieth birthday of Dr. Martineau should be gratefully remembered on both sides of the Atlantic. It would probably be impossible to name a living Christian teacher who, through so long a period, in so wide a circle, has been recognized and felt as a potent personal force making for high aspiration, clear thinking, scholarly research, generous judgments, ethical aims, catholic tempers, and a lofty spiritual philosophy. How much he has stimulated other makers of the century can never be known to the historian of thought or of poetry or of morals.

XIV.

FROM REV. FRANCIS G. PEABODY, D.D., PLUMMER PROFESSOR OF CHRISTIAN MORALS, HARVARD UNIVERSITY.
The "Endeavors after the Christian Life" was given to me by a very dear friend twenty-six years ago, in my Senior year in college; and it opened my eyes for the first time to the possibilities of the preacher's office. Preaching, to Dr. Martineau, is not primarily instruction, or even persuasion: it is "the lyric expression of the soul." It is not the catholic homily: it is the "personal effusion of conscience and affection." No definition of the preacher's function was ever so just as this. It has brought courage to thousands of humbler men,—men who were conscious that they were incapable of much instructiveness or persuasiveness, but who desired to express their souls; and behind the definition lies always the splendid illustration of it in the unique sermons of Dr. Martineau himself. I am permanently indebted to him for his more academic writings; but, as I look up to his portrait before me now, I must acknowledge myself, as thousands of other men would do, most indebted to him for the lyric expression of his soul. And I gladly join in the reverent and grateful greeting which the recurrence of his birthday permits.

FROM REV. THEODORE C. WILLIAMS, PASTOR ALL SOULS' CHURCH, NEW YORK.
It is a great privilege to join the Christian Register in its celebration of Dr. Martineau's ninetieth birthday. His service to our Unitarian churches is beyond estimate. He is, without a rival, our first theologian, and has maintained our self-respect through two generations of ubiquitous controversy. The extent of his service to universal Christendom it is too early to affirm. But with us, though himself too large for any sectarian limitation, his constructive thought has been as spiritual bone and sinew. We have no preacher who has not read, no scholar who has not mastered him: his eloquence has reached all. But he has been especially the teacher of our teachers, our "pastor pastorum." Our provincial controversies of radical with conservative were superseded in the synthesis of his vast scholarship. His sermons have fed our souls; his criticism has ranged through the whole compass of philosophy; his devout insight has illuminated the heart of many a theological mystery, and left none untouched. Against materialism, in days when it was more formidable than now, he was the protagonist among English writers. Certainly, no English writer, living or dead, has so much fortified idealistic ethics against the so-called English school. As a defender and interpreter of a rational Christianity, he has done a work which, since it forces recognition from every quarter, claims all Unitarians in affectionate discipleship.

τρίς γὰρ δὴ μὴν φασιν ἀνάξασθαι γένε' ἀνδρῶν
ὥς τέ μοι ἀθάνατος ἰνδάλλεται εἰσοράσθαι.
Od. III. 245, 246.

"(Who thrice has seen the perishable kind
Of men decay, and through three ages shined Like gods majestic and like gods in mind.)"
—Pope's Translation.

XVI.

FROM REV. NICHOLAS P. GILMAN, EDITOR OF THE "NEW WORLD."
It would be easy to write at length of such a wonderful man as Dr. Martineau, and just as difficult to avoid panegyric. To avoid it, may one say, in self-defence, that it does not seem to me that he has always done full justice to the scientific movement and the doctrine of evolution, and that, in reading his writings, I have sometimes wished, as the little girl did in a thunderstorm, for "plain rain,"—for words less adorned with metaphor? These are small matters, however, to mention in speaking of one of the greatest intellects the world has known and of books destined to be classic wherever the English tongue is read. In a materialistic age he has stood grandly for the reality and power of the spirit; and his wide-reaching influence will tell more and more mightily in favor of a faith at once reasonable, righteous, and inspiring.

FROM PROFESSOR ORELLO CONE OF BUCHTEL COLLEGE, AKRON, OHIO.
Dr. Martineau has placed the present and many succeeding generations under obligations to him as a religious teacher and an expounder of a noble spiritual philosophy. In him we do not separate the philosopher from the Christian, and underlying the inspiring discourses of the "Endeavors after the Christian Life" we discern the principles of the "Study of Religion" and of the "Types of Ethical Theory." A theologian of the noblest type, he combines with a keen dialectic a tender and worshipful reverence. His criticism of materialistic hypothesis constitutes a contribution to the solution of the gravest problems, which is equalled in importance only by his masterly exposition of the idiosyncratic ethics. His great work on "The Seat of Authority in Religion" has, besides other conspicuous merits, that of showing how a full acceptance and a facile handling of the results of the critical school are compatible with an unshaken faith in the essential religious verities and a devout appreciation of Jesus of Nazareth. The wisdom and inspiration which his writings supply are communicated to us through the medium of a style whose grace and charm delight the reader and leave a deposit of pleasant memories.
I am glad of the opportunity to join, on this anniversary, with the thousands of admiring pupils upon two continents in greetings to my great and revered teacher.

XVIII.

FROM REV. H. W. THOMAS, D.D., CHICAGO, ILL.
The growth of religious ideas must be reckoned not only by years, but by centuries. Through these the same ideas may be found moving along, sometimes separately, sometimes in groups. The evolution may be gentle, orderly, transitional, cumulative, spasmodic, and sometimes climactic. For the first time in history reason and religion met face to face in the eighteenth century. It was a revolt from the theology of the seventeenth, and naturally bordered upon the extreme in some directions; and from this there came the reaction of the more patient and thorough thinking of the nineteenth century. The reformation of the sixteenth century was one of forms. It dealt largely with external abuses. The reformation of the nineteenth century is strictly one of thought, of theology, dealing with the rational and moral side of religion. Hence it has been transitional rather than revolutionary. And it is in this period that the long and thoughtful years of Dr. Martineau have been lived. There always arises in such a time much literature that can be only transient. It deals only with some passing phase of thought, and is soon forgotten. The critical scholarship, the patient toil, and the intuitively spiritual life of Dr. Martineau give to his writing a permanent value. He puts all great subjects in the light of their surroundings, views them from all sides, and aims to estimate their place and value, not as a partisan, but in the interest of universal truth and universal religion. He is both philosopher and theologian, and has done more to place the great religious questions of our time in their true light than almost any other author. To mention only one of his great works, "The Seat of Authority in Religion": in that work alone he has laid foundations upon which religion may build for centuries to come, and for the reason that he places the seat of authority in the rational and moral consciousness of mankind, and not in the authority and decisions of church councils in the past. That is to say, he takes truth for authority, and not authority for truth,—rests the great truths of religion in the living consciousness of each age, and hence makes possible their larger growth with the growth of the ages.
Dr. Martineau is too great a man to think and write simply in the interest of a sect or a party. He thinks and lives in the universal, and hence has sought to ground universal religion in the universal consciousness.

XIX.

FROM REV. GEORGE A. GORDON, D.D., PASTOR OF OLD SOUTH CHURCH, BOSTON.
I deem it a privilege to be allowed to bear my testimony to the vast debt of gratitude due James Martineau from the English-speaking world for great services and a great character. It would be difficult to name a better British representative of the nobler intellectual movements of our century. The history of his mind given in prefaces and introductions to his later works, in the beautiful illuminating confidence of old age, is of the deepest interest. He has travelled through the whole course of English speculation, served successive terms of apprenticeship under all the greater masters of sensationalism, grown as he studied, and, finally, transcending his teachers, he has come to stand for a thought which, until his appearance, is almost entirely wanting in the philosophical thinking of Great Britain. Individualism has been the strength and the weakness of English speculation, and in this style of thought Martineau was nourished; and yet he came to feel that he could not live unless he could get an intellectual diet of a different kind. Here is the source of the great influence he has had as a philosophical critic. He understood what the British mind had done; and he was able, having followed the hunger of his heart into other fields, to show what it had not done and, on its traditional principles, could not do.
The range of his intellectual activity has been very wide. He has kept company with the century, entered into all its greater movements, and been able to look round them and estimate their power, actual and prophetic, with singular penetration. His devotional and homiletical writings are full of life and beauty. His theological reviews disclose a rare gift for transcending his own thought, and for the appreciation of alien forms of belief. His philosophical essays, which form an introduction to his later and more systematic work, are models of noble exposition and acute criticism. But the work which I think his best, and which, I believe, shows all sides of the man as no other single production does, is his "Types of Ethical Theory." For the genius of Martineau is profoundly, surpassingly ethical. His mind is more original here than anywhere else. And in this great work on ethics his magnificent gift of exposition and criticism appears at its very best.

These two distinctions stand out supreme in my thought of Dr. Martineau,—his superb ethical insight and his great critical power. In the latter merit he is the forerunner of the critical movement which had Thomas Hill Green for its strongest representative. Due philosophical honor is not done Dr. Martineau unless his services to higher forms of thought, rendered before the advent of the thinkers to whom I have referred, are clearly remembered. His is a mind to be admired, a character to be revered, a life for whose richness, range, and power all believers in God may well give thanks.

XX.

FROM REV. M. J. SAVAGE, BOSTON, MASS.
Admiring and reverencing Martineau as I do for his character and his work in many ways, the one thing that, perhaps, has impressed me most is the rare fact that he has always been young, always open to new and higher visions of truth. This feeling I have put into a sonnet.
While his wondrous youth lasts, I hope he may stay with us. It would hurt me to see any signs of age. When he grows tired, let him renew his youth in the lands to which all of us go.
I wish him all the honor and happiness and love which he has earned: no one could wish him more.

TO MARTINEAU.

I have seen many old who yet were young;
As thy compatriot, Gladstone, past fourscore,
Who, lord of many fields, still thirsts for more,
And, just for play, will master some new tongue;
As Furness, whose fine brain is still fine strung
For all high thoughts to play on. But thy youth,
Thy still fresh eagerness for all fresh truth,
Marks thee most youthful, youthful souls among!
Most mariners at first scorn fear or ease,
At fifty take in sail and hug the land,
Then steer for some snug harbor in old age;
But thou, in quest of truth, dost sail all seas,
In quest of truth dost coast the farthest strand,
Eternal seeker still, though reverend sage!

XXI.

FROM REV. HENRY G. SPAULDING, BOSTON MASS.
Ever since I began to study theology Dr. Martineau has been a strengthener of my faith and a helper of my religious joy. I count it among the "memorabilia" of my life to have heard him in his London pulpit and to have met him in his home.
Apart from the invaluable service which he has rendered to the cause of rational Christianity by his philosophical writings, his published discourses furnish rich nutriment for the meditative spirit,—a spirit which is still among the great needs of our modern life.

XXII.

FROM REV. CHARLES A. HUMPHREYS, RANDOLPH, MASS.
I gladly avail myself of the privilege you offer of sending greetings to Dr. Martineau. In 1865 I had the pleasure of visiting him at his home and of expressing to him personally something of my indebtedness. But I have not since communicated with him, although the years have multiplied a thousand-fold my sense of spiritual obligation. No writer of this century has done so much for me as Dr. Martineau. His writings have been to me a constant source of inspiration. I have loved to wander through the green pastures of his ever-fresh meditations on "Sacred Things" and by the still waters of his clear and deep insights into spiritual truth, and I wish he would give the world more of his "Hours of Thought." He little knows the boundlessness of the debt we already owe him, yet I hope he will be inclined to make it greater.

XXIII.

FROM PROF. GEORGE HARRIS, ANDOVER
THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

"Types of Ethical Theory" I regard as Dr. Martineau's most valuable work. It excels in criticism and in construction. Its literary form gives a charm to the most abstruse reasoning. A chastened imagination lights up every page. The thought always glows. Modesty, candor, and conviction are perfectly mingled. Two or three sentences in the preface which admit the reader into the author's confidence might well be made the motto of every teacher and writer: "I have always been a teacher. I have not ceased to be a learner. In the one capacity I must tell the little I know, in the other I must strive after some glimpse of the immeasurable light beyond. I cannot rest contentedly on the past: I cannot take a step toward the future without its support."

XXIV.

AT NINETY YEARS.
BY PROF. H. H. BARBER, MEADVILLE
THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.
1805-1895.

Far on in late descending evening light,
The sunny summits of great work behind,
Before, the purpling shadows of still night
And arching heavens with holy stars bedight,
He stands, the tireless pilgrim of the mind,
Searcher serene of spirit depth and height,—
Merlin and Galahad in the stainless fight
For faith unshamed and freedom unconfin'd.
Warrior and seer and scholar all in one,
Thy crystal thought, in splendid phrase enshrined,
Leads where truth's pilgrims still rejoicing go,
Lifts still the lives in which high tasks are done,
And crowns thee victor at life's setting sun,
Master in things divine of them that know!

XXV.

FROM MR. EDWIN D. MEAD, EDITOR OF THE "NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE."

His service for a sound philosophy in our time has been something inestimable. He has been the one man in England whose vision and argument have been consistently clear and great and adequate during this half-century of tumultuous thought.

XXVI.

FROM REV. LYMAN ABBOTT, D.D., EDITOR OF THE "OUTLOOK."

Other engagements make it impossible for me to do more than contribute a sentence or two of personal affection and esteem to the tributes you are gathering to one of the greatest apostles of spiritual Christianity in our century. I gladly acknowledge my personal indebtedness to him. I believe that all his works are in my library. As a seer, whose intellectual philosophy is the product of his own spiritual experience, the century has produced no superior to James Martineau. Even his defects are the products of his virtues. If he recognizes too little the importance and the authority of historical Christianity, it is because his own vision of present and spiritual Christianity is so clear and so certain. If as an author he lacks in suggestiveness, it is because his literary ideals are so high and his literary finish so exquisite that he leaves nothing unsaid and nothing unthought of for his reader to say or to think. He is at once a reaction against and a counterpoise to the materialistic and sensational philosophy which he has done so much to counteract; but, though he is so splendid an idealist, he never runs into the wild vagaries of a certain school of modern idealism. Intellectual sympathy with James Martineau is equally efficacious as an antidote for the sensationalism of Mill and Huxley on the one hand and for the unbalanced and unphilosophical idealism of the Christian Scientists on the other. And those of us who have had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with Mr. Martineau know that his soul is as crystalline as his style, and that the beauty of his English is a true reflection of the spiritual beauty of the man.

FROM REV. EDWARD E. HALE, D.D.

The recurrence of our dear friend's birthday recalls to me the first time when I ever saw him. It was in the autumn of 1850, and I was in London for the first time. Of course, the first wish of my heart was that I might see him and hear him; and, after the struggle which most American Unitarians in England have experienced to make out the intricacies of Little Portland Place, I found myself happily in what we call a church and what they call a chapel. The service began; and you may fancy my disappointment when I saw a tall, handsome, may I say even elegant young man enter the pulpit, and when I heard him begin the service. I looked vainly for some older brother who might be the preacher of the day, while this young gentleman, whom I fancied a divinity student, was conducting the opening service. As the service went forward, however, I was well pleased that it was such a young man who had been providentially sent to conduct it on that morning. When we came to the sermon, and the young man himself announced the text, I resigned myself to my misfortune; but it did not require ten words of the master to show me what a blunder I had made from the beginning. For this fresh, ready—may I say again elegant?—young speaker was the sage himself!

Judging from the almanac, and calculating back from the birthday to-morrow, James Martineau must have been at that time fifty-four years old. He gave no such impression of his age then, any more than he gives such an impression of his age to-day. Somehow, he was born to perpetual youth. And I find that to-day I read what he is willing to write to-day, or to say, with that same impression that he is looking upon the realities of the infinite universe with the freshness and gladness and sincerity of young life.

We love and honor and venerate him to-day. But I am inclined to think that at the end of another century careful students of the real life of England and America will express their gratitude for the work which he has done in enlivening the English-speaking nations with an enthusiasm quite as eager as ours of to-day.

XXVIII.

FROM REV. JAMES T. BIXBY, LL.D.,
YONKERS, NEW YORK.

When I saw Dr. Martineau in London ten years ago, it seemed impossible to believe that he was already eighty, so erect was his figure and so alert his movements, while his hair was but iron-gray, and his conversation as vivacious as that of a young man. He seemed to have realized that gift of the soul which he presents so beautifully in one of his sermons,—the emancipation of the spirit that lives in the eternal things from the touch of earthly decay. Of all the great writers of this century, there is none to whom I feel such a personal indebtedness for the growth and elevation of my thought and the inspiration of my religious nature. Looking back at the trend of modern thought in the last forty years, since Darwin's epoch-making "Origin of Species" set all the dovescotes of piety a-flutter, the two prominent features in it have been the steady growth and recognition in the domain of religion of the ideas of law, order, and rational instrumentalities, as the stated methods of divine activity; and, conversely, in the field of science, a corresponding recognition of causes that transcend effects, of undecomposable Life behind all material mechanisms, of pervading intelligence dwelling in all nature's law and methods, of spiritual correlates and infinite realities inseparable from and arching over every phenomenal surface. In this reciprocal rationalizing of theology and spiritualizing of nature, which has made such remarkable progress in the last forty years, there is no single thinker who has made such notable and priceless contributions as James Martineau; and the coming historian who shall estimate the weight and rôle of the great names of modern times will gratefully recognize him as the Plato of the nineteenth century.

XXIX.

FROM REV. JENKIN LLOYD JONES,
CHICAGO, ILL.

Others will speak of Dr. Martineau's place among the great religious teachers of the world. Others will state, as I cannot, his place in the philosophic world. I am glad of the opportunity to speak my personal debt of gratitude to the man who has done so much for me in the way of reconciling the progressive with the appreciative attitude of soul. He is pre-eminently the reverent radical. He has been an in-rooter, and not an up-rooter. Two characteristics push themselves to the front as I think of James Martineau,—one, the splendid way in which he has revised his own thought, reconstructed his own philosophy. He seems to have been able to set aside the law which besets most minds. He has never reached a mental climax. His last book has always been the most advanced. He has succeeded in keeping himself ever in the lead. He is still with the young men, sixty years further ahead in thought than he was at the age of thirty. The other most striking characteristic, it seems to me, lies in the power to discriminate between the controversies of theology and the harmonies of religions. He has realized that thought, even the most profound, is not co-existent with religion, and cannot be used as a measure of the same. So the word "Unitarian" has been big enough to represent his thought. It has enlisted his scholarship, but it has not measured his religious sympathies and fellowship. He never would consent to have his religious sympathies, or even his dream of religious organization and practical co-operation, rimmed by a word, even though the word be the chosen word of his own thought. This prophet of universal religion has taught many of us to grope for an organization that will be hospitable to the universalities in all religions. Hence his sure place among the prophets.

XXX.

FROM REV. W. C. GANNETT, ROCHESTER, N.Y.

I have no contribution—would I had!—for your Register of honor to Martineau, unless I may simply call attention to a little Martineau anthology prepared some years ago by C. G. Howland of Lawrence, Kan. I suspect it is the best, if not the only selection of great passages yet made from Martineau. The very cheapness of its form, perhaps, has tended to keep it in obscurity; for it is published simply as a tract in the "Unity Mission" series of Chicago (175 Dearborn Street), and costs but 5 cents; for ten copies, only half that rate. Yet the six-and-twenty pages contain as much as many a publisher would put into a book of thrice that number of pages and ten times the price. The extracts are not sentences, but short passages, good for the "Daily Strength" reading,—many of them good for pulpit readings. They are gleaned, not from the critical or the purely philosophical writings of Martineau, but mainly from his books of religious thought and endeavor. The preparation was a labor of careful and devoted love on Mr. Howland's part; and the little work, so great in contents and so well put together, certainly deserves to find love.

TO JAMES MARTINEAU.

In thee a life akin to Christ appears,—

DR. MARTINEAU IN HIS SUMMER HOME:
AN AMERICAN GIRL'S EXPERIENCE.

"See Dr. Martineau rather than the queen," wrote my mother. So I was delighted when my letter of introduction reached him, and he replied with a most cordial invitation to spend a day with him in his Highland cottage. Aviemore is in a wild, romantic, and beautiful nook among the hills, several hours from Inverness. No wonder that the philosopher loves his summer home so devotedly, and likes to entertain his friends there rather than in the city.

Although the morning was showery, Dr. Martineau himself met the train, with his son and daughter-in-law. His beautiful face, with the heavy crown of white hair, impressed me greatly, as I saw him sitting in the carriage. And what a welcome he gave me! A princess could not have been received with sweeter cordiality. The drive to the cottage was beautiful. The rain had stopped, and the sun shone through the Scotch clouds. I sat on the back seat of the beach-wagon with the good Doctor, who entertained me with quaint anecdotes of the countryside, showed me how the river had risen, told me about the young laird's trees that can never be cut down, and pointed out the places he loved best.

A little cottage on a hilltop, with roses and vines and posy-beds about it, was our charming destination. Dr. Martineau's daughters welcomed me with great cordiality. The rooms were simple and tiny, but artistic, comfortable, and, above all, homelike. While we lunched in the quaint dining-room, Dr. Martineau, who did not eat at that hour, sat at the open window, and chatted with us. He had many questions to ask about his friends in America, and about my own plans as an American girl. It delighted him to know that my profession was chosen. He seemed to think American girls pretty sensible.

After lunch we went all over the house. If the study had belonged to any one else, I should have thought it had been put in order for the occasion, for never was a room more immaculate: every book, every paper, and magazine on the table kept its own precise angle. The desk looked as if it had never been used, and yet Dr. Martineau had been writing all the morning; and his daughters assured me that nothing was ever even momentarily out of order. I wondered at his admitting an American whirlwind to this sanctum; but he seemed to enjoy it, and talked with pleasure about the pictures, most of which were painted by his daughters, and were sketches of their favorite haunts in the hills. He took great pride in the beautiful wood-carving with which the house was decorated, which was also his daughters' work. It is an ideally quiet, happy home, and a devoted family. They nearly worship the father. And how could they help it?

When the carriage came to the door, Miss Martineau walked with us through the pretty garden; and we gathered flowers still wet with the rain. At the bend of the road we looked back; and there in the open doorway, with the vines about him, stood Dr. Martineau, smiling farewell.

XXXIII.

FROM REV. JOHN CUCKSON, PASTOR OF ARLINGTON STREET CHURCH, BOSTON.

It is not often that any man is permitted to win a reputation for learning, philosophic depth, and keen spiritual insight quite early in life, and to hold that reputation not only unimpaired and unsullied, but increasingly augmented, for more than half a century. That distinction belongs to the venerable Dr. Martineau.

In the beginning of his active ministry in Liverpool he shared with his lifelong friends and coadjutors, Revs. J. J. Tayler, J. H. Thom, and Charles Wicksteed, the honor of advancing the cause of free learning in theology; and he was counted among the forces to be reckoned with in the field of religious thought. He carried the promise of greatness in his early manhood. Before me, as I write, is a rare steel engraving of the man of forty-five or thereabout, given to me by his old friend, Henry Arthur Bright, and which I value as one of my choicest treasures. It bears on every feature the traces of latent power and refinement, and betrays even in its cold lines the intellectual beauty which his gifted sister recognized and appreciated with becoming pride. He was then known as the prophet of a more spiritual Christianity in the group of English churches bearing the Unitarian name,—a type of religious thought as distinct from the arid materialism of Price and Belsham and Priestley as from the dogmatic evangelicalism of the older schools of theology. He was also a preacher of surpassing power and grace. His forcible message, clothed in the richest imagery of seer and poet, was eagerly listened to, not by a curious crowd, but by a select company of the cultured disciples of the rising faith, many of whom were destined to carry the teachings of their minister into the arena of public life. The two small volumes of "Endeavors after the Christian Life," so remarkable for their prophetic clearness and poetic beauty of expression, became the text-books of faith and piety in all the churches, and particularly among candidates for the Christian ministry. They were the almost daily companions of the devout, the comfort and strength and yet at the same time the despair of the clerical neophyte of every denomination.

Later on, when he became principal of Manchester New College in London, a position for which his genius and learning especially fitted him, his career broadened and he entered upon the noblest work of his life,—a work for which thousands have risen up to call him blessed. How well I remember the profound reverence felt for him thirty years ago, and with what envy I looked upon the men who were permitted daily to sit at his feet, while nothing was left for me but to borrow verbatim reports of his lectures in manuscript volumes, and select almost by unaided instinct his characteristic articles in the Westminster, National, Prospective, and other reviews! Many a time did I finish my college work early in the evening, that I might sit through the greater part of the night reading, with an interest no other books could create at that moment, his masterly handling of the scepticisms of the day. Many young men, like myself, were almost swept from their feet by the rising tide of what at its best was agnosticism, and at its worst atheism. We were driven hither and thither by every wind of doctrine, and were glad to get hold of a sturdy pilot to help us into some secure haven. Like young athletes, we grappled with the biggest things we could find, such as Buckle's "History of Civilization," Sir William Hamilton's "Metaphysics," Mill's "Logic," Mansel's "Limits of Religious Thought," Martineau and Atkinson's "Letters on Man's Nature and Development," Spencer's "First Principles," Tyndall's Lectures, and Huxley's Addresses; and it was not surprising that we often found ourselves thrown in the conflicts of faith. Still, we had abandoned traditional authority in religion; and, perplexed as we were for the moment, we were bound to find safe anchorage somewhere or suffer an eclipse of faith. It was at this crisis in our mental history that Dr. Martineau came to our aid. He won our absolute confidence. We trusted his learning, his mental grasp of difficulties excited our wonder, his reverent piety captivated our hearts; and, no sooner did some striking book appear that gave us cause for alarm, than we wondered when and how the redoubtable champion of our faith was going to deal with it. We had not to wait long. The battle of the giants soon commenced, and no Harvard or Yale Freshman watched with intenser eagerness the struggles of his Alma Mater on the field at Springfield or on the Thames at New London than did we the strokes and counter-strokes of our invincible hero. Again and again have I gone over those old battle-fields of faith in later years, but never with the same keen zest as when I felt that the combatants were fighting for the citadel of truth, and knew that not a little of what was most precious to myself hung trembling upon the issue.

"Wisdom reserves its calm applause
For victors in the worthier fight,
The struggle for the better light,
The higher aim, the larger cause."

So much for the conflicts of faith in which Dr. Martineau came off victorious. What shall I say of the wonderful results of later years? The positions won in manhood's prime have been fortified and entrenched and buttressed in old age, and rendered in all important respects impregnable. The volumes of an octogenarian—"Types of Ethical Theory," "A Study of Religion," and "The Seat of Authority in Religion"—give evidence of an eye undimmed and of a natural strength unabated. How poor and profitless even many a fruitful life appears by the side of this veteran of whom we are all so proud! It is impossible to count up the volumes of his books without thinking of the arduous and persistent labor which has gone into them, the painstaking and profound research, the years of wrestling with problems which yielded to his patient questioning, and, more than all, the rigid self-discipline which has put the grace of the saint into the genius of the philosopher. "It was," says Dr. Martineau—and I am sure he will forgive me for quoting so much from a letter written to me in 1885—"a kind of necessity with me, under favor or disfavor, to bear witness to what affects me as a divine order of the world, and the secret of all that is sacred and hopeful in human life. And, if only in a few responding minds the volumes help to awaken or sustain the higher faiths for revival when the wave of materialism and pessimism shall be overpast, they will fulfil my utmost wish. . . . I often fear, however, that I have presumed too long on the gentle treatment which I have received at the hands of old age, and that I must expect the slackened pace of my remaining diligence to cease before I reach the contemplated goal. It matters not! Life itself is but a fragment; and why should one insist on rounding off its work?" Much to our delight and satisfaction, the fear of ten years ago proved groundless: the work of a laborious life has been rounded off most beautifully, the last finishing touches of a noble old age have been given to the brave projects of maturity, and the most valiant defender of the faith in this century may console and comfort himself at ninety with the love and gratitude of thousands, who feel that "Time is champion of Truth,

And love of Truth has firm upborne
This fighter 'gainst the doubt and scorn
Of callous age, of cynic youth.

"And time, sure-footed Nemesis
Of fear and falsehood and unfaith,
Has left Truth's witness free from scathe
Of hatred's howl or envy's hiss.

"And he stands Victor! That is naught
To one who looks beyond the day,
Nor cares to join the blatant bray
Of triumph o'er the foes he fought."

XXXIV.

FROM REV. THOMAS R. SLICER, MINISTER OF THE CHURCH OF OUR FATHER, BUFFALO, N.Y.

The debt which the students of religion owe to Dr. Martineau has much in all cases in common; but to myself the earliest acquaintance with his mind brought a distinct contribution, which made all my life different, as the first sweet breath of spring to-day is not the summer, but the summer's herald. I was fulfilling, as best I could, between the incentives of zeal and the limitations of inexperience, the duties of a young itinerant preacher in the country circuit of my second year in the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Maryland, when a friend whose horizon was wider than my own sent me "Endeavors after the Christian Life," by James Martineau. The book had been first read and marked by my friend, and was received by myself with the trust, which makes friendship life's holy communion.

I read it, at first held by the exquisite charm of expression, then thrilled by its call to the deep places of the heart. Then my surprise grew with the discovery that for the first time in my life I was face to face with religion without dogma. I had seen in my own home my father and mother religious in the deepest and most natural way; but my mother was religious without expression, and my father had impressed me with the robustness and naturalness of his religious common sense. But even in this sweetest home atmosphere, and in the profound religious earnestness of that Baltimore type of Methodism, it was always the Methodism which seemed to me to have been inspired of God, provided by heaven, and set up in the earth particularly for the benefit of the Baltimore people. For it is a curious fact that at that time, now remote nearly thirty years, the old Baltimore families were, for the most part, either Roman Catholic or Methodist. There was the primacy of the Catholic Church in America and the mother church of Methodism. So that I had always supposed religion must be expressed in terms of belief according to the church of my childhood; and, when I encountered in this volume of Martineau religion without dogma,—religion as an experience of the human spirit, in which the soul and its Father, God, were shut up together, and were alone without loneliness,—it was in the nature of a spiritual discovery. And I remember taking the book out into the family circle where I made my home,—a family very sincere and devout,—and saying, "Hear this," "and this," reading passage after passage, as from a newly discovered scripture of some prophet left out of the Bible by mistake. I am confident that those luminous pages had much to do with lighting my path when, a few years later, I discovered that my whole doctrinal training had been by traditions which could not be verified either by church history or the uncorrupted teaching of Jesus Christ. It would have been a dark world to me in those bitter days if I had not found one man, and been by him led to others, to whom it was true "that the souls of the sons of God are greater than their business; . . . for he hath not put us in this world so much to do a certain work as to be a certain thing!"

I told Dr. Martineau this, and some other phases of that acquaintance with his seer-like spirit, when in later years I had the honor of correspondence with him, and as, in 1876, I made my, to me, eventful pilgrimage to his home in London, to see face to face the man who has always seemed to me to vindicate the claim that the test of a religion is whether it makes scriptures which are inspired because they inspire.

I am profoundly indebted to my knowledge of this teacher of religion,—more indebted than this brief record of its beginning can convey. He seems to me to know the facts of experience which lie at the foundations of personal religion, and to convey them in terms as lofty in their expression as they are deep in their inspiration. Feeling this, I have used "The Seat of Authority in Religion" with a study class, with the most marked results as to spiritual illumination in the students. I have heard an advanced class in one of our universities discuss with absorbing interest his "Study of Religion." Dr. Martineau has been the teacher of the teachers, and I beg to pay this insufficient tribute to the guidance which my ministry has had at his hand.

XXXV.

FROM REV. FRANK L. PHALEN, OF SECOND
CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF CONCORD, N.H.

Among my most precious treasures is a letter from Dr. Martineau, which he wrote me in 1889. There is one paragraph in it which I love to recall on his ninetieth birthday. It is this: "It is a very simple thing to report one's own experience and place it at disposal for one's companions and successors. It is all that I can do; and no greater blessing can crown the closing years of this life than the consoling discovery that, in spite of grievous shortcomings, one's work has not been altogether in vain."

Dr. Martineau has been of greater help to me in the intellectual and spiritual life than any other philosopher, ancient or modern.

XXXVI.

FROM REV. EDWARD A. HORTON, BOSTON,
MASS.

Nothing could be in better taste and justice than to commemorate this event. The preachers and leaders of a high and helpful faith are indebted to Dr. Martineau for inspiration and guidance through this nineteenth century. He has stood faithfully for certain great tendencies in our profession constantly in danger of injury,—tendencies essential in every way to the success of our work, and requiring loyal guardianship. For this special service to the clerical ranks I would offer my tribute, not failing, however, to remember in how many other channels he has served his day and generation. If there is space, my points can well be enforced by brief quotations.

1. Dr. Martineau has continually enforced the truth of evolution in the individual and the community in a high spiritual interpretation. This is a key-note: "Those to whom life is a succession of particular businesses, however intelligent, energetic, conscientious, must rank in the scale of human excellence below those to whom life is rather the flow of one spirit."

2. Our leader has also undeviatingly proclaimed the fulfilling character of religion with science. One sentence sums up his attitude in philosophy and preaching: "What science calls the uniformity of nature, faith accepts as the fidelity of God."

3. Dr. Martineau, in sermons and essays, has never failed to emphasize the value and superior rank of human nature amidst the marvellous array of laws and forces. He has said: "He to whom space is the seed-plot of stars has in the human soul a tillage more lustrous in the sowing and more enduring than fruits. When he flings a handful of moral endowments into the furrows of our nature, he never withholds the mellowing winds and dews."

4. Both in youth and now in advanced age he has been progressive, assimilating in his view of life suggestions from all sources. It is from him that we obtain the following expressive utterance: "It is an old problem to determine characters which most clearly distinguish man from the other tribes which share with him the occupancy of this world. I will venture to add one to the many answers it has received: he can tell what o'clock it is."

5. Another guiding principle has been illustrated in him with conspicuous force,—the constant need of clothing philosophy, pure and simple, with the living personality of rational Christianity. This is well expressed as follows: "When philosophy gives an account of the human soul, it can find only constitutional propensities and voluntary acquisitions. When we interrogate Christianity, we are told, besides, of communicated sanctities."

Dr. Martineau has often been called, and truly so, "a preacher to preachers." What we owe to him in this respect cannot be fully told. I gladly offer him my personal, thankful acknowledgment for the refining and spiritualizing influence which his thought and example have bestowed upon me.

XXXVII.

FROM REV. R. HEBER NEWTON, D.D., OF ALL SOULS' CHURCH, NEW YORK.

There is no time now, on a Saturday, to do more than simply say how profound is my own personal indebtedness to this Nestor of theology for the strengthening of my faith in days when doubt has darkened the horizon, for the broadening of my outlook on the great problems of religion, and for the quickening of the spiritual life within me through long years in which I have turned to him for deep inspirations. In this last service I have found his sermons of inestimable value. Above any others known to me, they lift my soul in that worship which he rightly regards the supreme fruition of every true sermon. Surely, his last days on earth are attended by "troops of friends" who in spirit wait in reverence upon him.

XXXVIII.

FROM REV. FREDERICK B. MOTT, EDITOR OF THE "UNITARIAN."

We join in the heartiest birthday greeting to Dr. Martineau, who has given us the formula of a philosophy that satisfies our faith; who has shown us that, with an infinite Ally, the battle of righteousness can never lose hope; who has quickened for us the deep and passionate emotion of religious enthusiasm; who has initiated us into our divine personal relationship with the living God, and made us understand that the seat of authority is in that conscious union.

On this his ninetieth birthday we rejoice that he still remains to us, "transfigured with the light flashing from the contact of two worlds."

XXXIX.

FROM REV. SAMUEL C. BEANE, FIRST RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF NEWBURYPORT, MASS.

The birthday of Dr. Martineau is a happy occasion for acknowledging my cumulative and incalculable debt to him, beginning with the early days of theological study, when "Endeavors after the Christian Life" opened to me insights and outlooks of which, under my Calvinistic training, I had never dreamed, and increasing with the reading and rereading of every book which he has written. During my thirty years in the ministry he has been my constant teacher and strengthener and light-bringer.

No man in this century—and it is no disparagement of Channing or Parker or Emerson or Francis Newman or the poets to say this—has done so much as Dr. Martineau to enable young men to trust their spiritual natures, and to found their convictions on the word of God in man and in the spiritual progress of the race under divine Providence. Surely, no one in our day has contributed so valuably to a philosophy of faith which shall convert the moods and impulses and speculations of religion into a stable and tranquil power! From the growing interest in his writings in nearly all directions, we may well believe that his influence, at ninety years, is in its early beginning.

XL.

FROM REV. E. L. REXFORD, PASTOR OF THE UNIVERSALIST CHURCH, COLUMBUS, OHIO.

There is to me a grateful pleasure in writing an appreciative word of a man to whom I owe so much as I do to James Martineau. He gave me my first real insight into the great meanings of religion, as Max Müller gave me my first vision of its wide expanse. These two men together must create the noble sense of the depth and subtlety and the expansive quality of religion. Dr. Martineau, in his "Endeavors after the Christian Life," led me to the inexhaustible fountains of religion; and it was such an enchantment to linger in those regions, where everything in nature and life seemed ordained to holy purposes! Religion as interpreted by him seemed the one supreme fascination of existence. I have always felt a deep and permanent obligation to him; and I have often said, in reading his pages, that, if we would rid the world of a flippant and mocking scepticism, let us induce it to do some noble thinking, and the task is accomplished.

In reading his "Seat of Authority in Religion," I could not at first identify the author with the James Martineau of the "Endeavors"; but a second reading disclosed the necessity of such a book, and its appearance from the same pen was a delightful consistency. "The Seat of Authority in Religion" is work required in behalf of that spiritual freedom with which all of Dr. Martineau's earlier writings are so instinct. This later work removes the false barriers which an arbitrary and mechanical type of religious interpretation and administration has reared about the divinely free spirit, leaving it free to worship the infinite Life. It is a restoration of the soul of man to primary relations, and so it renders an invaluable service to the interests of a true religious life. Would that we could renew the earlier years of this great teacher of men! But his work will ever have the spirit of the undying life.

XLI.

FROM CHARLES CARROLL EVERETT, D.D., LL.D., PROFESSOR IN HARVARD UNIVERSITY AND DEAN OF THE DIVINITY SCHOOL.

An analysis of Dr. Martineau's spiritual nature shows it to be made up of what would seem to be contradictory elements. He is a keen logician, with imagination enough to endow half a dozen ordinary poets, and religious fervor enough to endow a far greater number of ordinary Christians. His thought is "radical," while his spirit is that of a "conservatist." He is courtesy itself, while he is boldly outspoken in his loyalty to truth, or while his merciless dialectic allows his opponent no quarter. These divergent elements, however, so enter into the unity of his nature that we have to separate them artificially for our thought, as we separate the colors of the solar spectrum.

It was my good fortune to be in Oxford at the time of the opening of Manchester College, and one of the pleasantest of the many pleasant things that I enjoyed there was the opportunity of meeting Dr. Martineau. I heard him make, on a rare occasion, an address which illustrated in a striking manner some of the characteristics to which I have referred. It was at a luncheon given in behalf of the college. Several representatives of the university were present, and greeted the newly arrived institution with great cordiality. One distinguished theologian said, in effect, that he welcomed it, not because it brought anything new, but because it came in the spirit of the university itself. It could, he said, bring no religious freedom greater than it would find already recognized at Oxford. This saying, though pleasing from its liberality, was yet a little trying to the friends of the college, who were sure that they had done something more than bring coals to Newcastle. There seemed, however, nothing to be said or done about it. Then Dr. Martineau arose, and in a speech sweet and dignified, utterly courteous, yet uncompromising in its truth, showed the limits within which freedom is still confined at Oxford. It was such a speech as none but he could have made. When he sat down, there was a double sense of thankfulness in the hearts of the friends of the school,—thankfulness that he had made a reply when reply seemed to be impossible, and thankfulness that no one else had attempted the perilous task.

Dr. Martineau is the recognized leader of the most advanced religious thought of Christendom; but it is to the strong and gracious personality of the man, no less than to the bold and clear thinker, that so many turn to-day in thankful reverence.

XLII.

FROM REV. JOSEPH N. HALLOCK, EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN WORK."

It is not often that one gets a chance to congratulate a good man on his ninetieth birthday, and it is a great deal less often that a good man gets a chance to be thus congratulated. This may sound rather illogical; but it will be found, upon examination, to be strictly orthodox. And, as such, it must, of course, be strictly logical also. My acquaintance with Dr. James Martineau is second-hand, but not, perhaps, on that account less real,—at least not to me. Twenty-five years ago I had the privilege for many months of attending bi-weekly meetings in this city by Dr. Henry W. Bellows and several other distinguished pillars of the Unitarian faith. It was then and there that I learned to respect and love the name of our scholarly English brother, who is now about to receive the congratulations of his American friends upon his ninetieth birthday. At that time his sister Harriet, who was, I think, a few years his senior, had risen to the zenith of her great popularity. Her books were widely read, and her literary productions to the newspapers of the day seemed almost unlimited. The present generation who speak of "Martineau's writings" must not mistake the productions of the sister for those of the brother, as I notice sometimes happens at this late day. The two minds worked as differently in their methods as is possible for any two authors who, practically, were of the same faith. The writings of the sister always seemed to me illogical, and in many cases almost frivolous, albeit they were exceedingly popular and taking for their brightness and vivacity. The productions of James Martineau, although far from being heavy, were always philosophical and scholarly, strictly logical, as well as metaphysical and theological. Rev. William T. Clarke, who at the time of which I speak was editor of the Liberal Christian,—itself a successor of the old Christian Inquirer, and which, as you remember, was finally merged into your own able journal,—used to say that the four greatest thinkers of the day were the two American H. W. B.'s* and Drs. Martineau and Newman of England. Since the death of Cardinal Newman Dr. Martineau has certainly been the most conspicuous figure in theological and religious thought in Great Britain. He looms up above others in this field, as Gladstone does in the field of statesmanship; and his writings have always had the genuine ring of truth in them, taking sharp and decisive issue against the negative tendencies of materialism and scepticism, although not in the interests of creeds or dogmas of any particular religious belief or sect.

XLIII.

FROM E. H. CAPEN, LL.D., PRESIDENT OF TUFTS COLLEGE.

The philosophical and religious world, with one consent, should say, "All hail!" on the ninetieth birthday of James Martineau. No man of the English-speaking race during this century has rendered a more distinct and grander service in both these departments of thought than he. For no one has been more successful than he in bringing out the spiritual elements of philosophy; and, certainly, no one has done more toward establishing the rationality of religion. Indeed, largely through his clear insight and wonderful power of expression these two fields of thought, which in times past have been so widely separated, have come very nearly together, and are now almost identical. What a privilege to have lived through a great period of controversy, and now in his old age to enjoy the fruits of his own efforts! The world is immeasurably richer for such a life.

XLIV.

FROM REV. LEIGHTON PARKS, RECTOR OF EMANUEL CHURCH, BOSTON.

I thank you for the opportunity to express publicly my debt to the writings of Dr. Martineau. To ask, as your letter does, to have some particular aspect of this noble man's work pointed out, is like asking to have that particular feature in a noble face pointed out which gives character to all. This cannot be done, because each feature must be judged in relation to all the others. Yet one cannot go far wrong in saying that a wonderful combination of tenderness and strength is what makes Martineau's works inspiring and strengthening. His devotional writings are reverent, but not slavish. He loves the Lord his God with his mind. His philosophical essays—which are, perhaps, his finest work—are a wonderful mingling of severe analysis and eloquent pleading. Of the philosophical essays, the one on "Nature and God" is, to my mind, the greatest.

* H. W. Beecher and H. W. Bellows.

"Force the effect of volition," "volition at the disposal of character," God "immanent in nature,"—yes, with that we are all very familiar to-day; "but his real life is known only beyond nature." How characteristic these sentences are, and how the thoughts which they express form the woof and warp of his philosophic thought, every student of Martineau's writings knows.

Let me, in closing, call attention to this pregnant sentence, which, though taken almost at random from "Nature and God," is a perfect specimen of his best style: "There are two kinds of union with God,—dynamic and moral. Moral union requires dynamic separation, which accordingly widens as we ascend in the scale of being, till a true self, a free personality, appears, sufficiently beyond the verge of nature to give an answering look to the very face of the Most High. . . . And so the dynamic removal finds its end in moral unity." Compare this with the lines from "Christmas Eve":—

... "God, whose pleasure brought Man into being, stands away, As it were, a handbreadth off, to give Room for the newly made to live, And look at him from a place apart, And use his gifts of brain and heart, Given, indeed, but to keep forever.

Man, therefore, stands on his own stock Of love and power as a pin-point rock, And, looking to God, who ordained divorce Of the rock from his boundless continent, Sees, in his power made evident, Only excess by a million-fold O'er the power God gave man in the mould."

The immanence of the Transcendent is the fundamental thought of the philosophy alike of Martineau and Browning. May we not say of Christian philosophy?

XLV.

FROM REV. S. W. BUSH, BOSTON.

It is a great pleasure to join with the host of Dr. Martineau's American friends in congratulations on his ninetieth birthday. This pleasure is increased by the feeling of gratitude for what he has personally been to me. No writer now living has done so much in shaping my thought and quickening my spirit as Dr. Martineau. Nearly fifty years ago, as a theological student, amid the doubts and perplexities of a transitional period, and face to face with the vital problems bearing on the very foundations of religion, his words brought light and conviction. After the graduate had entered the active ministry, when new problems arose, he found again, in Dr. Martineau's later writings, guidance and inspiration. His words were rich with the wisdom of the sage, the vision of the seer, and the spiritual trust and reverence of the devotee. Leaving to others to dwell more in detail on the value and character of his writings, I wish simply to emphasize my gratitude for what he has done for me. May his life be prolonged, so that we may have the benefit of his ripest thought! When, however, there comes the earthly close, in the fulness of years and great service, we have the confident faith that the afterglow will be followed by still nobler growths of the spirit.

XLVI.

FROM JOSEPH HENRY THAYER, PROFESSOR OF NEW TESTAMENT CRITICISM IN HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

Of all Dr. Martineau's writings, his "Study of Religion" seems to me to be the most valuable. It furnishes a vindication as powerful as it is timely of "the intuition of Causality as the ground of natural phenomena, and that of Right as the ground of moral,—the one planting the intellect and the other the conscience face to face with the eternal Source of wisdom and righteousness." His defence of the principle of the so-called "Argument from Design" and his discussion of the "Problem of Evil" are acute, dispassionate, conclusive, and set in a style so clear as to be positively brilliant, so earnest that it is eloquent. The volumes abound in "jewels five words long." Again and again an extended discussion is condensed into a single sentence that brands itself upon the memory. Witness this reply to flippant scepticism respecting premonitions of penalty in the life to come: "If death gives final discharge alike to the sinner and the saint, we are warranted in saying that conscience has told more lies than it has ever called to their account."

XLVII.

FROM REV. CAROLINE J. BARTLETT, PASTOR OF THE PEOPLE'S CHURCH, KALAMAZOO, MICH.

I am profoundly grateful for the privilege of joining my voice in that chorus of reverent affection and gratitude which rises from the hearts of thousands blessed by the world-wide ministry of Dr. Martineau. And my private heart cannot forbear to speak its special joy that, having been for one red-letter day a guest in his Highland home, his voice and glance and the kindly pressure of his hand forever vivify the printed words that are a great part of the real inspiration of my life.

XLVIII.

FROM REV. T. G. MILSTED, OF CHICAGO, ILL.

I preached this morning from the text, "I am come to fulfil." I was glad to be able to point to James Martineau as an example of the fulfilment of all that is good and true and noble in human life,—his long life, filled with high attainments and achievements, great endeavors realized; at fourscore years and ten, not "sans everything," but still with everything that makes life worth living; at that advanced age, the years not filled with trouble and sorrow, but, by reason of the fulfilment of every physical, mental, and spiritual possibility, filled with peace and joy, and crowned with the glory of a beautiful old age. Mr. Martineau's life shows, I think, what the Creator meant for man,—bodily powers and faculties of mind preserved to a ripe old age, and the spirit supreme over all, lighting the earthly and the temporal with rays of the heavenly and eternal. Such existence never becomes a burden: it is a priceless blessing to the soul that enjoys it, and is an inspiration and a benediction to the world.

XLIX.

FROM GREENFIELD, MASS.

Rev. Arthur Anderson Brooks writes,—

Our congregation, by a rising vote, to-day joined in the following greeting to Dr. Martineau:—

"We, worshippers in All Souls' Church in Greenfield, Mass., U.S.A., do cordially extend to Dr. James Martineau our congratulations on this his ninetieth birthday. As members of a Unitarian congregation, we are glad to claim and to honor him as a fellow-believer. As seekers after the higher life, it is a source of inspiration to us to have the leadership and companionship of his strong soul. As children of the common heavenly Father, we rejoice in the great work which, by the grace of God, he has been permitted to do throughout a long life, in establishing the spiritual kingdom of God on earth."

FROM MEADVILLE.

The following communication was sent to Dr. Martineau from the faculty of the Meadville Theological School:—

Dear Sir,—The faculty of the Meadville Theological School take note of the near approach of your ninetieth anniversary. Moved by the affection due to a revered teacher and father, we send you our greeting and congratulation.

At this distance, we cannot know of your personal estate; but, from such tidings as we have of you, it is our happy privilege to think of you as in vigorous health. But, however this may be, and though infirmity be upon you, we cannot but count you happy. The large place you have gained in the admiration and reverence of your fellow-men, the great and noble work you look back upon, and the serene faith with which you look forward, must together yield a satisfaction which age and pain cannot eclipse.

We rejoice that you are still with us: we are richer for your life. And, so testifying, reverend and revered sir, we subscribe ourselves,

Affectionately and gratefully,
[Signed by the Faculty.]

Briefer Tributes.

We make the following extracts from personal letters received from friends who were unable to write at length, yet who could not resist expressing their appreciation of Dr. Martineau:—

W. W. GOODWIN, Professor of Greek, Cambridge.—I am very glad that you are to devote a number to the celebration of the ninetieth birthday of one whom I so much respect, and who is entitled to be commemorated by all who are interested in freedom of religious thought.

MRS. EDNAH D. CHENEY, Boston.—I shall read with interest the tributes of respect to Mr. James Martineau for his brave, upright character, his clear thought, and his beautiful scholarship.

WILLIAM J. TUCKER, LL.D., President of Dartmouth College.—I have more than a respect for Dr. Martineau: I recognize a personal indebtedness to him. No writer within my knowledge has combined more reverence, breadth, and accuracy in thought and style.

REV. S. E. HERRICK, Boston.—There are few other men who have done as much for me by their writings as Dr. Martineau.

REV. JOHN P. NEWMAN, D.D., Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church.—As thinker, author, and preacher, Dr. Martineau represents the ethical side of Christianity.

REV. J. M. BUCKLEY, D.D., Editor Christian Advocate.—Dr. Martineau's writings have always had a peculiar interest for me, owing to his extraordinarily interesting style and discrimination in the use of language as well as the freshness of his thought.

REV. J. H. ALLEN, D.D., Cambridge.—Dr. Martineau's lovely courtesies and hospitalities have filled me almost as much with surprise as with gratitude. It is forty years next month since I made his acquaintance, and fifty-nine since I began to study him. So you can see how large a part of the higher privileges of my life have been due to him.

REV. O. B. FROTHINGHAM.—I should be glad to pay my tribute to Dr. Martineau, whom I deeply love and honor; but I cannot [on account of illness].

REV. H. L. WAYLAND, Editor of the Examiner.—I have a very great reverence for the ability and character of Dr. Martineau.

J. G. SCHURMAN, LL.D., President of Cornell University.—I regret my inability, especially as I was a pupil of Dr. Martineau's in London, as I have the highest appreciation of his philosophical services, and as I have never met a man in whose expression one read at a glance such a harmonious combination of truth, beauty, and goodness of character.

Religious Intelligence.

FOR Sunday-school announcements see page 15.

THE last meeting for the season of the South Middlesex Branches of the Women's Alliance will be held at the Unitarian Building on Thursday, May 2, at twelve o'clock.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. Albert Lazenby of Glasgow will preach April 28. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

The Ministerial Union will meet in Channing Hall Monday, April 29, at 10.30 A.M. Rev. C. C. Carpenter will give the address. Subject, "Concerning Our Message." The public is invited.

Rev. C. D. Bradlee, D.D., has consented to render such pastoral services as may be needed in All Souls' Church, Boston, during the absence of Rev. W. H. Lyon. These services Rev. Dr. Bradlee stands ready to perform in addition to his responsibilities to his own—Christ Church—in Longwood.

ATHOL, MASS.—Rev. C. G. Horst has accepted the call extended to him by the Second Church in Athol. He will begin his work June 1, and will find people to welcome him gladly and work with him earnestly.

CHELSEA, REVERE, BEACHMONT, WINTHROP, MASS.—Rev. Messrs. De Normandie, Dole, Fisk, and Brooke began with much success their circuit tour of Sunday evening meetings in those pulpits.

DOVER, N.H.—Services in Dover are again held regularly every Sunday. Some of our able preachers are preaching there until such time as the parish, in connection with the Association, shall find the right man to carry on the work permanently.

DEDHAM, MASS.—The First Parish Club, which has a membership of sixty-five men, celebrated "Ladies' Night" in the vestry of the church Wednesday evening, April 17. A bountiful supper was followed by music from the Norfolk Mandolin and Guitar Club, after which the members and guests present listened to an exceedingly able and interesting address from Rev. John C. Kimball of Hartford on "Social Progress in the Light of Evolution." The club has attained a success which was hardly anticipated when it was founded a year ago last winter, and this was certainly one of its best meetings. Mr. Herman W. Chaplin is president, and Mr. Winslow Warren vice-president.

FARMINGTON, ME.—The interest in liberal services in this town continues unabated. Rev. W. H. Ramsay was commissioned to work in this field for a month, in order to keep up the interest and gather the people together. He did this only too well; for the people would not let him go, and appealed to the Association to assist them in retaining him as a permanent pastor. Mr. Ramsay has consented to continue with them for two years, and about the end of the present month ministers in Maine will assist him and the church in a recognition service. The outlook for Farmington has never been better.

MADISON, WIS.—The card calendar of the Unitarian church, of which Rev. W. D. Simonds is pastor, announces a series of five discourses treating of religion and life as affected by modern science. Rev. H. T. Secrist of Milwaukee preached here on April 21.

NEW YORK, N.Y.—The fiftieth anniversary of the Temple Emanu-El has been celebrated by a three days' jubilee, and no effort was spared to make the event a memorable one. The address by Dr. Gottheil enumerated the causes of their joy as, first, the firmness with which the principles of "reform, enlightenment, progress, the widening and deepening of the moral sense, and the expansion of the principles of the ancient faith" have been held; second, the continued devotion to Judaism; third, their toleration and faith; and, lastly, their obligation to labor still in the cause of humanity. The children's festival, which closed the festivities, was very impressive. Rev. J. W. Chadwick preached in the Spring Garden Church April 21, in exchange with Mr. Nichols.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.—The church in Pittsfield has extended a call to Rev. J. H. Müller of Bloomington, Ill. Mr. Müller has already done excellent work in Berkshire County, and is so favorably known to the people in that section that his acceptance of the call will be hailed with delight.

ROXBURY, MASS.—All Souls' Church: Rev. Ellery C. Butler of Quincy will preach Sunday, April 28. Service at 10.30 A.M.

SOUTH NATICK, MASS.—The next meeting of the "Ministers' League for Practical Work" will be held at 25 Beacon Street on Monday, April 29, at 1.30 P.M. Rev. C. F. Dole will be present to talk about "The Need of a Gospel in Rural New England." Also, the matter of planning for platform meetings and a lecture bureau will be up for discussion.

WILLIMANTIC, CONN.—A very successful movement is in progress here. About a month ago Rev. S. R. Free of Chattanooga, Tenn., who came on to attend a funeral service, was invited to preach in the opera house. More than a thousand people came out to pay respects to their old minister, and to show their interest in liberal Christianity. This was too strong an indication of the interest of many in Unitarianism to pass unnoticed. Rev. Alfred Free, secretary of the Connecticut Valley Conference, invited the people to come together again with deliberate intention of organizing a church. He had a congregation of about two hundred and fifty. The superintendent for New England has preached there for the last two Sundays, and the movement grows in strength. Rev. S. R. Free, who withdrew from the Trinitarian Congregational church at Willimantic to take charge of a Unitarian parish, is greatly desired by the people in that city. He has consented to come on and take charge of the movement; and, without doubt, we shall have here immediately a strong and vigorous Unitarian society.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.—The Southern Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches will be held in the First Independent Christ's Church in Baltimore, Md., April 30 and May 1 and 2. The conference sermon will be preached by Rev. John Cuckson of Boston, Mass., on Tuesday evening, April 30. On Wednesday forenoon, after the business meeting of the conference, Mr. George W. Stone of Wilmington, Del., will give an address on "Church Extension, especially at the South." On Wednesday evening Hon. Carroll D. Wright of Washington will read a paper on "The Industrial South," to be followed by addresses by Rev. C. J. K. Jones of Louisville, Rev. George L. Chaney, and others. On Thursday there will be day and night meetings; and addresses will be made by Messrs. Snyder of St. Louis, Thayer of Cincinnati, Weld of Baltimore, Whitman of Charleston, Peirce of New Orleans, Cole of Atlanta, Westall of Asheville, Clare of Memphis, and others. Secretary Batchelor is expected to be present, and Rev. R. R. Shippen of Washington. Mr. Joseph Marion Seaton of Richmond, Va., will be ordained to the ministry. On Wednesday afternoon a meeting of the Southern Associate Alliance will be held, presided over by its president, Mrs. George L. Chaney. The meeting will be addressed by Mrs. E. A. Fifield of Boston and other ladies of the Alliance Branches. It is hoped that friends of the Unitarian cause from all over the country will attend this conference.

NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCES.—An endeavor is being made to arrange the meetings of New England Conferences so that no two or more of them shall be held on the same day. It has proved somewhat difficult to accomplish this at present in an entirely satisfactory manner, but the following improved result has been reached: Plymouth and Bay, May 8 and 9, at Plymouth; Essex, May 14 and 15, at Newburyport; Worcester, May 15 and 16, at Hudson; Connecticut Valley, June 5 and 6, at Florence, Mass.; South Middlesex, June 12, at Bedford; Norfolk, June 13, at Canton; North Middlesex, June 13, at Nashua, N.H.; Cape Cod, June 19 and 20, at Sandwich; Maine, June 24 and 25, at Houlton; New Hampshire, July, at Weirs, during the grove meeting.

They are now Ready-made.—Good news to the student, as well as to the man who wishes to furnish his library effectively, is the report that is published in another column by the Paine Furniture Company. It seems that the winged tables, so convenient in libraries, clubs, etc., are now carried regularly in the stock of furniture of these warerooms, and are available at a very low cost. There is nothing more convenient in a library than one of these overhanging tables.

Deaths.

In Cambridge, 20th inst., Louisa Bellows, daughter of the late John White Hayward and wife of Rev. Charles Taylor Canfield.

Mrs. Caroline Anne Parcher, eldest daughter of Dr. Alexander Hatch, was born in North Berwick, Me., June 20, 1816. Her father was a distinguished physician and leader of that time. When she was about nine years old, he removed to the village of China in Kennebec County, chiefly for the educational advantages offered by the academy in that place. Here his daughter pursued her studies, with some time spent in teaching, until 1834, when, at the age of eighteen, she was married to Dr. George Parcher, of Ellsworth, Me., who became the leading and universally beloved physician of that city.

She early imbibed Unitarian views from the New Testament and reflection before having heard the name "Unitarian," or knowing any person who held the ideas she adopted. She continued a devoted Unitarian Christian for the rest of her life, a constant reader of the Christian Register for more than fifty years, a counsellor and helper of Unitarian movement in society around her.

Mrs. Parcher had no children, but gave a home and mother's care to four children, relatives of her husband, and lived to see them all useful and honored members of the community.

For nearly thirty years she was an invalid, suffering from nervous affection, during the greater part of the time confined to her room, and generally to her bed. She never wavered in the faith she early attained, and through all her suffering kept a serene mind and uniform cheerfulness that made her place a pleasant resort for those whose privilege it was to enjoy her acquaintance. She died in the same trust in which she had lived, as undisturbed in spirit as if death were but her daily experience.

CRIMINAL GANGS.

BY JACOB A. RIIS.

The "gangs" in our great cities have been receiving a good deal of attention of recent years, and there seems to have been some mystification as to their origin. I have never been able to see just where the mystery comes in. From my point of view, there is no more cause for wonderment about the gang than there is about the excessive mortality from measles and scarlet fever in the homes of the poor. It is the tenement-house setting that accounts for them both. The gang, like these, is a distemper, in its earliest development physical rather than moral. It is a symptom of lack of care, of bad environment; and to this environment the real remedy is to be applied. Repression is all well enough, indeed is necessary once the disease is developed; but, like too much of our charity, it is applied at the wrong end of the line, when it is too late. The proverbial ounce of prevention, administered at the home that sent forth the tough, would have done more execution than any amount of clubbing, once he is on the war-path. Clubbing never reformed a tough. It is what his kind thrives on.

One need go no farther than to the statistics of almost any prison to get at the truth of this matter. Take those of the New York State Reformatory as a case in point. Of more than 6,000 prisoners reported in a specimen year (1893), 50.3 per cent. were shown to have come from homes reported as "positively bad," while only 9.7 per cent. came from good homes. The rest are put down as "fair only." And it is worthy of note that, of the entire lot, 57.5 per cent. were at home up to the time they committed the crime that sent them to the Reformatory, while the great mass of the remainder did not leave home until after they were fourteen.

When it comes to the question of association, 54.8 per cent. are shown to have kept company that was positively bad, 42.7 per cent. "not good," while only 1.2—a fraction over one in a hundred—is known to have been in really good company. "Show me the company a man (or a boy) keeps," etc. Was there ever an illustration of the old saying as apt as this of the Reformatory?

The tenement is and always will be the parent of gangs as long as conditions survive in it which, as the late Tenement House Commission has shown, "produce a condition of nervous tension, interfere with the separateness and sacredness of home life, and conduce to the corruption of the young." Of these conditions the "tough" is the natural crop. The "condition of nervous tension" is reproduced in his ready brutality, and accounts in a measure for the difference in temper between the American ruffian and his English brother. The corruption of the home they have both in common, and the result is the same. But an additional element enters into the manufacture of the American tough that throws much light upon it,—his alien descent.

The way to check the development of the gang is to substitute something that will take the place of the saloon and supply the lacking restraint of home. To my mind there is nothing better than the boys' club to do this, provided that it is run for the boys, and not for the entertainment of a handful of idle and sentimental philanthropists. The club supplies the very means of organization of which the gang is the slum expression.

The point, then, is to get at the lad, who is thus set adrift at a critical age, while it is yet time. I have not the least doubt that it can be done. It is done, in fact, every day. The gospel of good will holds the secret, and it is a very simple one. I remember the gang of young rascals that adjourned over, as it were, to observe the programme of a certain body of young women reformers who had come among them offering to make friends. They organized some of the younger elements into clubs with very promising results. The older gang held aloof until convinced that the young women were "straight." Then they sent a delegation to them. "We will change and have your kind of a club," was the message it brought; and the olive branch was accepted. The gang went out of business. The biggest boys' club in the country, and also the first, if I am not mistaken, came into existence in that way. It had been persecuting the missionaries of the neighborhood, pelting them with mud and stones, until in their very helplessness they appealed to the gang they had been fighting unsuccessfully with the police for months. They asked the gang in to have coffee and cakes; and the gang came, having made sure that no policemen were in ambush. That was the beginning of a great work based upon a new and mutual understanding. There are no gangs in that neighborhood to-day, but the club has several thousand members.

Every refining influence that penetrates through the kindergarten, or through personal association with better lives, to the slum home, helps cut the ground from under the feet of the gang. Real home missionary work should begin with the home in the sense of aiming to reform its physical conditions first of all. A prime agency in the work is good reading. The young in the homes of the poor read the awfulest trash. The aesthetic starvation of their surroundings craves food. They get it as best they can. Unless something steps in and satisfies the hunger with better food than their opportunities put in their way, I am certain that the school that taught them to read has done them but a poor service. I have been much struck with the powers for good inhabiting the "home library" plan. The home library is a little collection of books, carefully chosen, that is put in some tenement house for a circle of ten young readers. Into the home comes a visitor once a week, and talks over with the children what they have read. And the while she is laying hold of the boy she becomes identified also with the home where the root of the mischief is, and so makes doubly sure of him. It is easy to understand that her powers for good are great.

PROF. BEYSCHLAG'S MISTAKE.

BY REV. J. H. CROOKER.

On the publication of Beyschlag's "New Testament Theology" a few months ago in Great Britain, the author was at once criticised as a Unitarian. In reply to this charge he wrote a letter to his publishers, in which he admits that he does not believe in the Godhead as a trinity of persons, but instead he holds the theory of a modalistic Trinity. And he uses these words: "Unitarianism places an impassable gulf between God and man, while I see in Christ the perfect union of the two." I quote from the Expository Times, February, 1895, p. 214. It is well known that Prof. Beyschlag of Halle is what is called in Germany a very conservative theologian. So that the comparatively advanced views of this work are both significant and hopeful. But I wish especially to call attention to the grave misrepresentation of the position of modern Unitarians contained in the language which I have quoted. And this seems to me an important matter from the fact that I have seen a similar charge made against us by a score of writers in the last three years. Notably (and strangely), several such assertions have been made in the pages of the Christian Union, now the Outlook.

The truth is that modern Unitarians, instead of putting such a gulf between God and man, reject the traditional theology just because it injects a mediatorial scheme between the human soul and the Parental Life. To us the offence of the creeds is that they deny the immanence of God in all souls and destroy the universal sonship of humanity. That man participates in the Divine Life immediately and naturally was the plea of Channing and Emerson, of Parker and Hedge. It is for this that Martineau, Brooke, and Herford contend. Whatever our differences, here is our unanimity. Instead of believing that God incarnated himself solely and supernaturally in Jesus of Nazareth, and that it is by him alone that we can approach the Father, we affirm a universal incarnation of God in humanity, taking our stand with Paul. "In him we live, move, and have our being." We agree with Jesus, as reported in the first three Gospels, that every man, even the worst sinner, has direct and immediate access to God. We leave no gulf between.

It is against this gulf, falsely assumed by dogmatic theology, that we protest. Prof. Beyschlag's criticism might hold against the ancient Arians, but it is surprising that he or any one else should use the language against recent Unitarian theology.

Sermon Gleanings.

FROM DR. MARTINEAU'S SERMONS.

KNOWLEDGE AND FAITH.

"If the theologians could but look with a calm eye upon the past, they must see that, wherever the strife is over and the field is still, every advance of knowledge has been a gain to religion, won only at the expense of deforming fictions. As our petty schemes of the world break in pieces and fall away, diviner ones construct themselves, and make us ashamed of our regrets. . . . The age of the world, as it deepens, does but prolong its testimony to God, and make it worthier of his eternity; its scale, as it expands, does but place us in a temple more august and nearer to his infinity. Does any one whose mind has been enlarged by ancient history, and whose heart has listened to the old mythologies, want to have his sympathies reduced again to the 'chosen people,' and the divine communion with one race, so various and pathetic in its early struggling tones, restricted to that only channel? And, if from the person of Jesus Christ the artificial dress of Messianic investiture and some disguising shreds of Jewish fable drop away, who that can fix an appreciative eye on the emerging form will not say that it is diviner far, embodying in its grand and touching lineaments the essence and spirit of a new life of God in our humanity? This experience, this removal to a higher point of faith, is from the first the invariable result with the scholar who works most freely, because quite trustfully, at these problems, as, after long delay, it comes to be the result with all at last. The intermediate disturbance of religious calm—the pious dismay on the one hand, the petulant irreverence on the other—befall, chiefly, those who do not intimately commune with such researches, but, looking on, judge them by external and inapplicable standards, and not by their inner and essential relations. Whoever in these things has gone deep and touched ground is not afraid of falling into a bottomless abyss; . . . for may we not say, the essence of the large and liberal spirit lies in the absence of fear and the promptness of love?"—Theology in Relation to Progressive Knowledge.

THE UNITARIAN PROTEST.

"The Unitarian protest, which, perhaps, began with too great and monarchical a separation of our world from heaven, comes round at last to a reunion of the human and divine. And in the cycle which it has run there is a curious recovery, as it were, of the functions of Trinity without its paradoxes,—only with the drama transferred from the individuality of Christ to the life of humanity. We have traversed, and at length united, the relations of creature to the Creator, of love to Father, of weak and tempted to the all-quickenng Spirit; and may we not say that thus, without confusing the nature of God, we have enriched and ennobled our religious comprehension of man, and provided for a more balanced justice to the claims of nature, of conscience, and of the soul, and a blending consecration for them all? If an expanding faith brings us, as we think, an ampler peace, let it stir us also to a deeper fidelity; and, if those who know us not still drive us from the sacred enclosure and treat us as wanderers from the Christendom we love, all the more let us fling ourselves into the embrace of the Only True, and still say: 'Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us and Israel acknowledge us not. Thou, O Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer. Thy name is from everlasting.'"—The Three Stages of Unitarian Theology.

DAILY GRACES.

"It has lain very near to me to foster the lesser religions of our inner life,—the genuine admirations which flow into pure and genial hearts from objects short of the highest. The huge chasm which Protestantism usually sinks between 'the creature and the Creator,' between human loves and divine affections, has ever affrighted me with horror; and I have clung to the catholic truth that our veneration for our saints is a minor form of piety, akin in type to the devotion that passes finite bounds. Nature, art, character, present to the sincere eye a thousand resting-places for the upward look,—aspects of things which, so far from detaining us below, constitute a hierarchy of divine manifestation, and carry the vision in the ascending direction to the Light of lights. Let us open a kindly heart, and take the daily graces, the most transitory beauty, hospitably in. They are just the provision for lifting us over the saddest reproach and most constant sorrow of our existence. Unaided by them, we are apt to carry on at once two different lives that never mingle,—the ideal and the actual, the devout and the secular,—and to dip in and out by force of influence or season, conscious of mechanical mixture without inner blending or identity. . . . These affections, clearing out irreverence from the simplest duty, rudeness from the commonest speech, and deformity and negligence from everything, are blessed mediators between the absolutely divine and the merely human in our life, and bathe it in the baptismal waters of its first regeneration."—Parting Words.

THE CHRISTIAN NAME.

"The word 'Christian' is the casket which holds for human thought the supreme treasures of the inner life of man and the most precious gems of his external civilization; and, when all has been emptied out of it which false zeal and mistaken piety have stored there for safe keeping, there yet remains, in the catholic genius of the religion, the richest historic deposit with which Providence has blessed the world. To part with that word and throw ourselves on philosophy to weave us a substitute would be to interrupt the past in its creation of the future, and not only to migrate to unreclaimed countries, but to sink the old native land that we might do so. Part as we may by what was once demanded by the Church, there is something—and that, too, the very holiest influence in life—that is still with us; and this residuary truth, this divine spirit, which emerges from the mixed inheritance of Christendom when all that is perishable has been discharged, does but own its descent and look up with fitting reverence to its fountain-head when it claims the name of Christian. Possibly, the same truth and the same affection may be reached by the meditative thinker, as the fruit of a devout philosophy; by the Indian theist, as a purification of his native faith; by the Mohammedan, as the inner meaning of his sacred oracles; by the Jew, as the natural development of the law and the prophets. If so, may God speed them all! But each will find his mission best among his own spiritual kindred. We ourselves have been moulded by a Christian literature and civilization. We love the Christian hymns and memories and prayers.

Spiritual Life.

THOUGHTS FROM DR. MARTINEAU’S WORKS.

The human soul cannot lose its essentially moral constitution.

Whatever touches and ennobles us in the lives and in the voices of the past is a divine birth from human doubt and pain.

Of all depressing scepticism, of all painful solicitude, not the agility of thought, but the alacrity of duty is the fit antagonist.

The ills of life are not here on their own account, but are as a divine challenge and godlike wrestling in the night with our too reluctant wills.

It is human to wish not to be forgot. Yet believe me, to be lost from your memory and die away by the dawn of what is higher is my inmost desire.

Providence never permits the Spirit of Evil to wield for any length of time both the intellect and the will of vast multitudes of men; and the one is sure to betray the other.

To get good is animal; to do good is human; to be good is divine. The true use of a man’s possessions is to help his work; and the best end of all his work is to show us what he is.

If our human experience teaches us anything certain, it is this: that it is Thought which kindles thought, and Love which elicits love, and Character which moulds and refines character.

He who would not rather be damned than escape through the sufferings of innocence and sanctity is so far from the qualifications of a saint that he has not even the magnanimity of Milton’s fiends.

The pains we spend upon our mortal selves will perish with ourselves; but the care we give out of a good heart to others, the efforts of disinterested duty, the deeds and thoughts of pure affection, are never lost.

No laborious travels are needed for the devout mind; for it carries within it Alpine heights and starlit skies, which it may reach with a moment’s thought, and feel at once the loneliness of nature and the magnificence of God.

In what light we should see the character of God if the fall of the body is really the fall of the soul, remembering that he has put into the hearts of most men, by intuition or providential suggestion, a divine hope of something future. Were this possible, . . . every good man might feel an infinite pity for his kind, diviner far than the very Providence of heaven.

If we cannot find God in your house and mine, upon the roadside or the margin of the sea; in the bursting seed or opening flower, in the day-duty and the night-nursing, in the genial laugh and secret grief, in the procession of life ever entering afresh and solemnly passing by and dropping off, I do not think we should discern him any more on the grass of Eden or beneath the moonlight of Gethsemane.

PRAYER.

Eternal God, who committest to us the swift and solemn trust of life: since we know not what a day may bring forth, but only that the hour for serving thee is always present, may we wake to the instant claims of thy holy will, not waiting for tomorrow, but yielding to-day. Lay to rest, by the persuasion of thy Spirit, the resistance of our passion, indolence, or fear. Consecrate with thy presence the way our feet may go; and the humblest work will shine, and the roughest places be made plain. Lift us above unrighteous anger and mistrust into faith and hope and charity by a simple and steadfast reliance on thy sure will; and so may we be modest in our time of wealth, patient under disappointment, ready for danger, serene in death. In all things draw us to the mind of Christ, that thy lost image may be traced again, and thou mayst own us as at one with him and thee. Amen.

Literature.

PRINCE ZALESKI. By M. P. Shiel. Boston: Roberts Brothers; London: John Lane.—A good detective story needs something more than the careful, analytic unrolment of a manufactured mystery. It needs a consecutive sequence of thought by which the mind of the reasoner may be followed without the necessity of such wide leaps as are incomprehensible even when explained. Give us a detective or give us a magician. There is place for either in this kind of fiction, but the one refutes the other. This solver of problems sits in his magnificent palace and “wrenches the arcanum” of a bit of paper or a stone from it “by a species of mesmeric dominancy.” The central idea of the stories is not bad, but their telling involves such long descriptions and byways of reasoning that they do not keep the attention alert nor the interest concentrated. There is horror enough and mystery enough; but they fail to impress the reader with a sense of actuality, though, from some points of view, this might indeed be considered an advantage.

TRILBY, THE FAIRY OF ARGYLE. Translated from the French of Charles Nodier by Minna Caroline Smith. Lamson, Wolfe & Co. Trilby, the Fairy of Argyle. Translated by Nathan Haskell Dole. Estes & Lauriat.—Nodier’s “Trilby” has a charm as distinctive in its way as is the creation of Du Maurier; and, both in its intrinsic interest and in its grace of style, it ought to have been considered a prize for the translator, even before the later book appeared to give it reflected value. Both the translations are flowing and read well. Miss Smith’s book has the more appropriate, even though the simpler cover; while Mr. Dole’s has every advantage of paper, print, and general make-up, so that it is far more easily read. The paging in the former intrudes itself into the reading, and becomes annoying.

IF JESUS CAME TO BOSTON. By Edward E. Hale. Boston: Lamson, Wolfe & Co.—Mr. Hale has been moved by Mr. Stead’s book, “If Christ came to Chicago,” to present another picture of city life, in order to allow the student to take all points of view. It shows the other side,—the care and thoughtfulness that gives a helping hand to the stranger, and to those in trouble, teaching them to help themselves. It is a short story, but an effective one. It may well be that the warnings are needed, but it is good to have also the encouraging word that makes one feel as if it were worth while to keep on trying to solve the great problems of modern life.

THE FREE TRADE STRUGGLE IN ENGLAND. By M. M. Trumbull. Chicago: The Open Court Publishing Company.—This is the second and revised edition of a book which, while presenting a history of the struggle for free trade in England, aims to make plain to the American reader the parallel between it and the same movement in America. It has already attained a degree of popularity which shows that it meets the needs of many, and is indeed a clear and comprehensive argument as well as an historical account.

A CHILD OF NATURE. By Marion D. Shutter. Boston: James H. West. $1.00. The third volume in the “Life” series contains five sermons, which seek and find a revelation of the divine in the expressions of nature. The wayside stalk of red clover, the harvest joy, the leaves with their lessons and suggestions, the snowflakes and the lake,—all give up their secrets of peace or uplifting or strength. Mr. Shutter’s style is clear and simple; and the book well sustains the reputation already won by this series.

Miscellaneous.

The Massachusetts Year Book and City and Town Register for 1895 contains a complete list of cities and towns, with their officers, population, valuation, debt, tax rate, and much more not easily enumerated. It gives names and addresses of town officers, clergymen, attorneys, etc. With all this the book is not large enough to be clumsy, nor is the print too fine for use. It contains the essence of whole volumes, and represents an immense amount of work, but will be most useful to many people.

The Magazines.

The Kindergarten Magazine contains much that is helpful to mothers and teachers. The leading article for April is “Knighthood, a Symbol of Moral Power,” by Miss Susan E. Blow, written with her customary thoughtfulness and appreciation of symbolism. It is to be continued. The “Every Day Practice Department” and the “Parents’ Department” contain many short discussions or suggestions of value.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.’S
NEW BOOKS.
Letters of Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

Edited by ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE. With 16 Portraits and other Illustrations. 2 vols. 8vo, gilt top, $6.00.
These letters, with comparatively few exceptions, have never before been published. They date from 1785 to 1833; are addressed to Mrs. Coleridge, Southey, Wordsworth, Lamb, John Murray, and many others; they throw much new light on Coleridge’s life, character, career, and friendships; and the intimate and personal note running through them gives them a peculiar interest.

Under the Man-Fig.
A Novel. By M. E. M. DAVIS. 16mo, $1.25.
A noteworthy novel of which Texas is the scene, and the time during the Civil War. Mrs. Davis, being to the manner born, describes the Southern scenes and “plays” the Southern characters with marked skill, giving to the story a Southern atmosphere wholly natural and delightful.

Archbishop Laud.
By Rev. W. H. HUTTON. 12mo, $1.00.
Another volume in the series of English Leaders of Religion, depicting the career and character of the famous Archbishop.

MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as Related to the Inward Life. By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D., Author of “Wit and Humor of the Bible,” “Justice and Mercy,” etc. Cloth, red edges, 50 cents; full gilt, $1.00.

Contents: 1. A Wayside Prophet; 2. The Joy in Harvest; 3. Monuments of the Leaves; 4. The Mission of the Snowflake; 5. Down to the Lake.

The third volume in the cloth-bound series of “Life” books,—“A Child of Nature,” by Rev. Dr. Marion D. Shutter,—is already meeting large and favorable notice. The book is so handsome externally that many, seeing the 50-cent edition, at first suppose it to be the $1.00 edition. In its contents, the book, while entirely different from either of its predecessors in the series, is certain to meet with a no less cordial reception. “The graceful little volume,” as the Boston Traveler calls it, has much of interest and much of meaning for all who shall read it, and, from cover to cover through its 111 pages, presents vividly, by tender and wise and picturesque object-teaching, “the message” of Mother Nature “that is ready for the human heart.”

THE CHILD VISION.

BY RACHEL B. MACMULLIN.

Sometimes when I'm sitting alone,
And my thoughts are wandering wide,
I feel in my room a strange presence,
And a child stands by my side.

The eyes are brown that look into mine,
And the hair has a golden hue;
But the face and form beside my knee
Is a child that I never knew.

She touches my books and pictures,
And flits in and out of the door,
And dances in shadows and sunbeams
That fall in long rays on the floor.

I often awaken at midnight
From dreams that are vague and wild,
To see by my bedside standing
The form of this little child.

I fall asleep with the pressure
Of her soft, tiny finger-tips;
And a smile of peace and safety
She leaves with her kiss on my lips.

I sometimes think the vision
Is a guardian angel, mild.
For who could lead more kindly
Than the hand of a little child?

When the door is ready to open,
And I hear the calling low,
I think, when the latch is lifted,
The little child I shall know.

AN UNDERWORLD STORY.

BY ALICE EWING LEWIS.

One needed to be told that it was the first day of spring, for in name only was it spring-like. Over all the meadows and through the leafless woods the snow was spread in thick white blankets, while from the country roads came the echoes of sleigh-bells jingling as merrily as at Christmas time.

But beneath this all what a different story! Did you ever stop for a moment in your winter sports to think of your many, many summer friends who were taking such a long nap beneath your very feet,—all the feathery grasses and countless wood, meadow, and garden flowers,—not dead, but only resting, snugly tucked away in the brown earth?

But on this particular wintry spring morning some of the younger and more foolish of our underground friends began to stir and whisper softly to each other, "Spring's come, spring's come," when a staid old Daffodil, overhearing their chattering, put in,—

"That it has not, by a good deal."

"Well, I heard a boy say so, anyway," piped in the Hyacinth, courageously,— "right over my head, too."

"Child, he was sliding down-hill at that very moment. The snow is a foot deep," answered the Daffodil, sharply. "I myself never venture out till the last of this month, and I am only a few days behind Mistress Snowdrop."

At the mention of this last lady's name she rubbed her eyes and asked sleepily,—

"Who's talking about spring?"

"I," said the Hyacinth. "I was just telling Sir Daffy what I heard them saying above ground this morning."

"Do not believe it, my young friend," replied the Snowdrop, now wide awake. "Take the advice of your elders, and stay where you are for the present. Why, one season, when I was young, I lost all my blossoms by being just that wilful, and thinking I knew better than my mother. Since then I have learned wisdom; and even I, the earliest of all, shall not think of starting up for some days yet."

"It must be dreadful to be so early," said the Day Lily. "Don't you get cold?"

"Cold? No," retorted the Crocus.

"And, besides, we have poetry written about us. They call us the 'Firstlings of the Spring,' and other pretty names."

"Well, just let me be warm, and you can keep all the names. And then, as Cousin Hyacinth will tell you, we have relatives away in the South, where snow never falls, who are larger than any of you, and who live all the year round. So it's all in the family," puffed the Day Lily, relapsing into silence.

"It is pleasant to give so much pleasure to mankind, too," chimed in the Hepatica, from an adjoining wood (for you must remember that sound is carried more readily through the earth than through air, and these flowers' voices could hear one another a long distance). "Why, when I send up my blossoms, both children and grown people seem fairly wild over them; and I do not mind the cold at all, covered as I am with my warm down."

"My flowers were very fashionable last year," remarked the Daffodil, with pride. "I heard Miss Lucy say that they sold for five cents apiece."

"What did they do with them?" meekly inquired the Lily of the Valley.

"Why, the young ladies wore them, simpleton! Where were your eyes?"

"You forget, Sir Daffy, that I do not get out till May," pleaded the little Lily.

"Oh, surely!" said the Daffodil, more graciously. "And that reminds me of something else I heard Miss Lucy say," continued His Highness. "She was out walking in the yard one day during the January thaw, and I heard her say to her mother: 'Mamma, did you know that all the early vegetation comes from buds formed on the old roots in the fall, and that, if we had to wait for seeds to sprout and grow, it would be a long time before we had flowers? Prof. Gray says so in his botany.' And then she began poking away the leaves from Hyacinth there, and Mistress Snowdrop, to show her mother the buds. I just laughed to myself, and thought, 'Well, I don't know nor care who or what Prof. Gray and his botany are; but I could have told you that long ago.'"

"It's lucky that there is not anything worse for you to hear about yourselves than that," spoke up a sad voice from the vegetable garden.

"Why?" said the Daffodil.

"Well, I learned last fall that I was a Biennial," responded the voice.

"But you are not: you are a Beet," contradicted the Daffodil.

"I only wish that that was all that I am, but I am both a Beet and a Biennial."

"But what is a Biennial?" now inquired several anxious voices.

"A plant that lives only two years," replied the Beet, slowly, and with choking utterance.

"I found it out one day last fall, when the hired men were working about my bed, and Miss Lucy and her father were walking in the garden. By and by they came to where I am growing, and Miss Lucy said, 'Beets are queer plants, aren't they, papa?—live only two years; grow one year and blossom, and go to seed the next.' Beet that I am, I paled. And then her father answered: 'Yes. And what a wise provision it is that the nourishment should be stored up in the root the first year to perfect the blossoms of the second, thus enabling us to use this root as food!' At which he pointed at me with his cane, and said, 'John, you can save that Beet for seed.' Imagine my feelings! It is nothing but murder to thus deprive us poor Beets of half our short lives, that we may be made into vulgar pickles; and that I am here at all to tell the story is a miracle. But I am not alone in my sorrow: poor Messrs. Carrot and Parsnip are biennials, too."

A sadness had fallen upon the company while the Beet had been speaking; and, as his voice died away in sobs, one by one, the different flower voices also ceased. And they all fell asleep,—even the Snowdrop, who so soon was to don the white cloak that she wears in the upper world.

A VICTORY WITHOUT THE ENEMY.

"Now, Sandy," said mother, smoothing down the new jacket and polishing off the brass buttons, "you'll have to quit being a baby, since you have taken off petticoats."

"I ain't a baby," said the small boy, looking with disdain at the little pile of ruffled petticoats out of which he had just stepped. "I helped to fight a bum-bee's nest yesterday."

"Ho!" cried Fenton, the brother, who had been wearing trousers ever since Sandy was born: "they were white-faced bum-bees. They don't sting."

Sandy looked a little sheepish.

"I rode old Mac to water, too," he said.

"And father held the bridle," mocked Fenton.

Sandy walked up and down the carpet to see how big steps he could take; and mother said, in that soft little preaching way mothers have,—

"When a boy puts on trousers, he must do all the hard things that come along, like going to bed at eight o'clock and getting up at six, and washing his face and hands for dinner, and"—

"But his curls ought to be cut off first," interrupted Sandy, who hated his beautiful yellow curls as much as mother loved them.

"Very well," said mother, smiling: "as soon as you win a real, sure-enough victory, you shall have your curls cut off."

For Sandy was a timid little chap, and very much inclined to hide behind mother's petticoats; and his father was beginning to shake his head, and to say that it was time he had some bones in his character.

Sandy hadn't an idea what father meant by having bones in his character. But he knew that, when the beetles flew in the room at night, he felt like screaming; and so he screamed. When Mr. Ford's big Newfoundland came about, he felt like running; and so he ran. When the lightning flashed, he hid his eyes. He had never tried to do anything else. But this thing of being a man and wearing trousers was different, and Sandy thought that it was only his curls that hung between him and manhood now.

The trousers had been finished none too soon; for that very evening there was a lawn party at Aunt Ellen's,—a whole yardful of children playing "come" and "prisoner's base," and eating ice-cream, and spilling lemonade, and falling out of the hammock, and doing all the rest of the things that children do at a lawn party.

Sandy joined a party of little boys sitting on the big, square-topped stone posts at the gate. He felt very big-boyish sitting on a gate-post.

"Yes, sir-ee," Tom Ross was saying: "that dog certainly is mad."

"What dog?" asked Sandy, his heart beating rather fast.

"Why, Mr. Ford's 'Rip.' Didn't you know he was mad?"

"Is he, Tom? How do you know?"

"You're blind, ain't you? Did you see him run past here just now with his mouth open, and his tongue lolling out, and his eyes glaring?"

Now, Sandy had promised to come home at eight o'clock by himself; and he had to pass Mr. Ford's big yard for a long piece of the way. It seemed to him a very long piece. Would the open mouth and lolling tongue and glaring eyes meet him at that low stone wall? He might stay all night with Aunt Ellen, he thought; but, then, he had promised to come home. He might ask her to send John, the butler, with him. No, he had said he would come by himself, because that would please papa.

Sandy lost interest in "I spy" and "King George and his men" while he was sitting on the grass behind the spruce-pine, and wishing he had his petticoats on again, with leave to be a baby.

But he got home on time, flushed with haste and excitement, his curls hanging damp and tangled about his face.

"I did it, mother, I did it!" he cried eagerly. "Now cut off my curls."

And he told, with many a big word, the story of the mad dog, of the open mouth and lolling tongue and glaring eyes; of how much afraid he had been to come home alone; how he had actually seen the creature at the gate; how he had turned back in terror once, twice, but the third time had set his teeth, and determined to keep his word with papa if the dog "chewed him up."

"But I got away from him; and now, mamma, where are the scissors? Quick! I want to hear the old curls go snip, snip!"

"But, little green-pea, Mr. Ford's dog isn't mad at all," said Fenton, coolly. "I've been playing with him all the evening. Tom Ross was just guying you. That's what he was doing."

Sandy looked dazed for a minute, and then burst into tears. Poor little soldier! All his trying to be brave had been for nothing, then. He had not earned papa's praise; and they would not cut off his curls, if all he had done was to pass Mr. Ford's big, good-natured Rip.

But papa came, and lifted him up from the floor, and called for the scissors, and himself cut every golden brown ring of hair. (He cut it so badly, too, and snagged it so, that the barber had to do it all over.)

"That was just as much a victory, my boy," said the big, kind voice, "as if Rip had been foaming with hydrophobia. The enemy that you got the victory over was not curly and white-pawed and soft-eyed like Rip. He is a cruel, crawling thing; and his name is Cowardice. You've got him down to-day; and, please God, we'll make you a true knight sans peur et sans tache. Now go and kiss mamma, and ask her what that means."

But mamma was in such a hurry, between laughing and crying, to get the little head to look less as if a mad dog had mangled it that it was a good while before Sandy found out that the queer words meant "without fear and without stain."—Sunday School Times.

THE PERSON WHO DID NOT LIKE OATS.

Once upon a time there was a Person who did not like cats. She did not like dogs, either; but she never said anything about that, because the Big Master and the two Little Masters and the four Little Mistresses were all very fond of dogs, and liked to have them lie round under everybody's feet, and get white hairs all over everybody's clothes, and take up the whole hearth-rug, and run away with the roast beef, and bark to be let out, and then howl to be let in, and shake themselves when they were wet, and do all the things that dogs do. They liked all these things, so the Person who did not like cats never dared to say a word.

But nobody cared very much about cats,—except when they were little downy kittens, and they will not stay kittens!—save Maggie, the cook. So the Person felt free to speak her mind, and said she would not have any cats in the house. And after she had said that these things happened:—

One day a kitten belonging to the neighbor's little boy came into the kitchen, and refused to go out again. The little boy was sent for, and he came and took the kitten home.

Next day it came again, and was taken home again. And so it went on for a week, till every one in the house was tired out with carrying that kitten home; and Winged Table.

These winged tables (with a semi-circular overhang on each side) have always been a familiar sight in clubs and private libraries. They have heretofore been built only to order. This season for the first time we can supply such a table at low cost.

They are immensely convenient. On these two great semi-circular projections may be placed a vase, ornaments, flowers, a file of books, writing materials, or the late magazines. They are very spacious, and give to any table a distinguished look.

The low shelf takes an exactly opposite shape, which permits ample room for the drawing in of a chair if it is desired to use one of the overhangs as a desk.

We divide the box framing into two large drawers, operated from the ends of the table. The legs of this table are composed of clustered pillars with bead moulding. Decoratively, they are very effective.

the kitten's little boy cried, and thought it was too bad. It was.

But the kitten was very happy; and Maggie, the cook, said she "couldn't let the crathur starve," so it stayed. And pretty soon it wasn't a kitten any more, but a cat; and it had kittens of its own, one of which was given to the little boy.

Now the Person who did not like cats said the other kittens must be taken away in a bag, but all the Little Masters and Mistresses cried out and said:—

"Oh, mamma!" "Please, mamma! The dear, sweet little things!" "See their little paws!" "See their dear little noses!" "Hear them squeal!" "We must keep this one, mamma!" "We can't possibly part with that one, mamma!" "Oh, mamma!" "Dear mamma!" "Feel this one's little back!" and so on, and so on.

So the Person said that they might keep the one which they all thought the prettiest, and that the others must go away in a bag; but, while they were deciding, the kittens grew up and became cats. So then the bag was not big enough to hold them, and they stayed,—partly for that reason, and partly because they were all so ugly that no one could tell which was the least ugly.

Now, one day the man at the livery-stable where the Master kept his horse said that he wanted a cat, because the rats were giving him a great deal of trouble in his hay-loft. So the Master took the ugliest cat of all, which was really ugly enough to frighten the crows; and he put her in a basket, and took her away to the stable, and everybody was glad.

But three days after, as the Person was weeding the flower-bed, she heard a loud squeal of joy, and felt something rubbing against her back. She turned round; and there was the ugliest cat, purring, and squeaking, and seeming just as glad to get back as if she were perfectly beautiful and everybody loved her to distraction. She was sent to the stable again; but this time she came back the very next day, because she had found out the way. So she stayed.

But after that things went worse than ever. The Person went out to walk; and a cat followed her home, and would not go away, and would come in. And Maggie, the cook, said she "couldn't see the crathur starve," so she fed it; and it stayed. And on Thanksgiving Day a miserable, hungry kitten came to the door and begged to be let in. And nobody could refuse to give it a Thanksgiving dinner, so it came in; and it stayed.

And now the Person who does not like cats has nothing but cats about her all the time. They lie on the stairs and trip her up in the dark. If she takes up a clothes-basket, out rolls a kitten. If she gets the little sleigh to take the Littlest Mistress to ride, out jumps a cat. Wherever she goes, whatever she does, she sees a dirty white cat or a rusty black cat or a faded yellow cat, or a dingy tabby cat or a hideous tortoise-shell beast, which is the ugliest cat of all. And the Person would like the children to tell her what is to be done about it! If the children would like to know the Person's name, it is — Laura E. Richards, in Youth's Companion.

MIDGET'S WISH.

She was seven years old, and a real little dumpling in shape; for the laughing eyes peeped at you over the roundest cheeks, and the fat little hands were dimpled like pretty cushions. She was almost always good-natured, too; but sometimes the blue eyes would flash angrily, and the chubby foot be brought down with a stamp, if some playful trick of brother Tom's happened to be successful. Tom was twelve years old, and, I must say, was altogether too fond of teasing Midget's pets.

The little creatures upon whom she lavished so much affection were a tiny black cat, a white poodle dog only a little bigger than pussy, and a parrot which she had named Daisy.

One day she had set her heart upon playing menagerie; and kitty and poodle were soon arrayed in fancy blankets of brightest hues, and told they must be very quiet until Daisy could be brought. Kitty, who was to represent a lion, looked altogether too sleepy and contented for a king of the forest; while poodle, who was decorated with a pasteboard box and a bright silk handkerchief, was told he was to be an elephant. Midget hurried upstairs and down in search of Daisy, but the parrot was nowhere to be found.

"Daisy, Daisy!" she called; and a voice almost over her head answered:—

"Get out! Get out!"

"Why, Daisy, haven't I told you not to talk slang?" cried Midget, standing on tip-toe to get a view of the parrot, who was perched upon the top of a tall bookcase. "How did you get up there, Daisy?"

The parrot blinked knowingly at the little girl, then uttered the somewhat startling reply,—

"Tom's a terror!"

"Oh, you naughty Daisy!" exclaimed Midget. "Come down directly! I want you. Come, can't you hear?"

"That's right," called Daisy, without moving an inch.

"How did you get up there?" was Midget's next question.

"Tom's a terror," again called the parrot.

"Did he tie you up there?"

"That's right," was the reply; and the intelligent bird fluttered about, showing Midget how she was tied to the top of the bookcase. Ten minutes were passed in releasing the indignant Daisy, for it was no easy task to pull the table across the room and put a chair on it before she could climb up and release her pet; but at length Midget succeeded and started for the corner, where she expected to find the elephant and lion awaiting her arrival. Before she could cross the hall she heard a confused noise of barking and mewling; and in another moment a queer-looking lump of black and white rushed through the outer door, while Tom came running from the back parlor, laughing until the tears rolled down his cheeks.

"O Tom! My menagerie!"

"Your what?"

"You're so mean! I wish"— Midget could get no further, but sobbed as if her heart would break.

"Well, what do you wish?" said Tom, expecting a perfect storm of anger.

"I wish," replied Midget, speaking very slowly, "that I could find some way of doing you a kindness every day of my life. Then you'd know how awful it is to have any one unkind to you."

Tom looked serious at this, and, indeed, remained quiet until good-nights were said. But the next afternoon, while Midget sat wondering what she would do to pass the time, he stole quietly into the room; and presently she felt two small furry creatures cuddling against her arms. And with a scream of delight Midget tumbled two little Guinea pigs to the floor, as she flew to hug Tom.

"How did you happen to get these darlings?" she asked, when she had them once more safely in her lap.

"I'll tell you, Midget," said Tom: "I'd saved 50 cents to get me one of those caps the boys are wearing, but I thought you could have a fine menagerie if you had these cunning fellows; and, to tell you the truth, I couldn't hardly stand it when you said you wished you could do me a kindness every day. Then I thought I could go without the cap, and now I'm happier than I ever was in my life; and I'll promise to let your pets alone after this, Midget."

"That's right," cried a voice so close to them that they were both startled; and Tom was sure he was forgiven when the parrot perched upon his shoulder and consented to be carried off by the happy children, to take her place in the menagerie as the Great American Eagle.—The Ram's Horn.

A KINDLY DEED.

A writer tells in the Boston Gazette of a lady who was travelling from Providence to Boston with her weak-minded father. Before they arrived there, he became possessed of a fancy that he must get off the train while it was still in motion, that some absolute duty called him. His daughter endeavored to quiet him, but it was difficult to do it; and she was just giving up in despair, when she noticed a very large man watching the proceedings intently over the top of his newspaper. As soon as he caught her eyes, he rose and crossed quickly to her.

"I beg your pardon," he said. "You are in trouble. May I help you?" She explained the situation to him. "What is your father's name?" he asked.

She told him; and, with an encouraging smile, he bent over the gentleman who was sitting in front of her, and said a few words in his ear. With a smile the gentleman arose, crossed the aisle, and took the vacant seat; and the next moment the large man had turned over the seat, and, leaning toward the troubled old man, had addressed him by name, shaken hands cordially, and engaged him in a conversation so interesting and so cleverly arranged to keep his mind occupied that he forgot his need to leave the train, and did not think of it again until they were in Boston. Here the stranger put the lady and her charge into a carriage, received her assurance that she felt perfectly safe, had cordially shaken her hand, and was about to close the carriage door, when she remembered that she had felt so safe in the keeping of this noble-looking man that she had not even asked his name. Hastily putting her hand against the door, she said: "Pardon me; but you have rendered me such a service, may I not know whom I am thanking?"

The big man smiled as he answered, "Phillips Brooks," and turned away.

Recent discoveries in Africa have all tended to prove that Herodotus, the father of history, was not also the father of lies, as is often charged. The four lakes from which the Nile rises have been shown to exist. Stanley's Ruwenzori Mountains take the place of the mountains of the moon; the pygmies live in the equatorial forests; and now Signor Robbecchi Bricchetti, the Italian explorer of Somali land, tells of a degraded race which he has found on the shores of the Indian Ocean, without weapons or proper dwellings, living exclusively on fish and bivalves, whom he considers the descendants of the fabulous Ichthyophagi, or fish-eaters, described by the old Greek historian.

SLOWLY STARVING.

Surrounded by Plenty, but Dying for Food.

An Every-day Occurrence.—Our Friends Perishing Before Our Eyes.

A terrible experience for any one to go through, that of seeing some beloved friend actually wasting away before our eyes, unable to derive sufficient nourishment from their food to sustain life.

Medicine naturally becomes of little avail, and the various organs of the body, debilitated from a lack of nourishment, take on themselves the disease that was originally the cause of the "breakdown," and help hasten the end.

Such cases, though too prevalent, are happily becoming less frequent. The prominent physicians of to-day do things differently from those of twenty years ago. They first put the patient in a condition to stand the "siege," then enrich his blood, create for him new strength, and "build him up" generally. The patient is then in a condition to derive benefit from his medicine.

This is done by the use of Bovinine, the original raw food. It is an extract that contains the greatest amount of the life-sustaining and tissue-building properties of lean, raw meat, concentrated in the least possible bulk.

The advantage of this is obvious. A patient already greatly weakened by disease, needs to husband every particle of strength. A few drops of Bovinine will impart as much nourishment to the body as would be derived by a well person from an ordinary meal; and, in getting this nourishment, the stomach has been forced to do the least possible amount of work.

Bovinine, continued throughout an illness, greatly hastens recovery. Taken at the beginning of a wasting disease, it diverts the cause of the trouble by toning up the various organs, and getting them in a normal condition.

Bovinine is indorsed by 25,000 doctors. Its action is always beneficial, as a single trial will convince the most sceptical.

NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATED ALLIANCE.

In accordance with the notice issued a meeting of the New England Associated Alliance was held in Lawrence on Thursday, the 18th, in the First Unitarian Church of that place.

Mrs. George H. Young, wife of the minister, and president of the Branch Alliance, extended a cordial welcome to the friends present.

Floods and freshets and interrupted communications made the gathering smaller than the beautiful spring day and the attractions offered would have led us to expect. The electric road from Lawrence to Lowell was under water, and in many directions where trains were running people were afraid to start on an all-day expedition, fearing detention. In spite of this, eighteen branches were represented, sixteen from Massachusetts, one from Maine, and one from Connecticut.

Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells presided, and opened the meeting with the Lord's Prayer, said together, followed by the singing of the hymn "Awake, my soul!" Mrs. Wells then introduced Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows, who spoke on the "Faith and Heroism of the Women of Armenia." She told us of the condition of Armenia long ago, when our ancestors were really half-savage in England.

She would not allow herself to dwell too much on the recent outrages in detail, a painful subject of which one could read in the printed testimony; but she tried to make us realize the life of those people, their devotion to their faith, and the need that public sentiment should be aroused here and brought to bear on Turkey.

We may well ask ourselves, Are we willing to bear for our faith a fraction even of the sufferings these people endure? Can we not each one of us do something to aid? The best source of information on this subject is "The Armenian Crisis in Turkey," by F. D. Greene. (For sale at 25 Beacon Street and 141 Franklin Street, Boston. Price, postpaid, forty cents.)

Mrs. Barrows was followed by Miss Mary F. Eastman, who spoke on Individualism. She did not confine herself to the relation of her topic to Alliance work alone, but treated it in a much broader way. She showed its advantages and its disadvantages, and how the pendulum must swing from the individual to organization, and back again to the individual.

She deprecated the coldness of our churches and our people, and the scant hospitality and sympathy offered to strangers coming among us.

It was announced that the National Alliance would hold its business meeting and elect its officers when the Conference meets in Washington, next October. It follows that our business meeting must be held soon after that, and delegates must be chosen to elect our own officers. Also we, as an association, are entitled to delegates to the national meeting. Mr. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, secretary of the American Congress of Liberal Religious Societies, requested the New England Associated Alliance to send three delegates to the meeting of the Congress in June, in Chicago.

The business was referred to the afternoon session, and the meeting adjourned to lunch. An agreeable social hour passed, during a part of which the Executive Committee of the Board held a session, and the meeting opened again. The president was requested to appoint a committee to nominate officers for our own Executive Board; and she named Mrs. George H. Young of Lawrence, Mass., Miss Kelley of Portland, Me., Miss S. E. Doyle of Providence, R.I.

Mrs. Wells was also requested to appoint a committee to select the delegates to which the New England Associated Alliance is entitled to the national meeting; and Miss Mary L. Hall of Dorchester, Mrs. Julia W. Nichols of Boston, Mrs. Anna Hazelton of Concord, N.H., were appointed.

The choice of delegates to Chicago was referred to the Executive Board in the hope they might find persons who would be able to be in Chicago at the time of the meeting of the Congress.

This business transacted, the ladies were glad to listen to Mrs. Jordan's delightful paper on the Scope and Extent of Alliance. It is difficult to do justice to this paper without transcribing the whole, and we hope it will soon be read again to a much larger gathering. After hearing it there was an inclination to question the use of the word "extent," for there seemed no limits and no boundaries. This paper and that of Mr. Young on "The Value of the Alliance as a Factor in Church Work" agreeably supplemented each other. Mr. Young laid great stress on the need that Alliance work should quicken the spiritual life of the church and stimulate interest in the church services. And later Miss Mary L. Hall begged the Branches to give their best work for denominational and religious purposes. A little rustle of pleased surprise had gone through the audience when at one period Mrs. Dix walked in. Few had known of the possibility of her presence, and she was doubly welcome. All were glad to see her, and that her health allowed her to be there. She told us of her visit to Chattanooga and to Asheville, and of Mr. Westall's work in the latter place, and of his wife's life with her invalid child high up on the mountain, where she finds missionary work to do.

There is now no Sunday-school in connection with the Asheville church; but the books sent out for it have been placed in one of the secular schools. Here on one day in the week some of the ladies go to give out and receive these books; and one day, when the eager children were gone, there was just one book left on the shelves.

Cannot more books be sent?

Miss Langmaid gave an account of the work of the Cheerful Letter Exchange Committee. Young people find in this a field of work especially adapted to them. Books and magazines are much needed.

Will not each person send one book? Do not fail to do that. Better, if you can send a magazine regularly. To any person willing to do this the committee will send a name and address. If you can collect several books, send them to the committee at 25 Beacon Street; and they will find the suitable reader for each one.

King's Chapel has started an "Envelope Mission." Cut out from the daily papers as you read interesting articles. Put them in an envelope. When it is full, send it on to some of the lonely people. Invalids who cannot hold a book can read these light scraps one by one; and the envelope can then be passed on to another reader.

Miss Eastman contrasted this meeting with the first meeting of the Auxiliary, finding great joy in the changed attitude of the women. Then they were timid, tentative, doubtful, now full of courage and independence.

The interesting discussion was cut short by the inexorable clock, which warned us that we must go to the train. The next meeting will be in Concord, N.H., in June. ELLEN S. HALE, Sec'y.

Here and There.

Germany has introduced a special mouthpiece for telephones, the object of which is to avoid the spread of disease by the condensed moisture of the breath. A pad of a large number of discs of paper, with a hole in the middle, is inserted into the mouthpiece; and the upper disc is torn off after every conversation.

It is said that the severe cold in the South killed the bluebirds and white-breasted swallows. "Listener" in the Boston Transcript refers to this in a sensible way: "Nothing has been said in the papers about the destruction of the bluebirds and swallows, and a great deal has been said about the loss of the Florida orange crop; and yet how much more serious a loss to us of Massachusetts is the killing of the birds than the killing of the oranges! All the reasonable demands of our stomachs can be satisfied without Florida oranges; but our souls will be left somewhat hungry, will they not, by an absence or scarcity of bluebirds and swallows?"

The chime of eleven bells just placed in the Unitarian church tower, Somerville, the generous gift of Martha R. Hunt and other residents of Somerville, is the first one to be hung in the city. It consists of the following bells: D, E, F-sharp, G, G-sharp, A, B, C, C-sharp, D, and E. The largest weighs 3,214 pounds. The total weight of the chimes is 13,428 pounds. They were cast in Boston by the Blake Bell Company, the oldest foundry in the country, successors to Paul Revere, and were tuned under the supervision of Mr. Frank Staples of Providence, a gentleman who has devoted his whole business life to such work, being connected for some years with the noted English foundries of Mears & Co. and Taylor & Sons. The tone of the bells, both in quality and accuracy, has been praised in highest terms, both by the church committee and by several musical critics who heard them at the foundry.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

IN NERVOUS DYSPEPSIA.

Wm. O. Baskerville, M. D., Oxford, N. C., Member of N. C. Medical Society, writes under date of October 3, 1893, as follows:

"About August or September of 1891, I was very much troubled with torpidity of the liver and disorder of the digestive organs; later in the fall and winter I found that my urine was laden with uric acid, and I was a victim of Nervous Prostration and Nervous Dyspepsia. I tried the most approved remedies for such ailments, and consulted several of the most noted physicians of our country. Failing to obtain any relief, I determined to visit the Buffalo Lithia Springs of Virginia, where I spent a period of six weeks during the summer of 1892. I was entirely restored to health; my nervous symptoms all disappeared, and my general health was rapidly restored to its normal condition. Since that time my health has continued as good as at any period of my life. As a tonic, anti-dyspeptic and restorative, the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER is without a peer."

Dr. P. A. Flournoy, Charlotte Court House, Virginia.

"My Nervous System was shattered, my digestion difficult and painful, the stomach often rejecting the lightest possible article of food. I was greatly depressed in spirit, and had but little hope of any improvement in my condition. Upon a diet of tea and crackers, I visited the Buffalo Springs and put myself upon the Water of Spring No. 1. I was soon conscious of an increase both of the appetite and digestive power, and at the same time of a gradual increase of Nervous Vigor. This improvement continued through a protracted stay at the Springs, and to such an extent that before leaving I was able to eat with impunity any article of food found upon the hotel table. I left the Springs fully restored, and returned home to enter actively upon the arduous duties of my profession." This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

FILES OF "THE UNITARIAN."

I wish to say to persons desiring to obtain back numbers of the Unitarian in order to complete their sets, that they will need to attend to the matter between now and the 10th of June, or it will be too late. The present publisher, Mr. Geo. H. Ellis, can furnish back numbers since January, 1891, the time when the publication office was removed to Boston. But for the five years previous to that time back numbers can be obtained only from me. Most of the numbers of that period I can furnish; but I shall dispose of all before June 10, after which time it will be impossible for me to give aid to any in completing their early files.

The Sunday School.

The New Song and Service Book, published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, has been introduced already into twenty-seven Sunday-schools, representing different parts of the country. The first edition of three thousand copies will evidently soon be exhausted; but another edition is in preparation.

The regular Channing Hall "Talks," at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, April 27. Subject, Lesson XXX., "Jesus and the Roman Coin." Primary at 2 p.m., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham. Intermediate and Advanced at 3 o'clock, by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

The last picture and article in the attractive series, "Famous Portraits of Children," will be published in Every Other Sunday for May 19. These reproductions of famous paintings, and the interesting descriptions by Miss Foster, have proven a very happy companion series to the "Famous Madonnas" which appeared in Every Other Sunday last year.

The Unitarian Sunday School Society will not issue a new service for Flower or Children's Sunday this year. The New Song and Service Book contains material for this occasion, both for service and music. But, in order to accommodate those who wish a pamphlet order of exercises, reprints can be had of the Floral Services for 1891, 1892, 1893, and 1894. Samples sent on application. Price $4.00 per hundred. Same rate by the dozen.

Sunday-schools and churches are reminded that "a contribution to the funds of the Unitarian Sunday School Society by any Unitarian parish or Sunday-school connected therewith shall entitle such parish, either directly or by its Sunday-school, to appoint three persons who shall be members of this society for the term of one year, and such persons are denominated delegate members. All members constituted as above shall be entitled to vote and act at all meetings of the society. The payment of ten dollars at any one time shall constitute a person a member of this society for life."

LEND A HAND.—The quarterly meeting of the Lend a Hand Clubs at Marlboro on the 16th was of unusual interest. Eighteen clubs, from Marlboro or from the neighborhood, reported in more or less detail. And, as almost always happens, each club had some suggestion to make, which the delegates from other clubs found interesting and suggestive.

These meetings are called by the central committee which holds its monthly meetings in Boston. For that committee Dr. E. E. Hale, who is the president of the United Society, and Mrs. Whitman, the secretary, reported. The most important of the enterprises they have had in hand have been the collection of subscription for the ill-fated industrial school at Manassas. This school, planned and built by the colored people of that neighborhood under the energetic lead of Jennie Dean, was unfortunately burned down in the extreme cold weather of January. Jennie Dean with her own cheerful spirit declares that the fire was a blessing in disguise. Lend a Hand has contributed, or will contribute, $1,000 for the new school-house; the friends of the school in New York, led by Mrs. Burton Harrison, who knows the country well, have contributed $1,100; there were $1,500 more at once paid as insurance; and the colored people have taxed themselves with great loyalty, so that they will have a better building than they lost. The Sea Island sufferers have roughed through their hard winter, and start cheerfully on a new year. Their needs required the best efforts of the central committee last winter. Miss Brigham, who conducts the very large distribution of books and papers in the South and South-west, reports activity larger than ever to meet the unprecedented demand. These are independent societies, but both grew from the suggestions and combinations of the central committee.

The Martha and Mary Club of Boston is a society of ladies used to vigorous personal work in helping people to help themselves. They have sustained a bureau for what they call "emergency sewing" through the winter, by which they have been able to give to the heads of families and others in need a dollar a week for sewing work, generally on coarse material, through the winter. Their report was singularly suggestive and practical, and the various societies assembled were glad to receive the price-list at which they are able to sell their manufactured work to societies who have naked people to clothe.

The Lend a Hand Club of the Church of the Unity in Worcester, in a spirited report, sometimes pathetic and sometimes amusing, made many suggestions of value to other similar societies. What was most interesting was that the club has worked its way into such esteem in the neighborhood that they are relied upon as a force to do the duty which comes next their hand, whatever it may be. This club has had a series of practical talks from prominent business men, one on the post-office, one on legislation, one on electric roads, and one on banking.

The afternoon meeting had been specially assigned for a statement to be made by the Boston clubs, on the efforts set in motion by the Industrial Aid and the Temporary Home, for placing in the country women from Boston who want work. This effort is specially intended for the benefit of women with young children, and for those persons who, having contracted the habit of intemperance, wish to avoid temptation. This proved in many instances,—more than three hundred,—in the experience of the Industrial Aid last year, that women who cannot resist the temptations of our Boston liquor shops can live to some purpose in towns where they cannot get whiskey. An interesting conversation followed, in which different persons took part. Both meetings, that of the morning and that of the afternoon, were eminently practical and social in their character.

Personals.

A deputation of Englishmen waited on Lord Kimberley last week to urge the government to take prompt action in regard to Armenia. Among the speakers were F. S. Stevenson, M.P., Canon Gore, Prof. Agar Beet, Dr. Clifford, Canon Wilberforce, Dr. Newman Hall, Prebendary Eyton, Father Lane, and Sir J. Pease. More than a dozen religious denominations were represented.

THE THREE MARYS.—A beautiful memorial has lately been placed in the Unitarian church in Milwaukee. It is the gift of Mrs. Caroline Metcalf,—a name deservedly honored by the church; and it is in memory of her mother, Mary Tileston, her sister, Mary Hemenway, and her daughter, Mary Metcalf. The inscription is, "In memory of Three Marys, Mother, Sister, Child." Mrs. Mary Tileston, a woman of great but quiet force of character, was the wife of Thomas Tileston of New York, both well known Unitarians in Dr. Bellows's church. One of the gifts of the last year of her life was the Tileston Fund of $40,000 to the Harvard Divinity School. Mary Metcalf, whose early death was so great a loss, was possessed of remarkable and acknowledged ability and promise, especially in the direction of art. The life of Mrs. Mary Hemenway is known to all, here as well as in Boston, where she lived; and it is an inspiration to have in the church here a memorial on which her name is inscribed, and which will remind us of her as a type of true womanhood and an adherent of the principles of the Unitarian faith. The memorial is in the form of sedilia, and is placed back of the pulpit. It consists of five seats upholstered in brown leather, and, with this exception, is executed in quartered oak slightly stained to enrich its color. The style is English Gothic, the same as the church; and the period, late Tudor. Rising back of the seats proper is a high panelled back, with canopied heads; and above these, over the central seat, is a spiret in open tracery, on the angles of which are crockets. And the whole is surmounted by a finial. At the base of the spiret stand six angels, blowing trumpets. The whole work is richly carved, and forms one of the handsomest pieces of work of this nature in this country.

Pleasantries.

"Where was Magna Charta signed?" asked a teacher in a south of London Board School. "Please, sir, at the bottom."

Miss Blithely (interested in science): "Can one get a shock from a telephone?" Top Spiffkins (intent on ethics): "That depends, my dear young lady, on who is talking at the other end."

"Dear Tim,—I am sending you my coat by parcel's post. I have cut off the buttons because it will make it lighter. You will find them in the breast pocket. Yours, Pat."—Exchange.

Teacher: "Do you understand the meaning of the terms capital and labor?" Small boy: "Yes'm. If a boy has a sled, that's capital. If another boy rides down with him and then pulls the sled up, that's labor."—Good News.

A middle-aged, bespectacled woman appears at the door in answer to the bell, and the following conversation ensues. Boy: "Shovel off yer snow?" Lady: "No. I've got a husband who can do it." Boy: "My goodness! You look too young to be married." Lady: "Ahem! Well, you can do it."—Harper's Bazar.

No doubt, when one is reforming from bad habits, he should reform altogether. So, at least, thought an old lady who was opposed to the use of tobacco, when she saw an ex-drunkard, who vaunted his repentance, smoking a pipe. "I am a brand plucked from the burning," said the reformed man. "Anybody might know that," said the old lady; "for you're smokin' yet!"—Youth's Companion.

A well-known critic recently wrote a bitter attack on the work of a celebrated novelist. After it was published, the novelist, a good-natured man, wished to meet the critic who had assailed him, and asked a common friend to bring him up to dinner some evening. When invited, the critic replied: "I certainly shall not go! He simply wants to heap coals of fire on my head; and do you suppose I am going to hold the scuttle for him?"—P. McArthur.

Two Indians belonging to one of the large American shows of life in the wild West, while visiting London, were much interested in the sights to be seen in the London streets. One day they stopped before the show window of a wig-maker, and stared at the many varieties of wigs on exhibition there until their eyes nearly fell out. Finally, one of them nudged the other, and, with a shake of his head, remarked: "Ugh! mighty brave man! Big fighter, much scalp!"—Harper's Young People.

There is a conductor on an electric that goes away out into the suburbs who makes it most entertaining for the few people who go to the end of his route. "All aboard for the little village!" he will shout; and he continues such calls as "Home of the little sisters" (the old people's home); "Grassy lane and skeeterville"; "The water tower"; "Cherry Street, with a side-walk on it"; "Brown's pasture, no houses"; "view of the powder-house,—real estate 'most any price"; "end of the route, all out, and come again."—Boston Home Journal.

One rather funny incident had to do with a little Irish boy who pumped the organ in the Unitarian church. William McClellan was the organist, and it was a great wonder to the little shaver at the pump-handle how that music was made. One Sunday in the midst of the voluntary he filled the bellows full and tiptoed to the corner to peek around and "see William's fingers go it." But the wind soon began to give out, and the music wavered and threatened to collapse. William, at the organ, looked up to see what the matter was, and saw his pumper sticking his head around the corner. The boy was all excited. "Give it to 'em on the high notes," he called out in a thrilling whisper, "give it to 'em on the high notes!"—G. M. S.

THE EFFECTS OF A SERMON.

Once, when Cardinal Manning was preaching in Rome, he recognized John Bright among his listeners. On the instant he determined to preach to him, and dwelt with as much force and effect as he could on the claims of the Blessed Virgin to our veneration.

Two or three years later he met him and reminded him of this incident. "I remember it perfectly," said John, "and I shall never forget it. I was delighted with everything that morning"—a gratified smile came on the cardinal's face—"excepting your sermon."—"Memoirs of an Author," Fitzgerald.

Rare Seeds: Great Trial Offers.

New Giant Japanese MORNING GLORIES. These are the most remarkable and beautiful novelties in flowers introduced for many years. The flowers are four to six inches across; and the variety of colors, tints, shadings, and markings is wonderful and limitless, many of them having the peculiar lustre of the richest silks and satins. They are of all shades of red, from pink to the most brilliant crimson and maroon, and of every shade of blue from lavender and sky blue to the richest indigo and royal purple; also white, light yellow, gray, bronze, deep purplish slate, almost black, etc. Many have a distinct white margin, and some are elegantly spotted with pink, crimson, purple, blue, etc., on white ground, and many are striped, blotched, rayed, and shaded in an indescribable manner, often having three or four colors and shades in one flower. Several varieties have double flowers, like Petunias. The foliage is also very ornamental, the leaves of some varieties being of a rich golden bronze, and many are blotched, spotted, and mottled with white, yellow, and silver gray in rich mosaics. They are as easily grown as the common Morning Glories, the vines climbing from 20 to 30 feet, branching in all directions; and they bloom freely, from June to October, a single vine often having hundreds of flowers open at once. The editor of "Success with Flowers," a well-known floral magazine, writes of them as follows: "My plants were so busily occupied in producing marvelously tinted and variegated flowers, many of which reached six inches in diameter, that the vines only attained a length of ten to fifteen feet. There is little danger of the seedsmen overpraising the beauty of coloring in the blooms, as some of the combinations of tints are not to be expressed by even the most flowery adjectives." More than a hundred varieties bloomed in my own grounds last summer, from which the seeds I offer were raised.

SPECIAL 15 DAYS' INTRODUCTION OFFERS.

For only twenty-five cents, or thirteen two-cent stamps, I will mail a packet of these Giant Japanese Morning Glories of mixed varieties, also all the following (six packets in all, amounting to 75 cents at regular rates): Large German Pansies, the best in the world, over 50 distinct sorts and an endless variety mixed; Mammoth Prize Phlox, 30 varieties mixed; new White Aster, Queen of Spring, large white flowers, three weeks earlier than any other aster; new Mammoth Double Fringed Poppies, over 50 varieties mixed. For forty cents I will send all the above and eight more packets, all first-class seeds, including Japanese Pinks, 30 varieties; new Yellow Aster; Double Portulaca; Mist Flower; Chrysanthemum, etc. My Catalog of New and Rare Seeds and Plants free with every order. Editorial.

PERHAPS the relation of Jesus to this and any other age has never been more finely stated than by Dr. Martineau in the closing paragraph of his volume, "The Seat of Authority in Religion": "It is only in the sphere of mundane phenomena that a revealer needs to know more than we: in the sphere of divine things the requirement is that he be better, and in the order of his affections and the secrets of his will make more approach to the Supreme Perfection." The question of the intellectual supremacy of Jesus and the range of his knowledge do not greatly concern us. But the attitude of his mind and heart toward God and his fellow-men constitute his mastership."

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND had a warm welcome in Boston last Sunday evening, where he delivered an address on "American Citizenship." The fact that Mayor Curtis was present and introduced him, and that Gov. Greenhalge sent a letter regretting his inability to be present, and extending a cordial greeting to him as a "true patriot, and a man who truly loves his country," shows that not all Republicans are under the despotism of the American Protective Association. Mayor Curtis said: "In the field, in the pulpit, and on the platform, he has battled for American institutions, American principles, and the American flag; and such an enthusiastic American citizen must be especially qualified to speak on American citizenship."

THE archbishop's address was broad, earnest, inspiring, and patriotic. "What America demands from her sons," he said, "is good citizenship: what Americans owe to their country is good citizenship. . . . Manhood suffrage demands as its fitting preparation universal education." He pointed out the evils of the primary and the caucus, of wire-pulling and slate-making. He arraigned the saloon, and declared that the liquor power must be totally eliminated from politics. Concerning immigration he says: "A well-directed immigration will not war with the American spirit or American loyalty. Decidedly, the spirit of our institutions must be made to pervade our foreign-born populations; and loyalty to them must be maintained. Immigration must be restricted so as to exclude criminals and unmaned paupers. Nor should immigrants in any State of the Union be prematurely authorized to vote. A due respect for American citizenship guards against a reckless extension of it to men coming to us from other lands. No one should be invested with the franchise until a sufficient length of residence in America has given full opportunities to understand her institutions and her laws. No encouragement must be given to social and political organizations or methods which perpetuate in this country foreign ideas and customs. An Irish-American, a German-American, or a French-American vote is an intolerable anomaly. We receive from America the right to vote as Americans, for America's weal; and, if we cannot use our privilege as Americans, we should surrender it. Efforts to concentrate immigrants in social groups and retard their Americanization should be steadily frowned down."

It would seem that the most rabid member of the American Protective Association ought to be convinced by such words that Catholics are not necessarily all traitors. And here is something that the members of that organization may well take to heart: "Storms are passing over the land, arising from sectarian hatred. These are scarcely to be heeded: they cannot last. Day by day the spirit of Americanism waxes strong. Narrowness of thought and unreasoning strife cannot resist its influences. This country is America. Only they who are loyal to her can be allowed to live under her flag, and they who are loyal to her may enjoy all her liberties and rights. Freedom of religion is accorded by the Constitution. Religion is put outside State action, and most wisely so. Therefore, the religion of a citizen must not be considered by voter or executive officer. The oath of allegiance to the country makes the man a citizen. If that allegiance is not plenary and supreme, he is false to his profession: if it is, he is an American. Discriminations and segregations, in civil or political matters, on lines of religion, of birth-place, of race, of language, of color, is un-American and wrong. Compel all to be Americans, in soul as well as in name; and then let the standard of their value be their American citizenship."

ON the same day that Archbishop Ireland was giving in Boston a noble presentation of the American ideal of citizenship, Dr. Fulton, the anti-Catholic agitator, was paying his respects to Dr. Parkhurst, who lately lectured in Boston on good citizenship. Dr. Fulton assured his audience that Dr. Parkhurst had not told the whole truth about Tammany; but, undoubtedly, Tammany feels that he has already told enough, and would not like to have him tell more. Dr. Fulton says he is praying for Dr.

Parkhurst; but why he should pray for him instead of for Tammany, and for Platt and the other wicked politicians who are trying to undo the good work of Dr. Parkhurst, we do not know. Fulton declared further that he had no use for Parkhurst. Possibly, Parkhurst has no use for Fulton. But we should not wonder if Platt and Tammany would like to hire the latter to go around the country and abuse a man who has done so much to confound their politics and frustrate their knavish tricks.

IT is not long since the ministers of Hoboken tried to stop Col. Ingersoll from speaking in that place; and now Hon. Elijah Morse of Massachusetts has just said, in a public address as reported in the Standard, "The sale of Ingersoll's book in this State, recommending and justifying suicide, should be interdicted and prohibited by an act of the State Legislature." If Col. Ingersoll says foolish things in his books or addresses, it is no reason why Congressman Morse should imitate him. Probably, no person was ever led to commit suicide by reading an intellectual or ethical defence of self-murder. Suicide is the result of disease, a diseased body or a diseased mind. To include it in the category of crimes on the statute book has not the slightest influence in preventing it. To stop the circulation of Col. Ingersoll's book by an act of the legislature would not only be an unwise invasion of liberty, but a fruitless attempt to correct an evil. To reduce suicide, we must eliminate its causes and make life more cheerful, healthful, and more worth the living. Tragedies of sorrow, disappointment, remorse, and disease, cannot be cured by an act of the legislature.

It is not uncommon to hear speculations on the permanence of religion. It would be just as reasonable to talk of the permanence of the intellect or the conscience, the permanence of the imagination, or any other constituent element of human nature. The vocabulary of religion, its forms and ceremonies, its symbols and organized institutions, have all their perishable elements; but the source of religion is inseparable from the nature of man. We do not mean that religion is the utterance alone of a single faculty. Intellect, imagination, conscience, emotion, the love of the beautiful and sublime, may all enter into it; but this only shows from what varied sources of our nature it is derived. As long as there is anything in the universe to worship, man will be a worshipper. So long as God speaks, so long man will answer. It is strange, then, that religious authority should have been made so often to depend upon some perishable external incident of religion rather than upon the spiritual consciousness of mankind.

"Who is thy neighbor?" is not to be answered geographically alone, as Jesus told us in his wonderful parable. The fact that we live next door to somebody else may establish sources of mutual interest, duty, friendship, and helpfulness. But our duty may as surely link us to a need of service or help somewhere on the other side of the globe. It is this consciousness that brotherhood is not a matter of race or distance which has animated the great missionary movements of the world. It is this consciousness which makes the heart of America thrill for suffering Armenia. It is this which leads a little band of King's Daughters in Illinois to send a contribution for the Mozoomdar Mission Fund half around the globe, or some remote "circle" to support Ramabai in her work among the widows of India. It is the same spirit which summons Unitarians to do something for the support of their mission in Japan. We are more easily affected by scenes of need or suffering which come immediately under our eyes. But for one sufferer whom we see there are a thousand needing our aid whom we do not see. Our Samaritanism, therefore, must be made a matter, not of passing emotion, but of conviction and principle. We must not be content to give our dole to the personal applicant, but to support those organized agencies which continually provide channels for the stream of human kindness, and which may carry its irrigating fruitfulness to the remotest parts of the world.

THE ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-EIGHTH DENOMINATION?

There are said to be one hundred and forty-seven religious denominations in the United States of America. Shall there be one hundred and forty-eight?

From its inception we have given the most cordial encouragement and support to the American Liberal Congress. We believe that liberals of different religious organizations may find in it opportunities for conference, inspiration, and co-operation such as were furnished by the Parliament of Religions and in the opening meeting of the Congress. We have felt, however, that it would be a great mistake to narrow its purpose and make it the one hundred and forty-eighth religious denomination in the United States.

We know that we have the sympathy of some of the board of directors and members of the Congress in this matter. But the New Unity, its official organ, undertakes, in its issue of April 18, to show that the Congress may be forced to take such a step. When we ask, however, on what pretext the Liberal Congress may thus be diverted from its original purpose, the only reason given is that it is necessary to establish it on a basis of "absolute mental freedom." It is worth while to examine the grounds of this assumption and excuse.

In the first place the principle thus asserted is not a new one. It is not a discovery which has suddenly burst upon the world through the Parliament of Religions. For many years the Free Religious Association stood for absolute mental liberty, though one could not discover in the article of New Unity that the Free Religious Association had ever existed.

Secondly, mental liberty is recognized and accepted by Unitarians to-day, without exception, as a fundamental condition. No other religious body knows better how much that liberty has cost, and none would be more unwilling to surrender what it has gained. The Liberal Congress is born free because Unitarianism and Free Religion have paid such a price for their freedom.

New Unity claims that the Western Unitarian Conference has indeed stood for this principle. It does not explain why it is necessary, then, to create a new denomination to stand for a principle already sufficiently asserted. We might expect rather that the Liberal Congress would support a denomination that had already proved its courage in this direction instead of asking it to dissolve, like the old man of the sea, into some other form, and to take some other label.

In Unitarianism the mental liberty of every individual is respected; and we should like to know of any case in which it is now withheld, or in which a member of a Unitarian church is persecuted for exercising it. Likewise, from the beginning of Unitarian attempts to organize, some seventy years ago, until the present time, thanks to the Congregational heritage, the liberty of the individual church has never been surrendered. The American Unitarian Association was at first an association of individuals, but it never imposed a creedal test of any kind. And, when the Association, some ten years ago, was brought into more direct relation to the churches by its delegate system of representation, eligibility was made to depend simply upon a monetary contribution made for two successive years. Simple as the constitution of the American Unitarian Association is,—so broad and catholic that nothing could be broader,—yet no church is compelled to subscribe to its constitution, but only to its funds. The mental liberty of every member of the Association and of every church contributing to it has been respected and protected, though we remind our contemporaries that mental liberty must not be confounded with the form of conviction which may be held under it. It means liberty for one wing as well as for another,—the liberty to be conservative as well as to be radical, the liberty to change one's opinions as well as to adhere to them.

When the American Liberal Congress was organized, it was not possible for it to find any broader foundation for religious liberty than that which Unitarians had already accepted. It could not find anything freer, because there was nothing freer to find. It could not go further in that direction, because there is nothing further to go to. It could simply imitate the basis of organization of the American Unitarian Association. And, as a practical proof of this, we point to the fact that each and every church or missionary association represented in the American Liberal Congress may acquire representation in the American Unitarian Association in essentially the same way. If the churches of the Liberal Congress stay out, it is not because they are obliged to, or because their liberty will be abridged if they enter, but because they do not want to come in. The Liberal Congress, therefore, has not created, it has simply adopted the Unitarian basis; and we may add that by far the larger number of churches represented in the Liberal Congress are Unitarian in their affiliation, and will remain so if the Congress is true to the unsectarian principle on which it was formed.

But we are told by New Unity that the Unitarian National Conference makes belief still the centre of religion. The theological statement of what the Unitarian churches "hold" is, indeed, the shortest of all such statements; yet in principle it is still a survival of the Westminster Catechism and the Nicene Creed.

These churches accept the religion of Jesus, holding, in accordance with his teaching, that practical religion is summed up in love to God and love to man.

New Unity does not deny that this is, in essence, different from the Westminster Catechism and the Nicene Creed; but it would have its readers believe that it is used for the same purpose,—to circumscribe fellowship and limit mental liberty. But against such a misinterpretation of its purpose the National Conference has, fortunately, protected itself in the paragraph which follows the simple declaration above:

The Conference recognizes the fact that its constituency is Congregational in tradition and polity. Therefore, it declares that nothing in this constitution is to be construed as an authoritative test; and we cordially invite to our working fellowship any who, while differing from us in belief, are in general sympathy with our spirit and our practical aims.

In this article the mental freedom of every member of the Conference is respected and guarded beyond all interference, and the invitation which is issued is not based on any subscription to even a ghost of a creed. It is one thing to describe a belief, and another to proscribe those who do not accept it. The National Conference has done the first: it has not done the second. On its seal the Liberal Congress bears the words "Justice, Love, Knowledge, Reverence, Humanity." It would be just as unfair to say that these words, which grandly describe its ideals, are put there to limit the liberty of its members; that they are, after all, nothing but the survival of the Westminster Catechism. We ask New Unity, therefore, in justice, to exercise this love, knowledge, reverence, and humanity in correcting its unfortunate misstatement.

And now that we have defended the principle of mental freedom, we hasten to add that no denomination can be successfully established on absolute mental freedom alone. If the Liberal Congress undertakes the experiment, it will surely fail. Something more must go with it. Absolute mental freedom furnishes a condition of conviction: it is not necessarily conviction itself. A religious body which means to keep alive must stand not only for mental liberty, but for the propagation of principles and convictions which mental liberty may permit us to cherish. Unitarianism stands for nothing less than this freedom, but it stands for something more. It stands for sublime convictions in God and humanity, which are the inspiration and the end of all its activity. Let these convictions die, and mental liberty would not be worth having. The animal that dies in an exhausted receiver may have room enough to move about, but it lacks air. Mental liberty may furnish space for the growth of a soul, but that soul will die without the inspiration of noble conviction.

If for asserting these convictions as the National Conference has done, without abridging or imperilling our liberty, we are to be accused of creed-making, we must bear the honorable stigma of such a reproach under the assuring conviction that it is not only an attribute of mental liberty to cherish convictions, but also to assert them.

Welcoming, as we have done, the American Liberal Congress as a new power for conference, inspiration, and co-operation, and recognizing what large possibilities it has in this direction, we shall deeply regret if, instead of strengthening the organic forces already existing, it becomes a wedge to divide the ranks of liberalism rather than a hand-clasping circle to bring them together.

WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.

The Western Unitarian Conference, as may be seen by the programme printed in our "Religious Intelligence," will hold its anniversary May 14-17, at the Third Church of Chicago. The programme has many aspects of interest, and we trust will be fruitful in inspiration as well as practical energy. The conditions for harmony are propitious. There are no theological seams that need to be brought together, and the only questions concerning which there is likely to be hesitation or difference relate to matters of policy and administration. The last meeting of the National Conference was memorable not so much for its action as for the spirit which prompted it,—the spirit which brought Unitarians from all sections of the country as well as from all points of the theological compass into a unity and harmony beyond all expectation. The practical outcome of that meeting, the most representative of all Unitarian gatherings, should be felt in all the anniversary meetings of the year. We do not mean that any formal ratification of that action is at all necessary. Our different conferences—State or interstate, local or national—have different constitutions and statements of object; but, essentially, and in spirit, they are all the same. Whether we take the National Conference, the American Unitarian Association, the Western Conference, or the State organizations, it is impossible to say that any one of them is any larger than the other in purpose or spirit, or that any one has a code of liberty that is not equally enjoyed by all. What we need is to take advantage now of every opportunity of co-operation and affiliation which occasion may offer. When the larger interests of liberal religion in this country are considered, all mere sectional questions vanish in comparison. Railroad and telegraph have vanquished what seemed to be unsurmountable distances, so that Boston and San Francisco are nearer together than were New York and Boston seventy years ago. As the wire and the rail have joined together the most remote sections in community of interest, so let the bonds of a closer fraternal and spiritual sympathy hold us all in strength of fellowship. The terms East and West, North and South, are useful and convenient distinctions for travelling purposes; but let them no longer represent any distinction of interest, purpose, or fraternal fellowship in the Unitarian body. The time has come for a closer, a more efficient co-operation. The American Unitarian Association will celebrate this year its seventieth anniversary. The Western Conference dates from 1852. Each of these bodies has an honorable history; but the question which concerns them both is not so much history, but futurity. It is the forward look rather than the backward one that should engage our hope and our determination.

THE CARE OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

The day has gone by when the work of women can be confined to the home fire-side. Indeed, it was never confined to that sacred locality, except in the imagination of certain people. A small minority of favored women may have been so guarded that they were under no necessity of facing the outdoor world, but plenty of their sisters have always had to fight the hard battle of life shoulder to shoulder with men. Even at the present day it is not alone the wives of Indian braves who have to do their share of hard work, but the women of cultivated Germany, Sweden, Norway, Austria, and other countries, have an immense amount of rough outdoor labor to perform, such as here is done only by men. It is greatly to the credit of American men that their wives and daughters and sisters have not been permitted to enter these rude fields of toil. But the same spur of necessity that drives Continental women to carry bricks and mortar, plough and harrow, and gather in the harvests, is felt here. If women will eat, they must work: there is no escape from the old law. Hunger knows no sex. If the factories have taken away the spinning and the weaving, women must earn their clothing in other ways than by the wheel and loom. It must therefore be accepted as an unavoidable conclusion that women, girls, and even children, will find their way into every employment for which they are fitted. It is surprising to know to how large an extent this is already true.

If women and children are to be considered legitimate employees in factories and mercantile establishments, it is evident that there should be legal provision made for their proper care, especially as they are not allowed to take part themselves in making laws for their own defence. Mercantile firms have been too apt to look on their labor as a makeshift or a temporary phase of the labor problem, and no permanent and equitable arrangements have been made for securing for them the best facilities for doing their work. This has been exceedingly unwise as a business measure; for, as a piece of economy, it must pay to give every employee a chance to do the best of which she is capable. This neglect also betrays a lack of chivalrous feeling and humane instinct. It has been prompted by cupidity and carelessness combined. And, as the years go by, it becomes evident that, if the employers do not voluntarily care for their female and juvenile employees as they should, the State must be called on to compel them to do their duty in this respect.

Law-makers do not make such regulations of their own volition. They must be urged on by public-spirited men and women, such as are at the present time urging the New York legislature to pass a measure to regulate the employment of women and children in stores in large cities, and to provide State inspection of the same. When such people as Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell, Felix Adler, Rev. W. S. Rainsford, Leighton Williams, Grace H. Dodge, Alice S. Woodbridge, and a dozen others, give not only their names, but their influence and their hard personal work, to push such a measure, it shows two things: first, that such legislation is needed; and, second, that it will be secured.

It may be well to enumerate the provisions of the bill which has been presented at Albany as a model for others who wish to secure similar reforms. The leading provisions are as follows:—

1. Children under eighteen and women under twenty-one shall not work in stores after nine o'clock at night or more than sixty hours during the week.
2. No child shall be so employed who is under fourteen. Child-employees under sixteen shall be registered in the stores.
3. Children under sixteen who cannot read and write English shall only be employed in stores during vacation time.
4. Employees in stores shall be provided with toilet-rooms that are sanitary and clean and separate for the sexes. Places for women and children to eat lunch in shall be provided, apart from water closets. The lunch hour shall be not less than forty-five minutes.
5. Women and children shall not be employed in unsanitary store-basements.
6. Store-keepers shall provide seats for female employees, and permit a reasonable use of them.
7. The law shall be enforced by the State Factory Inspectors. A violation of it shall be a misdemeanor.

With such a law thoroughly enforced, women may work for their daily bread, when necessary, and at the same time retain their health and their self-respect.

JAMES II. 1-6.

A bit of modern exegesis of this passage is furnished by Mrs. Isabel F. Hapgood in an article in the Independent on "Church-going in Russia:—"

Even the best of the few free-pew churches in our great American cities do not possess any such claims to uniting the rich and the poor in brotherly worship as do the Russian churches, with few exceptions, because the consideration of clothing, which seems never to occur to the poor Russian or to his rich neighbor, is a very powerful one here. That the rich are to blame for it no one who has once been "looked over" by a fashionable congregation, or by that congregation's deputy, the haughty sexton, is likely to doubt. A friend of mine once tried an ingenious experiment on one of these autocratic sextons in the course of her investigation of church manners. Dressing herself as badly as possible, she betook herself at an early hour to one of the most fashionable of the New York churches. The sexton surveyed her, and told her loftily there were no seats. "But I can see that there are," she remonstrated. "Other people are being shown to seats: the house is nearly empty still."

"There are no seats here—for such as you. There are plenty of suitable churches elsewhere where you can go," retorted the autocrat.

She retreated, entered her carriage (which she had prudently left round the corner), drove home at full speed, arrayed herself like the lily of the field, figuratively speaking, and drove up again to that church door, with as much dash as circumstances permitted. She applied to the autocrat. Though it was now late, and seats were presumably scarce, he gave her one of the best, on the middle aisle, and did it with a suave courtesy which was quite undisturbed by any recognition of her face. This incident had a bad effect on the rash experimenter's attendance at church thereafter, as was, perhaps, natural, however injudicious it may have been to confound the doorkeeper with the institution.

TRIBUTES TO DR. MARTINEAU.

Several persons have written to express their regret that absence from home prevented them from sending greetings to Dr. Martineau in time for our last issue. Among these persons were Rev. E. Winchester Donald, D.D., of Trinity Church, Boston; Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., of Buffalo; and Rev. Joseph T. Duryea, D.D., of Omaha. Dr. Donald says:—

"My own personal indebtedness to Dr. Martineau is so great, and the opportunities for acknowledging the debt are so few, that I should have been glad of the privilege you accorded me to say how truly I reverence his character and how thoroughly I appreciate his work."

Dr. Vincent says:—

"I have been a reader of James Martineau for thirty years. His breadth, vigor, poetic genius, and spiritual insight have proved a great stimulus to me. While I should be compelled to dissent from many of his opinions, as a student and as a Christian, I have found him a source of inspiration and strength."

Musings.

MEETINGS have been held in many of our churches to pass resolutions condemning the massacre of Armenian Christians in Turkey. Last Sunday such a meeting was held in the First Church of Dorchester, the oldest of the Boston churches, and which, like the church of Plymouth, Mass., was organized in England before coming to this country in 1630. At this meeting the interesting fact was brought to mind that the "unspeakable Turk" was a source of trouble and anxiety to the American colonists. In the Dorchester church records there is the following entry, under date of Jan. 28, 1694:—

January ye 28 93⁴ ther was a generale contribucon for some that are in captivity in turkey: peres Savage and Thomas Thecher and was given in Dorchester six pound ten shillings ten pence and it was delivered into ye hands of deacon Toplif to deliver it to mr Samuel Sewell esqr.

Another entry, within four months of being two hundred years old, reads:—

Agust ye 11 95 was A great contribucon in many churches for sune parsons yt wer in slavery Amonge ye turks and in ouer congregacon was given 9 pound six shillings & nine pence.

It was not uncommon for the Boston congregations to be called together to consider the redemption of captives, though most of them related to captivity among the Indians; but the two entries quoted are interesting bits of international history. The amount subscribed on these occasions shows the generous self-sacrifice of the early churches. It was a little hard on the colonists that they should have had to redeem captives from the Indians on the one side and from the Turks on the other. I cannot be sure that the clerk was guilty of any intentional contempt in writing Turk with a small "t" instead of putting a chi-rographic turban on the initial letter.

So it was interesting to me to think that the Dorchester parish, under the call of its pastor, Rev. E. R. Shippen, had come together once more to pay tribute to the Turk,—not a tribute of gold or silver, but a contribution of indignation and moral protest against the terrible outrages on the Armenians. But how changed are the relations of things in these two hundred years! The Indian in Massachusetts, with the exception of a few metaphorical Indians at Gay Head, has passed away; and the question now which the churches and our government has to consider is not the redemption of whites from the Indians, but the redemption of Indians themselves from the captivity of ignorance and tradition. Likewise with the Turk the New England churches have assumed a very different relation. Two United States iron-clads are lying off the coast of Asia Minor. They represent the power of a nation of over sixty millions of people, and suggest the contribution of iron or lead which would be made in case diplomatic negotiations failed to secure the liberty of Americans held captive in Turkey. But a more direct relation is sustained by the New England churches. They have not simply contributed to redeem their fellow-citizens: they have given thousands of dollars in the cause of education in Turkey, and missionaries have devoted themselves with self-sacrificing labor and arduous service to this task. Turkey may not be grateful for this service; but, through it, it is gaining some of the products of nineteenth-century civilization, which Orientalism cannot furnish. Still another item of interest is worth mentioning. The Dorchester church not only asked the government of the United States to make a moral representation to Turkey concerning the Armenian massacre, but it expressed the hope that England, as one of the signatory powers of the Berlin treaty, might be able to effect reforms in Armenia. As the Dorchester church was organized in Plymouth, England, it was not unbecoming in it thus to recognize the historic tie which still binds it to the English government.

Brevities.

Philadelphia is not in Massachusetts, as foreign readers might infer from a statement to that effect in a few numbers of last week's Register. But there is a good deal of brotherly love in Massachusetts; and Dr. Furness, who lives in Philadelphia, has helped to promote it.

Chicago has a woman policeman; and her weapon is not the club or a revolver, but a broom. In other words, Miss Jane Addams, the founder and manager of Hull House, has accepted an appointment on the sanitary police force. Miss Addams's renovating influences have been felt all through the district in which Hull House is established.

Rev. Howard N. Brown has not only been called to the pulpit of King's Chapel, but to the pulpit of the Christian Register, which he fills so admirably this week. It is not the first time he has addressed our readers, and we hope it will not be the last. Whether he goes to King's Chapel or stays at Brookline, he will continue to be a minister of the Christian Register.

The First Parish, Dorchester, in spite of the financial depression, has raised more money this year for the American Unitarian Association than for many years. This is owing to the energy, zeal, and business method of its new pastor, Rev. Eugene R.

Shippen, who established a thorough canvass of the parish, and was cordially seconded and supported in this work by his congregation.

Rev. Austin S. Garver of Worcester has been generously granted a year's leave of absence by the society of Worcester, and, accompanied by his wife, will travel on the Continent of Europe and visit Egypt and the Holy Land. We congratulate these birds of passage upon the opportunity that is before them, and we have no doubt they will come back again enriched in mind and body for the work they shall take up again.

The Congregationalist defends the individual cup in the communion service. All right. But we hope there will be no agitation for an individual collection-box. We would remind the brethren that there is no danger of physical disease in this direction. The only danger is that the cultivation of individual pocket-books may prevent that healthy communism of generosity which is such a delightful feature of a general contribution-box.

Harper's Weekly speaks to the point when it says: "It has always been the just pride of the American people that they are the only great nation in the world which does not need a large army or navy. Our moral authority, well taken care of and asserted with dignity, will be far more powerful than thousands of big guns. Shall we surrender this inestimable privilege to a few reckless ranters, who shout for a spirited foreign policy which is ruffianism, and for a delusion of greatness which means degradation and dishonor?"

The birthday of Dr. Furness is always joyfully observed in the First Unitarian Church of Philadelphia; and this year the pastor, Rev. Joseph May, made Dr. Furness and Dr. Martineau the subject of a sermon in which he paid a tribute to the character, work, and influence of these two great leaders of religious thought and preachers of liberal religion. Speaking of Dr. Furness's work, Mr. May said: "I think it is actually true that no one between 1835 and 1855 did more—though so quietly—to loosen the bonds of oppressive creeds, and especially to illustrate and vindicate the liberal, which is the only true and only fruitful attitude of mind toward the Scriptures, particularly of the New Testament. The peculiar theory of the miracles ascribed to Jesus to which Dr. Furness adheres gives him to some of you now the air of a conservative thinker. As a fact, his position as a commentator on the Gospels was so radical as to be revolutionary. Its principles were exactly those of the so-called 'higher criticism' of to-day. It was and is simply that of a free, unfettered mind, respecting its own endowment of rationality, and bringing to all the subjects of study equally the same serious, impartial, and thorough spirit and methods of inquiry."

THE MINISTERIAL UNION LIBRARY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The Ministerial Union Library, in Room 11, Unitarian Building, has been given by the Union to the Meadville Theological School. Those having books out are requested to return them at once. The person who has Vol. II. of Schrader's "Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament" is requested not to forget to return it.

GEORGE W. COOKE.

THE INCREASE OF CRIME.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I have read and reread Mr. F. H. Wines's article in the Christian Register of March 28; and I wish I could be sure that he is right in regard to there being no substantial increase in crime in the last ten years, especially of a serious nature. I take it for granted Mr. Wines does not take in the crime of murder. The increase in this crime was simply appalling. From 1882, with 1,467 murders, we rise to nearly 7,000 murders in 1892; while last year over 9,800 murders were committed in the United States. Of the number of hangings in the ten years, 518 were in the Northern States, 728 in the Southern States; while the number of lynchings were in the North 426, and in the South 1,150. In 1882 8 per cent. suffered the extreme penalty of the law; in 1891, 2 per cent. only; while the lynchings outnumbered the legal executions. The above figures are taken from Hon. N. M. Curtis's speech in Congress and the Chicago Tribune.

I shall be much gratified to find out that they are lies. Only please let me know.

W. G. PUDDFOOT.

REPLY BY MR. WINES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

My article on the increase of crime avowedly was confined to the prison population. I said, "Precise inferences drawn from the number of convicts in prison are unwarranted." I adhere, however, to my general conclusion that "there has been no substantial increase of crime during the decade from 1880 to 1890." Your correspondent wishes to know if I include the crime of murder. I do. The figures which he quotes are, as he says, appalling; but, before they can be accepted, they need verification. On what are they based? How were they collected? What do they include? I have no information on this subject, but the statement that there were 9,800 murders committed in the United States in 1892 does not commend itself to me as exact or accurate. Without proof, I do not believe it. This is equivalent to twenty-seven murders for every day in the year. Now, murders are, presumably, well covered in the Associated Press despatches. Any ordinary reader of the daily telegrams in the newspapers knows that he has never read of so many murders in any one day in his life, let alone every day in the year. Or the figure given is equivalent to between two and three murders last year in every county in all the States and Territories of the Union. I take it, of course, that by murders are meant homicides, justifiable and unjustifiable. How many of them were accidental or occurred in the discharge of some official duty does not appear. On its face the statement is sensational and reckless. If the facts are known, they can be given by States and counties, so as to admit of local verification. Until that is done, no good citizen need lose any sleep through fear of an impending catastrophe due to the growing recklessness of life in America, which I believe to be a myth. If it were a fact, it ought to leave some trace in the prison statistics of the census. How is the absence of any such trace to be accounted for? It would matter comparatively little if the item which alarms your correspondent did not find its way into foreign journals, and give great scandal to the enemies of free, democratic institutions in Europe. That would not matter, either, if it were true; but what evidence has any one of its truth? I will express an opinion as to the evidence whenever it is forthcoming.

FRED H. WINES.

MR. DILLINGHAM AND THE CALHOUN SCHOOL.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

All your readers must have been interested in the story which our friend Mr. Dillingham has given of the Tuskegee Conference and the work that is going on in Alabama in behalf of the needy and ignorant colored people. It ought to be a matter of still further interest that Mr. Dillingham and his wife are devoting themselves to this same work at Calhoun, where their sister really gave her life to establish a school in one of the most neglected counties of the South. I have spoken of the work as though it were for the blacks. It is truly for all of us, blacks and whites, and for the country. If dense ignorance and a degraded type of life is a menace to free institutions, then surely the men and women who carry such a school as Calhoun to fight this ignorance, and to set homes where now there are only one-room cabins, are defenders of our liberties. Do they not deserve whatever co-operation is needful to make their work effective?

May I call the attention of your readers to the fact that this Southern work is precisely in the line of what our liberal churches stand for. We claim to represent a religion of character. And it is for the making of character, pure and simple, that Calhoun, like Hampton and Tuskegee, exists. Indeed, here we have one of our own ministers, who sees a better opportunity than he knows anywhere else to spread "practical religion," as "summed up in love to God and love to man." I wish that we were all as sure as he may be that our efforts go straight to the mark!

Mr. Dillingham, now at the North, has the hardest part of his responsibility in securing the few thousands of dollars necessary to maintain the school. I write in the hope that our friendly people will rally to his support. I understand that he will be very glad to address meetings in our churches, and explain the situation at the South, both in its perils and in its hopeful possibilities. He will be grateful for any gifts, however small. A few dollars at Calhoun or Tuskegee go a good way toward making men and women. The cost of ten Harvard students for a single year would carry Calhoun. Any communications addressed to Mr. Dillingham, at 25 Beacon Street or at the Register office, will be sure to please him.

CHARLES F. DOLE.

HELP FOR THE POOR WHITES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The readers of the Christian Register are quite familiar with the work that is being done for the colored people at Hampton, Tuskegee, and Calhoun. It is, beyond all doubt, an important work, and deserves the generous support of all lovers of humanity. But there is a work to be done among the poor whites of the South which is equally important and equally deserving of support. It is not necessary to go beyond the mountain region of North Carolina to realize this. The "old North State" has always had a larger percentage of illiterate whites than any other Southern State; and, while the Presbyterians are fast waking up to the need of doing something to enlighten the great mass of ignorance, the Unitarians have thus far done nothing. That much needs to be done is a fact patent to the most superficial observation. The public school is yet in its experimental stage. Asheville, though a city boasting of fine hotels, public buildings, and private residences, has no high school; and even the primary, intermediate, and grammar departments of the public school are open for only six or seven months of the year, the people feeling that education is a luxury they can hardly afford, while in the country districts the "free school," as it is commonly called, is seldom open for more than three months.

In all this mountain region there are large families of poor whites dwelling in cabins of one or, at most, two rooms, with no books, magazines, or papers. Words cannot describe the narrow, humdrum, merely animal life they live year in and year out, shut in by mountains and the low-roofed cabins they call their homes. Their condition appeals strongly to the sympathy of every feeling heart. What though the need of something higher and better is unconscious, is it not all the more pathetic because it is unconscious? And should not we, "whose souls are lighted with wisdom from on high," do what we can, be it ever so little, to awaken and satisfy the need?

Last winter the writer and his wife opened a free night school for the poor whites of "Spoke Branch," a beautiful valley lying four miles north-east of Asheville, which from first to last was attended by about twenty boys and girls, whose ages ranged from six to twenty years. The severe weather, altogether unprecedented for this part of the country, interfered somewhat with our work, as many of the smaller children were not properly clothed; yet we feel that a good beginning has been made. The good work begun should not be allowed to languish. What is most needed at the present time is a small free circulating library, comprising books of travel, history, and juvenile literature. Second-hand copies of the Youth's Companion, Harper's Weekly, Little Men and Women, and similar publications could be used to good advantage.

Will not every reader of the Christian Register under whose eye this may fall take it as a personal appeal, and send something for the library which we hope soon to have? Who will be the first to respond? All books or magazines or papers intended for the poor whites of "Spoke Branch" may be sent to Rev. Henry A. Westall, Asheville, N.C.

THE REMEMBERED DREAM.

BY HATTIE TYNG GRISWOLD.

The dream remains, the sorrow all is gone.
 What time the sorrow seemed the chiefest part
 Of all that past my heart most doted on
 Is not so far removed from my heart
 But that a vivid memory of it stays,
 And changes all my life; for that old dream
 Reached to the bed-rock of the fair old days,
 And tinged them with the light of its own beam.

But now the dream remains, the sorrow gone;
 And all my heart goes forward, and not back.
 To the new goals of being I press on,
 Nor glance too often at the backward track.
 To daily ever with remembered woe
 Is weakness; and the flight of th' long years
 Has caused upon this grave the grass to grow,
 Albeit 'twas watered oft with scalding tears.

O heart, thy dream remains, thy perfect dream;
 Sweet as the kisses of thy first true love
 Thrilling along the years, the fair hours seem
 When in its bonds my fluttering heart still strove.
 But 'neath its poppies let it silent lie.
 Its joy I knew, its pain my soul did share;
 Yet from the depths of yonder star-dusted sky
 There falls a hope that saves me from despair.

SUMMER IS COMING.

BY MARY F. BUTTS.

The delicacy of May in Northern and Eastern New England is exceedingly piquant to one who loves to seek for shy beauty instead of having bold charms thrust upon his notice. The faint green of the willows, contrasted with the rich brown of the alders; the misty tops of the tasselled white birches; the dark hues of the spruce, balsam fir, and pine; and, running through all like threads of coral, the red of blooming maples,—what could be more fascinating? This for the effect in mass, but the details might occupy one for many a charmed hour.

Cold and coy has been the spring. One feels as if violets were a joy of the future, and does not dream that the fragile pink bells of the anemone are above ground. But there come two or three oppressively warm days, then days of pouring rain, and, lo! the miracle is wrought. The dear accustomed visitors were all ready, and presently Nature opened the door and let them out. One is startled by seeing violets in bud, each little blue-hooded head a-tremble on its stem, and a wind-flower, a mere infant, to be sure, yet with its decorated foliage and rose-streaked corolla in perfect order,—a spring baby in a baby's own garb. One loves these little brave adventurers as one could not care for California roses. They are a solace in the cloudy weather, and seem to have come to cheer us while yet the world is so bare.

Although the careless or indifferent onlooker perceives only the obtrusive arrivals, to the seeing eye it is apparent that there is a thronging, hurrying life all about us. The willows, to be sure, are in no danger of being overlooked; but they are by no means the only outdoor folk who adorn before properly clothing themselves. "The habit of sending up flower-stalks or putting out blossoms is," says Grant Allen, "far more common than the casual observer would be inclined to imagine. The majority of spring-flowering trees have their blossoms in those large yet inconspicuous masses which we call catkins; while others, like the elm, have them in dense clusters, so closely seated on the bough that comparatively few passers-by notice them." Almost all our larger native trees are catkin-bearers,—oaks, alders, birches, hazel, beech, osier, poplar, and aspen. One might pass by the white birch every day of its blossom period, and not notice the delicate catkins; but there they are in plain sight, if one looks, but less conspicuous than the tiny green satin leaves that are just getting under way, giving a suggestion of mist from their exceeding delicacy. "In every case the reason for the flower preceding the plant seems to be the same. The catkin-bearing plants are chiefly, if not always, wind-fertilized; and they have their stamens on one tree and their pistils on another, thus producing the highest possible degree of cross-fertilization." We all know what showers of yellow pollen fall from the pretty tasselled twigs that we bring to our rooms for a spring decoration. It is thus that Nature provides against waste, saying to her carrier, the wind, "You are a most extravagant fellow; but you shall do my errands for me, in spite of your profligate ways."

The early bloomers have made ample provision for their spring outlay by laying up the summer before a stock of material,—some in fleshy bulbs, some in bark and woody tissue. Indeed, the plants and trees are excellent managers, and might well be imitated by less thrifty folk. As day after day we go out to meet and greet the wee spring people, we find at each visit some new-comer. Now it is the saxifrage, white-clothed and graceful, stationed on a rich moss-cushion, that contrasts charmingly with its pretty blossoms. The low-branching blueberry or sugar-berry bears clusters of compact little blossom-buds on the tip of each small twig. One takes a bite at the slightly acid buds, and is taken back to those babyish days when we shared the "browse" with the cows and sheep. A little brown individual, so unobtrusive as to pass unnoticed by eyes bent on bright effects, challenges attention on the score of old acquaintanceship. It is the sweet-fern, ridged with little buds, fast swelling to the bursting point in the sunshine. How exquisite is the odor that escapes as we give it a pinch and set free its pent-up sweetness! But, speaking of odors, there will be by and by a treasury of spices, all in one great dishevelled bush out by the pasture bars in the edge of the spruce woods. It is now spiked all over in the most aggressive and uncompromising manner, like a stern old father determined to keep all intruders from the pink-cheeked daughters soon to make their appearance. Among the thorns one finds now and then a leaf-bud which yields the well-loved perfume. I speak of the sweet-brier, which on the 16th of May scarcely shows a hint of life.

The bayberries still hoard their Quaker-hued fruit, but are sending out rudimentary buds up and down the crabbed branches. They, too, are of the spice family. Indeed, our wild pastures are odoriferous as Persian gardens, if only we realized it.

By the way, the sweet-fern is a catkin-bearer, not generally known as such, I imagine.

One of the most graceful of the May growths is the wild raspberry, whose highly decorative foliage is veined and notched in the prettiest manner imaginable. It springs up in moist places, in company with the ferns and other bog-loving growths. In this latitude, and in a cold season like this, the fern tribe are just beginning at the 18th of May to throw off their woolly blankets and show their fronds in miniature. Anything more "cunning" than a little group of baby-ferns I am not acquainted with. Their round heads seem to be covered with soft blond hair; and they are so snugly and cosily wrapped that one feels as if there were something human about them. The wild strawberry vine is up and dressed; and the long, trailing sprays of blackberry that have survived the winter have sent out leaf-clusters up and down their graceful length. It is between the second and third week in May when the first dandelion appears, rather a spent and pallid herald at that. But "greens" have been sought not unsuccessfully by small boys, and greatly to the satisfaction of bilious folk, who long for their appearance.

The larch, most individual of trees, has its elegant tufts all ready for display. The balm-of-gilead is dressed from "top to toe" with the jauntiest tassels, while its highly polished foliage is slowly unfolding and the rich surfaces glistening in the morning sunshine. The horse-chestnut has just shaken out its masses of wrinkled green silk. So tightly pressed are the great palmate leaves inside the protecting sheaths that at first they present a curiously creased and limp appearance as they free themselves, almost at full size. The haste to grow, which has been real, though not apparent, will now be seen from day to day. One is bewildered, on getting up mornings, to see the change that a single night has seemed to make. It would appear that the vegetable folk are running races, each trying to outdo the other. The dandelion is pretty sure to get ahead just now, and before we get used to the gay company the fields will be covered with dandelion clocks. The saucy breezes will amuse themselves with pulling a hair at a time from poor old Dandelion, till the little head is bald. But that is exactly what the plant desires, for the wind is its seed-sower. Every one of the winged seeds goes flying off to get itself planted in some desirable spot. The seed appendages have been developed, the naturalists tell us, for this very purpose of distribution. Says one of the wise ones: "The reason why plants take all this trouble to get their seeds dispersed is a simple one. Why should they not let them drop out upon the ground just underneath their own branches? For the very same reason that the farmer does not crop the same land with corn or turnips ten years running. The plants had unconsciously discovered rotation of crops ages before the agriculturists consciously hit upon it."

THE TENEMENT-HOUSE PROBLEM.

BY ELIZA STOWE TWITCHELL.

The untiring devotion of our philanthropic men and women in seeking to ameliorate the cruel condition of human lives chained to slavery in sweat-shops and disease-breeding tenement-houses proclaims the fact that they, too, discern the ominous cloud now spreading over the fair sky of our republic. Their sympathy is not only deeply stirred for suffering humanity; but even self-interest has revealed to them at last the link which unites all in a common brotherhood,—that the sufferings of one class must be alleviated, else, eventually, a stern Nemesis is aroused to punish all for neglected opportunities.

One glance in a Boston directory at the long list of societies and organizations devoted to the relief of the poor or the elevation of the masses might soothe one into believing that our progress toward a higher civilization is upward and sure. But the lesson is incomplete without a survey of the reports of political corruption and the state of that unfortunate class whose sickening and despairing condition is turning fair humanity—made in the image of God—into hideous shapes and revolting sights.

Surely, there is a "spirit of the age" working behind all this which is clearly discerned by "the pure in heart" and those rare souls who truly "love their fellow-men." This age, with lavish hand, has scattered blessings upon us innumerable,—invention, science, art, government, philosophy, and Christianity,—set in the midst of bounteous, rejuvenating nature, and then, with kind, but solemn voice, demands an account of such high stewardship. Will memorized words, though repeated under vaulted roof and upon graceful, bended knee, "that we have left undone those things" which education and stewardship demand, excuse us from seeking to know the will of the Father, and doing it? To pray is not enough, to give charity is not enough; for "no device can reach the core of this misery that does not make justice paramount."

And what is justice but liberty,—the liberty or right of each to his own physical powers, his free religious thought; his right to a voice in making the laws which govern him; and also his equal right, with all the rest, to the earth? Deny him this, the others are platitudes. No one who loves liberty will dispute these propositions in theory. They are challenged only when about to be applied, or when their power to change this very nightmare of civilization into a reign of peace and plenty is asserted. What does it mean, this crowding of the population of the world into great cities, making life a long holiday for some, with a surfeit of luxuries, and causing almost unending toil, privation, and loss of hope to others? We see the fact whenever we care to look; but the determining cause escapes us, for it is hidden under complex relations. The mighty force working to-day through modern labor-saving machinery, subdivisions of labor, and facilities for transportation, is producing wealth upon an enormous scale; and, as this force yearly increases, so also, proportionately, rises the value of land, expressing in annual economic rent the net benefit to each community of these social, industrial, and natural advantages. To share this ground rent in common would be to equalize these general blessings of civilization and of nature, giving to each child of God an equal share in the value of land, which carries with it also an equal share in the general benefits of the accumulated knowledge of mankind, leaving to individual labor and capital all that they produce.

Ground rents represent premiums for different degrees of advantage for each location. Should we pay our brothers premiums for advantages conferred upon us by the progress of civilization and bounties of the Creator? If each were to pay the market price for the advantages of his location (ground rent) into the public treasury, be it much or little, and receive in return an equal share with all the rest, natural opportunities and social advantages would be equalized, leaving individual capital, talent, energy, and industry to reap according as they sow. This is not charity, but justice,—putting the Golden Rule into our civil polity, seeking first the kingdom of righteousness, after which is promised a reign of peace on earth.

The greed to seize this unearned increment is seen in the concentration of valuable land in the hands of a few. 10 per cent. of the population in cities own all the land in them or land mortgages; and, if to this be added the fact that only one-third of this land is in use, and also that there is now no fertile land in our country freely open to labor (because of this incentive to prosper by increasing unearned increment), here is found a pressure strong enough to mass people in great cities, enormously increasing rents, and lowering wages and profits. To support and sustain this gigantic monopoly in ground rent, a constant and unending tribute is laid upon the great mass of people,—the real wealth-producers,—so heavy as to almost stop the wheels of industry, afflicting them with unjust burdens, while it presses the weak and unfortunate into tenement-houses, sweat-shops, pauperism, and crime. "It is this," says Henry George, "that turns the blessings of material progress into a curse. It is this that crowds human beings into noisome cellars and squalid tenement-houses, that fills prisons and brothels, that goads men with want and consumes them with greed, that robs women of the grace and beauty of womanhood, that takes from little children the joy and innocence of life's morning. Civilization so based cannot continue. The eternal laws of the universe forbid it. Ruins of dead empires testify, and the witness that is in every soul answers that it cannot be. It is something grander than benevolence, something more august than charity: it is Justice herself that demands of us to right this wrong,—Justice that will not be denied, that cannot be put off; Justice that with the scales carries the sword."

PROF. JAMES EDWARD OLIVER.

The Unitarian Society of Ithaca, with the Cornell University and the educational world, sustain a very great loss in the death of Prof. James Edward Oliver, who passed away on the morning of March 27, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. Born in Portland, Me., of Quaker ancestry, the most of his childhood was spent at Lynn, Mass., whither the mortal part of him was taken for its last rest. He was a graduate of Harvard University in the class of 1849, being the class poet of the year. He was a favorite pupil of Prof. Benjamin Peirce, the distinguished mathematician and astronomer. Immediately upon his graduation he became an associate of Prof. Peirce, who was consulting astronomer for the Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac. Here it was that he made one of that company of scientific men of whom are Profs. Ferril, Newcomb, Van Vleck, Safford, Runkle, etc. He was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, a fellow of the American Philosophical Society, of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and of the National Academy. He was as well a member of the Council of the American Mathematical Society, belonged to the Phi Beta Kappa and Sigma Chi honorary societies and to the Alpha Delta Phi Fraternity. In 1871 he became Assistant Professor of Mathematics at Cornell University, succeeding to the full professorship in 1873, which position he held at the time of his death. With Profs. Waite and Jones he was the joint author of a work on algebra and trigonometry, and contributed articles of special interest and ability to scientific and other journals; but his chief greatness was in himself,—a beautiful, true, gracious spirit, who blest those knowing him with many an inspiration to goodness.

President Schurman has written of him: "A blameless and devoted life has gone from us. I admired the reach and sweep of his intellect, his high sense of honor and justice, the absolute integrity of his character, the guilelessness and simplicity of his nature, which always reminded me—genius though he was—of one of those little children of whom is the kingdom of heaven. I cannot now weigh the greatness of his loss to the university which his genius adorned. Prof. Oliver ranked among the very first mathematicians of America. But at this time one thinks only of the broad-minded, noble, faithful man who always stood for the right, who served his generation by doing loyally the duty that lay at hand, and who endeared himself to his fellow-workers, young and old alike, by his patience, fidelity, and inexhaustible goodness of heart. His memory will always be green at Cornell. May his example be an inspiration to those who remain!"

Prof. Burr says: "He was always and absolutely fair. His was no fairness of motive alone: he had the genius which sees things as they are. And this fairness—and herein lay the charm of his character—was tinged neither with severity nor with indifference. He was tender as he was just, helpful as he was conscientious. He had no love for debate; and under his mild words partisanship gave place, even in the fieriest heart, to the pure love of truth. . . . No cause could be so desperate, no culprit so discredited, that his conscience was not keen to see and prompt to point out any loophole or excuse, any claim to a more generous hearing. For what he could say nothing, there was nothing to say; and harsher natures might go forward secure. . . . In religion he was, as he used himself to say, 'by temperament and training a mystic'; and it was easy for him to sympathize with the most diverse faiths. He could profoundly understand the yearning for miracle; but, personally, his reverence never obscured his reason. All his life the influence of Samuel Johnson, who had been his pastor in early manhood, lingered with him; and there was about his own rationalism the same flavor of poetic devotion. . . . Besides all those who were bound to him as student to master or friend to friend, an army of others will mourn his loss,—an army of changing students, to whom he never spoke a word, but who—as many a time and oft, just as the university clock was striking the hour, there dashed by them the little sturdy, gray-headed figure, with the cheery, fearless face—have thanked God and will thank him always for one absolutely honest man."

Prof. Corson says: "It was as a man unswervingly and spontaneously loyal to the good and the true, with a childish simplicity of character, with a benevolent and beneficent spirit (all of which qualities every one felt who came into any kind of relationship with him) that his influence was great and most benign. His being was the highest form of his teaching and educating power. Whatever his method as a teacher, in the ordinary pedagogic sense of the word 'method,' his best method was himself, with his enthusiasm, his thoroughness, his painstaking, his considerateness, his perfect genuineness, his unvarying kindness and fairness. However methods may be, it is the eternal in a teacher which makes the true educator."

It may not be generally known that Prof. Oliver's literary cultivation, his literary insight and taste, were of a very superior order. His deep interest in man's spiritual nature led him to poetry as the best embodiment in art of that nature. His knowledge of English poetry was extensive; and he was susceptible to the subtle suggestiveness of poetic form, such as is exhibited in Tennyson, for example,—especially in his "In Memoriam," which poem was a great favorite with him. He loved Shakspeare, and at one time in his life was regarded as a superior Shakspearean reader. He loved Browning's poetry for its psychological wealth, its great spiritual vitality. He "thought nobly of the soul," and had a most vital belief in its indestructibility.

He was ever the same dear, good man. He seemed to be entirely free from moods, and no intimate friend was ever made to feel or to suspect any change in his friendly feelings toward him. And his greeting of a friend was ever with the same full heartiness. The injunction of the apostle, "Let brotherly love continue," was certainly realized in him, if it was ever realized in any man. So decided, in the best sense of the word, was his character that all who knew him knew where he would be likely to stand in any question that came up,—social, political, moral, religious, or any other.

He was not swayed by circumstances or any personal considerations: there was an ever-present inward standard which determined his views of things.

Religion with him was not a matter of belief, but of being, though he had his religious beliefs, and some very decided ones. Chief among them was that spiritual truth can be attained only through one's spiritual being; that only so far as a man is the truth can he vitally know the truth, and so far as a man is not the truth is the inward oracle obscured. He did not accept the "orthodox" view of Jesus; but Jesus was to him the greatest illuminator of the inward oracle who has appeared among men, and he was that by virtue of his being the fullest realization of the spiritual potentialities of human nature.

I never knew a better, more lovable man than Prof. Oliver. And his goodness was so spontaneous. It was the set of his being. He seemed to me to be almost without sin. He could have justly taken to himself the words of Saint Augustine: "Jam non consilio bonus, sed more eo perductus, ut non tantum recte facere possim, sed nisi, recte facere non possim."

He was one of the most devoted and helpful members of the Ithaca Unitarian Society. He gave largely of his means for its support; but his greatest giving was himself, as teacher in a class in ethics which met in the body of the church every Sunday morning after the sermon, and as helper in every other way in which he might be able to lend a hand. From his bed of sickness, which proved to be his bed of death, he sent to us at our annual meeting this message, thinking of the great burden we had borne in building our new church,—a burden still upon us: "I am proud of you for the pluck you have shown. You'll win: perseverance in patient work always wins." His heart was deeply and tenderly ours in all our work and aspiration, and we feel most keenly his loss. Kindness was the law of his life; his religion, the religion of humanity; his deep passion for liberty, great, in order that men might attain unto the truth as a living reality transforming their lives. He trusted the universe as an unfolding order, as the working out of some everlasting love; and so he was

"How pure at heart and sound in head,
With what divine affections bold."

He was indeed a Christ-like man. His beautiful goodness, sweet as a little child, taking all hearts in its charm, makes one feel, in the high moods which his memory awakens, that, if extravagance, it is the extravagance of a very pure, lofty love, to say:—

"Yet in these ears, till hearing dies,
One set slow bell will seem to toll
The passing of the sweetest soul
That ever looked with human eyes."

Sore at heart for his going from us, we are most grateful that he was of our fellowship for so long a time, and that for us he is not dead, but in old memories ever beautiful.

NEW YORK LETTER.

It was hardly a month ago, on April 9, that three hundred thousand children in three hundred and twelve public schools in New York City held exercises of rejoicing and congratulation in honor of the one-hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the public-school system of the State. The trustees and inspectors, teachers and pupils, vied with each other in commendatory and flattering references to the local "system," and, incidentally, to themselves. But "panting time" has scarcely run through four short weeks, and the serene atmosphere of this mutual admiration society has grown dark and stormy; and its members are, in the eyes of the press and of those who are non-partisan, disgracing themselves in their frantic efforts to oppose any reform of the New York City school system. The trouble has been caused by the School Reform Bill now awaiting its fate in Albany at the hands of one of the Senate committees. This measure has been framed by citizens who are deeply interested in the improvement of the schools, and who are competent to deal with the subject. The bill aims to divorce the local school system from local politics. Its provisions in this direction are what over a thousand of the school-teachers of the city are railing against. They do not want the notoriously incompetent boards of ward trustees to be superseded by a body of competent, trained school superintendents, who, as the bill provides, shall have the general direction of all classes, scholars, principals, and teachers, and who shall nominate to the Board of Education principals and teachers, as well as recommend their promotion or transfer. It is obvious to those who are familiar with the bill that no efficient, trustworthy teacher need fear it. The unpleasant inference is that those who are making the outcry, who are holding indignation meetings, and are in other ways hysterically condemning the bill, are those whose appointments as teachers have not been merited, but have been obtained through political influence and favoritism. The public-school system is, undoubtedly, "the seed and fruit, the cause and consequence, of public spirit," and is a great blessing; yet within one hundred years the system in this city has, apparently, become badly demoralized through the introduction of the poison of corrupt politics. It makes one read with relish of the days of guileless Ichabod Crane, when he "tarried" in the neighborhood of New York for the purpose of instructing the children of the vicinity, and who, when school hours were over, became the companion and playmate of his pupils, and made himself both useful and agreeable in the homes of his patrons.

One of the best public-school instructors of the city has realized the importance of returning to this closer relation between the home and the school, the parents and the teacher; and quite recently she invited all the mothers of her pupils to spend an afternoon at the school building. The meeting was a great success. The children gave a few songs and recitations, and the older girls of the cooking class made and served hot chocolate to the visitors; and then came two addresses,—one by the teacher, and the other by the well-known friend of education, Miss Grace Dodge. Both ladies said just the right things to foster a better understanding of and a keener interest in the school and the scholars on the part of the mothers.

Mayor Strong has done a good stroke of work for the schools in appointing five capable women as inspectors. He believes that the duties of an inspector are better adapted to feminine ability than the executive work of a commissioner. His first appointment was Miss Ellen Collins, who during the war took a prominent part in the work of the New York Branch of the Sanitary Commission. Miss Collins's most interesting work here has been the purchase of a large tenement-house on Cherry Street, which, after the manner of Miss Octavia Hill, she has personally managed, improving the property and the condition of the tenants.

Two interesting sessions of religious bodies lately held, the one in New York and the other in Brooklyn, are worthy of mention because of the widely different attitude of their members toward modern thought. The New York Presbytery, at its meeting, examined in theology three candidates for the ministry from the Union Theological Seminary. Among the questions asked them were whether they believed that the revelation of God made by nature to Socrates and Plato had sufficed to save the souls of these philosophers, and also whether Unitarians were Christians. One of the young men thought that Plato and Socrates were eternally lost, while one thought that they would have in the next world a chance to know Christ, and to decide whether they would accept salvation. The candidate who was asked about the Unitarians replied unhesitatingly that they were not Christians. What would the two immortal Greeks have thought of this glib unconsciousness of ignorance on the part of these young candidates and their, supposedly, wiser superiors!

While these futile queries were being put and answered in the New York Presbytery, the members of the New York and Brooklyn Association of Congregational Churches were discussing the very live question of "The Office of the Church in the Present Sociological Movement." Rev. A. J. Lyman, who gave the first paper, spoke of the sad duel going on between the conservative and liberal elements in some of the Congregational churches. He admitted that he himself had tried to steer a middle course, to be both ritualistic and broad and unpartisan. "On the other hand," he continued, "no man shall bar up any door or window of modern times. I want to get all the light, and I will not give up either the old or the new." Without arguing how a man can consistently be at the same time both broad and narrow in his thought, Mr. Lyman's utterance was notable, as was also his full address on "Socialism." Were all socialists as temperate and fraternal, there would be some chance, perhaps, of our having what Mr. Lyman hopes for,—a Christianized humanity.

It is said that Dr. Heber Newton is once more to have the attention of his bishop turned toward him. This time it is because of a sermon preached a few Sundays ago, in which he declared that he did not believe in the physical resurrection of the body, although he knew, he said, that in this matter he was taking a stand in opposition to the teachings of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The best of the metropolitan newspapers criticize Dr. Newton, not for his heresy, but for what they regard his inconsistency in attacking an Episcopal doctrine from the Episcopal pulpit of which he is the accredited minister. Some of these papers rashly go so far as to accuse him of bad faith. This certainly is a serious charge, and it indicates a great change from the old order of things when the press justly or not becomes the censor of the ethics of the pulpit.

The current number of the Critic publishes a concise biographical sketch of John Fiske, which shows that our distinguished countryman, in versatility, is a nineteenth century "Admirable Crichton." As a youthful prodigy, the Scottish scholar is even surpassed by the American, who began his scholastic training for college at the tender age of six, and who at sixteen was reading in five of the modern languages, as well as in Greek and in Latin. Mr. Fiske is now giving his annual courses of lectures in New York and Brooklyn. The energetic Men's Club of the Lenox Avenue Church, Harlem, secured him for a series of three on the following subjects: "The Cosmic Roots of Love and Sacrifice," "The Everlasting Reality of Religion," and "The Mystery of Evil." The audiences at these lectures were, as is usual when Mr. Fiske is the lecturer, large, intelligent, and appreciative.

Appropriately with the advent of the rejuvenating spring, has occurred the reopening of an old playhouse under new management, in new dress, and with a new name,—that of the famous Englishman of whom the testy Mr. Pope said, "He never had his equal as an actor, and he will never have a rival." "Harrigan's Theatre" has become "The Garrick"; and Mr. Richard Mansfield is its owner, manager, and chief actor. The excellent taste displayed in the redecoration of the theatre, the luxury of its appointments,—which include the novelty of a refreshment-room,—make the Garrick very inviting and a fitting memorial to the man for whom it is named. Mr. Mansfield, in his speech on the brilliant opening night of his theatre, outlined his managerial policy, and stated that it would be identical with the policy always pursued by Garrick himself, "who throughout his long career had the great good fortune to be able to act in a manner to please the public, because he never played anything that the best portion of the public had cause to complain of." What an immense improvement we should see in the stage if all theatrical managers would adopt this policy!

On Friday, May 3, the last regular meeting for this season of the New York League of Unitarian Women will be held at the First Unitarian Church in Orange, N.J. The morning will be devoted to a discussion of the "Bible," the afternoon to the reading of reports from the associated Branches of the Alliance and to the election of officers for the coming year.

RAMABAI'S WORK.

The annual report of the Ramabai Association is wonderfully interesting. More than that, it is encouraging, both as regards the development of the school in India and the continuance of interest here. It is true that the treasurer's receipts have been less during the last year, but that has also been true of almost every society; and there is reason to hope that these deficiencies may be made good. Mrs. Andrews's report, written out of her seven months' experience in India, gives a clear and comprehensive account of the school, its condition and progress. Friends of the school should help it now more than ever, since it has proved its value and possibilities even to many who at first doubted and hesitated.

“NEW WORLD” GUARANTEE FUND.

In the absence of Rev. W. H. Lyon, the secretary of the National Conference Committee on the endowment and current support of the New World, I wish to acknowledge the following subscriptions. Our desire is to raise a fund of $20,000, so that it may never be needful to make a larger assessment in any one year than ten per cent. I would ask all intending subscribers to communicate with me during Mr. Lyon's absence, until next October.

The Sunday School.

As a sign of the progressive spirit in Sunday-school work, it is worthy of mention that Mr. E. P. Sherburne of Roxbury has been invited to take charge of a normal class in Sunday-school instruction at the First Parish, Meeting-house Hill, Dorchester. Mr. Sherburne is a well known and successful teacher in the public schools, and will bring to this valuable duty ripe experience and great zeal. Rev. Eugene R. Shippen, pastor of the First Parish, has thrown himself into the Sunday-school work with enthusiasm.

There has been a desire on the part of many superintendents and teachers of Sunday-schools that a statement of Unitarian belief should be incorporated in the New Song and Service Book. There are very strong reasons for introducing such a feature, but the Publication Committee deemed it wise to omit this statement. It is about impossible to offer any singular arrangement of beliefs on essential truths which would be acceptable to any large number of the Unitarian Sunday-schools. The ministers of the churches would demur on details of expression. But another course is quite feasible. The Unitarian Sunday School Society offers for free distribution several statements of belief, and they can be had in any number. It is very easy to select one of these, when desired, and paste it into the new book. This course is being taken by several Sunday-schools. Or, if no one of these statements is acceptable, the minister and teachers of any given Sunday-school can prepare one themselves, making it a permanent part of the book.

THE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—“Aids to Sunday-school Work in Other Fields” was the subject discussed by the Sunday School Union Monday, April 15, at the Church of the Disciples. The first speaker was Mr. S. F. Hubbard, who gave an interesting account of the work at the North End Union, which aims to make its members “intellectually active, civilly useful, and morally good.” Because of the neighborhood in which it is placed, the line of work must be purely ethical. The hymn-book which is used has the name of Christ eliminated, but the spirit of Christ remains. Mr. Hubbard enumerated the methods used to create as well as to satisfy the desire for knowledge. Mr. A. A. Wordell of Parker Memorial spoke of the difficulty in establishing a Sunday-school there, for the children had first to be taught to feel some respect for the Sabbath. But it is now well under way. Besides imparting moral lessons, it tries to implant the American idea, and thus be a real benefit to the neighborhood. Rev. Reuben Kidner of St. Andrew House told of the grand movements which had originated in the church which Phillips Brooks established at the West End of the city. Industrial clubs, the Evening Dispensary, Vincent Memorial Hospital, and a School for Cripples are all outgrowths of this church. These missions do not and cannot build up churches of special denominations in the centres in which they are obliged to work. In England the Church grows with such aids; but here the population is heterogeneous, opposite conditions exist, and similar results cannot be obtained. The last speaker announced on the programme was Mr. Parker B. Field of Barnard Memorial. In 1832 Mr. Charles F. Barnard gathered some children in the parlors of Dorothea Dix, and thus founded the school and children's church which to-day bear his name. The church service is largely musical, so that children may have part in it. Mr. Field's aids are somewhat like those employed by the other speakers; but he has, in addition, two temperance societies and a Unity Club. The well-known celebration on Washington's Birthday is a great incentive to children to join his school. Rev. B. F. McDaniel made a practical application of the lesson received from these reports by urging the teachers to make every Sunday-school the embodiment of the spirit of Christ. A church or school that is not actively engaged in some work outside of itself is apt to retrograde. Mrs. James Beatley recommended that the school have a common work, that thus the unity of the school may be preserved, and told us how in her school “the desire for what one needs” is created by having pupils memorize and recite together fine passages of Scripture or of noted writers. Other speakers were Mr. Starbuck of Cambridge, who warned us against allowing too much club and class work to infringe on home relationships; and Rev. Edward A. Horton, who showed how such speakers as had been heard are doing what they can to topple over the walls of division between classes, and who thought that workers should receive inspiration from the knowledge of having so great a legion of allies in the noble men and women who toil in shadowed portions of the community.

Religious Intelligence.

REV. R. R. SHIPPEN of Washington has been called to Brockton, Mass., and has accepted.

In the list of meetings of New England conferences published last week that of the Norfolk, to be held at Canton, was announced for June 13: it should have been June 20.

THE last regular monthly meeting of the Suffolk Branches of the Women's National Alliance will be held at 25 Beacon Street on Monday, May 6, at eleven o'clock. Officers of other Branches are invited to be present.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. Francis G. Peabody will preach May 5. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

Ministers' Monday Club: May 6, 10.30 A.M. Rev. J. T. Lusk will preside. C. F. W. Archer, Esq., will give the address, on “The Modern Newspaper in its Relation to Morals and Religion.”

ANN ARBOR, MICH.—The past year has been one of the most prosperous in the history of the Unitarian church here, despite the increasing activities of the orthodox churches, which do all they can to keep their hold on the students. The congregations have been, without exception, good, and on some occasions very large. The amount of money raised by the society has been larger than in any previous year, and all the activities of the church have been in full vigor. Mrs. Sunderland's Sunday noon Bible class became so large last year that it was thought best to put it into the evening, in connection with a service of worship. This plan has worked well, the attendance ranging from one hundred and forty to three hundred. The subject of study has been “The Religious Thought of the Great Writers and Thinkers of the Nineteenth Century.” The field has proved interesting, rich in instruction, and a wonderful eye-opener to those who learned for the first time that nearly all the great leaders of thought of the century have been Unitarian in their religious views. Mr. Sunderland has had a Bible class of fifty young men meeting at noon; and a class of nearly equal size of young ladies has spent the year studying modern philanthropies and the great devotional literature of the world outside of the Bible. The Young Men's Liberal Guild and the large King's Daughters' organization (Unitarian), both made up mainly of university students, have had a year of active and useful work. The Ladies' Union, composed of the married ladies of the church, has devoted itself to social, charitable, and literary ends. With the help of a King's Daughters' “Ten,” it has maintained a Sewing School for poor children. The Unity Club has had a year of marked prosperity. Its attendance has seldom fallen below three hundred, and frequently has risen to the utmost capacity of the church, which is nearly six hundred. The Unitarian cause here has been greatly helped by a lecture given before the club to a crowded house by Rev. M. J. Savage, on “What O'Clock is it in Religion?” The lecture produced a profound impression, and was a theme of talk in student circles for weeks. A strong impetus, too, was received from a lecture before the club and a sermon on Sunday evening by Mrs. Livermore. The distribution of liberal literature is always very important here, but it has been greatly strengthened and enlarged by the publication of Mr. Sunderland's “College Town Pulpit” monthly sermons. These have attracted much attention, especially among the students, and have not only been taken and read in very large numbers here, but have been sent by the students to their homes and friends in all parts of the country, thus sowing the seed of liberal thought very widely and under the most favorable conditions. Nearly thirty thousand of these sermons have already been put into circulation. The Unitarian society has just voted to Mr. Sunderland a leave of absence, to spend the next year, from July 1, abroad in study. He expects to go to Oxford and Germany, to devote his time to Biblical study, Egyptology, Assyriology, and Comparative Religion, visiting Egypt and Palestine before returning. Mrs. Sunderland will probably accompany him.

HOPEDALE, MASS.—Over one hundred people have joined the Hopedale parish within a year.

FARMINGTON, ME.—The society here has arranged to have its recognition services in honor of Rev. W. H. Ramsay on Tuesday, May 14. It is expected that Rev. Messrs. Prescott, Newbert, Marsh, Perkins, and Wilson will take part.

KEENE, N.H.—The Unitarian Club of Keene, N.H., held its last meeting of the season on Wednesday evening, April 17, in the new parish house. The occasion was ladies' night, and a very good number of members and guests were present. Rev. George W. Kent of Worcester opened the speaking with a bright address on the subject, “Faith in our Mission.” He was followed by Rev. J. J. Little, a Universalist minister from Winchester, who spoke in a very happy manner of the work of the two liberal churches, which runs along parallel lines. Rev. Charles B. Elder, the pastor of the church, closed the speaking. Dr. George B. Twitchell, the president of the club, presided, and introduced the speakers. This meeting closed the fifth year of the existence of the club, which has had a steady growth since its organization. All the members were delighted with the new parish house, which is finely adapted to meetings of this character.

MELROSE HIGHLANDS, MASS.—The people in Melrose Highlands who have been gathered together under Unitarian preachers have organized as the Liberal Christian Society of Melrose Highlands. Rev. James Haworth has been their minister for the last six months or more, and has done most efficient service. The society is in a most hopeful condition. It is paying its own expenses, and hopes soon to have a church of its own. Something over fifty families are interested in the movement.

MILFORD, N.H.—The Farmers' Cabinet of April 25 says: “Rev. J. C. Kimball of Hartford, Conn., gave to the Unitarian people last Sunday two remarkably able and inspiring discourses. The morning subject was ‘Liberal Religion as the One Both for this World and for the World to come,’ and kindled the large congregation with helpful thought. A good audience was present; and the speaker most brilliantly and charmingly held the attention of every one present for almost an hour and a half, and with but slight reference to notes. As a speaker, Mr. Kimball is earnest, and at times rises to great eloquence. He is a master of unwritten speech.”

NEWTON, MASS.—The Association of Ministers in and about Cambridge will meet with Rev. F. B. Hornbrooke on Monday, May 6. Train leaves Boston at noon from Albany station. Collation at one o'clock. Essay at two. Subject, “Goethe's ‘Faust.’” Residence, Lombard Street. Hilary Bygrave, Scribe.

PASSAIC, N.J.—On Wednesday evening, April 17, Rev. Frank S. C. Wicks was installed as minister of the Unitarian society of Passaic. The services were held in Masonic Hall, which is temporarily serving as a place of worship; and the congregation present filled it to the doors, and also the adjoining anterooms. The sermon was to have been preached by Rev. Robert Collyer; but, owing to sickness in his family, he was detained at home. His place was taken by Rev. Samuel A. Eliot of the First Church, Brooklyn, who preached an able and eloquent sermon on “Sealed Orders.” The rest of the programme was as follows: invocation, Rev. Frederick J. Gauld; Scripture reading, Rev. George H. Badger; prayer of installation, Rev. Edward Hale; right hand of fellowship, Rev. D. W. Morehouse; charge to the minister, Rev. Samuel A. Eliot; address to the people, Rev. Stephen H. Camp; benediction, by the pastor. The Harmony Glee Club of Passaic furnished the music. The services were impressive, and the happy occasion was an indication of the helpful and affectionate relations already existing between the pastor and his people. On reaching his home that night, Mr. Wicks found tangible evidence of the friendly regard of his parishioners. Some of them had been there before him, and left, from the men of his congregation, a mahogany tea-table, and from the ladies a tea service with silver spoons and Dr. Holmes's delightful “Over the Tea-cups.” The Passaic society, which, until the new movement was started in Albany a few weeks ago, was the youngest church in the Middle States Conference, has taken a vigorous step forward during the past winter. Mr. Wicks is attracting congregations that crowd Masonic Hall to its full capacity, and almost every Sunday new members connect themselves with the society. A Sunday-school has been organized with sixty pupils. Mr. Horace Bettis is the superintendent, and is aided by an earnest corps of teachers. There is a Social Science Class of fifteen men, and Mr. Wicks is conducting a large class of ladies through Savage's catechism. The Unity Club, now in its second year, has an average attendance of sixty-five. The interest manifested by the members of the society is of a very deep and earnest character, and bears the marks of permanence. Mr. Wicks, in speaking of his people, ascribes their enthusiasm and their zeal for the cause of liberal religion to the work done by his predecessors, Rev. D. W. Morehouse, who established the church and had charge of it the first year, and to Rev. Stephen H. Camp, whose noble and wise preaching developed the spiritual life of the people and left his lasting impress upon the society.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—On April 18 Mr. George W. Stone of Wilmington addressed the Unitarian Club on “The Saratoga Conference, and its Influence on our Future Work.” He believed the results of the action there taken would be seen in the obliteration of party lines, more effective co-operation with other denominations, and the confirmation of our claim to the Christian name. Rev. J. C. Hodgins differed in some respects from the essayist, believing that religion is something more and higher than personal character or love of God and man. Rev. Dr. J. T. G. Nichols of Cambridge believed that, if men were true followers of Jesus, war, slavery, and all injustice would cease. Rev. W. I. Nichols called attention to the fact that the First Church of Philadelphia was founded by Rev. Joseph Priestley and others of English birth in 1796, and was in sympathy with English Unitarians; that is, rather Socinian than Arian. While agreeing with Mr. Stone in his statements of the difference between the religion of Jesus and the theology about him, he did not like to associate the name of religion with the name of any human being, however exalted. Mr. Stone closed the discussion by saying that he thought neither Mr. Hodgins nor Mr. Nichols had discussed the central idea of his paper, that “love to God and love to man” is the essential principle of a religion broad and deep enough to embrace men of every possible shade of opinion. While regarding Jesus as the ideal man, he did not by any means look upon him as a finality.

The ninety-third birthday of Dr. William H. Furness was celebrated on April 20. A belated newspaper clipping received just as we go to press tells us that he spent the day quietly at home, receiving the congratulations of his many friends. At the First Church on the next day Rev. Joseph May preached on “Goodness,” beginning his discourse with a fine tribute to Dr. Furness, his predecessor in that pulpit.

ROXBURY, MASS.—All Souls' Church: Rev. Edward J. Young, D.D., of Waltham will preach Sunday, May 5. Services at 10.30 A.M. Communion after the morning service.

SIoux CITY, IA.—Unity Church celebrated the completion of its first ten years' work by a birthday festival in connection with the annual meeting in April. The lecture-room and parlors were beautifully decorated; and at 6.30 P.M. two hundred and fifty members and friends of the church gathered around this larger family board, and together partook of the good things provided and served by the ladies of Unity Circle. This birthday festival was characterized by earnestness, thankfulness, good cheer, and joyful hope for the future. The programme consisted of music, sentiments, and responses. In telling the story of “The Beginnings of Unity Church,” the speaker described the first meetings in the court-house in February, 1885; the organization of a church society by the little band of the faithful; the purchase and remodelling of the skating-rink; and, finally, of the call to Rev. Mary Safford of Humboldt, Ia., to the pastorate. The debt incurred by the purchase of building and lot was soon discharged. The enlarging of the business district making it advantageous to sell the church property, this was done, and a lot purchased on one of the finest residence streets in the city. When the new church building was dedicated, Rev. Elinor Gordon was ordained and called as assistant pastor. The responses to sentiments showed clearly what Unity Church has aimed to do and to be in this community. They showed that it is alive and growing; and who shall say what is impossible to such a church as this? Many grateful tributes of love and appreciation were offered the ministers, Miss Safford and Miss Gordon, to whose ability, energy, and untiring devotion these results are due. At the annual business meeting which preceded the festival the secretary reported the total amount of money raised for the year to be $6,225.09, of which $500 was contributed to the State work, the W. U. C., and the W. U. S. S., the church aiming always to extend its work beyond its own special limits. The church debt was also decreased by $300, this latter a gift from the ladies' society, which raised in all $1,047.93. The minister's report also showed activity in many other directions. In addition to the daughter societies at Washta and Cherokee, where Miss Safford or Miss Gordon conducted service monthly for some two years, and do now occasionally, a new society has been organized at Ida Grove, where Miss Safford has been preaching alternate Sunday evenings since February. A Young People's Religious Union has also been organized.

TACOMA, WASH.—The First Free Church of Tacoma has issued a circular stating its aims and purposes, together with a resolution adopted by the church, which invites all persons not residents of Tacoma who are in sympathy with the cause of universal religion to allow their names to be placed on a non-membership roll. Such members will be kept in constant touch with the society by the society's publications. No obligations of any kind will be imposed upon them, but whatever aid they may feel disposed to lend the cause will be gratefully acknowledged. Address, Alfred W. Martin, Tacoma, Wash.

WALPOLE, N.H.—This parish has suffered a sad loss in the death of Mrs. T. Nelson Hastings, one of its most devoted members and a most estimable lady. Several weeks before her unexpected death Mrs. Hastings decided to build a parish house and present it to the society. The plans had all been drawn and approved, and it was her intention to tell the society of the proposed gift the very week on which she died. At the Easter service it was announced that Mr. Hastings, her husband, would fulfil her wishes in the matter to the letter. This will give the Walpole society a much needed and as finely appointed a parish house as could be desired as a memorial of her.

"Good deeds cannot die:
They with the sun and moon renew their light,
Forever blessing those that look on them."

WILMINGTON, DEL.—The ladies interested in the formation of a Young Women's Christian Association in Wilmington, on receiving the resolutions sent to them by the Unitarian Society (printed in the Register April 11, to the effect that Unitarians could only co-operate with members of other denominations in religious work when recognized by them as fellow-disciples of Jesus in the fullest and highest sense), reconsidered the constitution of the Association, and with a unanimous vote excluded from it the clause which limited the executive officers to members of the so-called evangelical churches; and now they have renewed their invitation to the ladies of the Unitarian church to unite with them in their efforts to improve the womanhood of Wilmington, on exactly the same basis as members of any other denomination. Of course, the Unitarian ladies will no longer hesitate to "lend a hand" in this undertaking, but will enter into its work with the same generous and helpful spirit that they give to the service of all the other philanthropic and charitable institutions of the city. It is announced that Mrs. W. C. Gannett of Rochester, N. Y., will address the workers and others interested in the new Association this week.

THE PACIFIC UNITARIAN CONFERENCE will hold its eleventh session May 1, 2, and 3. Essays will be read by Rev. George Heber Rice of Stockton, on "Our Attitude toward the Bible"; by Rev. E. M. Wilbur, on "The Theory of Evolution as applied to Ethics"; Rev. U. G. B. Pierce, on "Missionary Methods on the Pacific Coast," and by others. Rev. Horatio Stebbins, D.D., will preach the conference sermon.

THE SOUTHERN CONFERENCE.—The tenth annual session of the Southern Conference is held in Baltimore this week. The opening sermon will be by Rev. John Cuckson of Boston, after which Mr. Joseph Marion Seaton of Richmond, Va., will be ordained. George W. Stone of Wilmington, Del., and Hon. Carroll D. Wright are the leading essayists of the meetings; and two sessions have been planned, when several speakers will present short papers, first on "The Part of the Church in Dealing with the Problems of the People," then on doctrinal subjects. The annual meeting of the Southern Associate Alliance will be addressed by Mrs. George L. Chaney, president, Mrs. Fifield, and Miss D. P. Smith of Charleston, S. C.

WORCESTER CONFERENCE.—The regular spring session of the Worcester Conference will be held on May 15 and 16 with the First Unitarian Society of Hudson, Mass. The sermon on the evening of the 15th will be delivered by Rev. James De Normandie, after a devotional service on the morning of the 16th by Rev. A. S. Garver. The essay will be by Rev. W. F. Greenman, on "The Immediate Advance of Unitarian Congregationalism." The discussion will be opened by Rev. George W. Kent. In the afternoon several laymen will speak on the general topic, "To What Kind of a Church would I be Loyal?"—(1) "The Preaching," by Jonathan Smith of Clinton; (2) "The Missionary Work," by Archibald M. Howe of Cambridge; (3) "Practical Philanthropies," by F. E. Holman of Clinton.

WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.—The annual meeting will be held in the Third Unitarian Church May 14, 15, and 16. The opening sermon will be preached by Rev. J. E. Roberts, Kansas City, Mo. The first morning session will be devoted to reports from the field. The following are among the speakers and the subjects to be discussed: "The Bitter Heroism of Science," by Rev. C. F. Elliott; "Social Injustice as a Source of Atheism and Religious Indifference," by Rev. F. W. N. Hugenholtz; "The Thought and the Form," by Mrs. A. L. Parker; "Beauty in Nature in Relation to Man," by E. D. Cox; "Our Free Congregational Policy," by Rev. G. A. Thayer; "Dancing and the Church Life," by Rev. A. M. Judy. The Women's Western Unitarian Conference will convene Tuesday, May 14, and the Western Sunday School Society on Friday, May 17.

PLYMOUTH AND BAY CONFERENCE.—The next meeting will be held at Plymouth in the Methodist church, Wednesday, May 8. Essays will be read by Rev. E. C. Butler of Quincy—subject, "How to make a Church"—and by Rev. George Batchelor, secretary of the American Unitarian Association—subject, "The Passage from Philosophy to Religion." Addresses will be given by Mrs. Mary B. Davis, corresponding secretary of the Women's Alliance, and by Rev. C. R. Eliot, representing the Church Temperance Society. Trains leave Boston at 8.30 and 11.30. At stations where excursion tickets cannot be had special tickets will be on sale at equivalent rates if five or more delegates demand them. The issue of return tickets through the Secretary has been discontinued. Attention is called to the fact that, owing to special circumstances, this will be a basket conference, the ladies of the Plymouth parish providing tea and coffee.

WISCONSIN AND MINNESOTA CONFERENCE.—The interstate meeting of the Wisconsin and Minnesota Unitarian Conferences will be held at Menomonie, Wis., May 21-23. Rev. H. M. Simmons of Minneapolis will preach the opening sermon. A conference on Sunday-school work will be led by Rev. H. T. Secrist of Milwaukee, Rev. Messrs. Brown of St. Cloud, Ballou of Fargo, Douthit of Baraboo, and others. The platform meeting on the evening of the 22d will be addressed by Rev. Messrs. F. C. Southworth of Duluth, J. L. Andrews of Sioux Falls, and William R. Lord of St. Paul. Thursday afternoon "The Furtherance of Liberal Religion" will be discussed by Rev. Helen G. Putnam, Fargo, No. Dak.; Rev. T. G. Owen, Arcadia; Rev. A. H. Norman, Minneapolis; Rev. F. C. Davis, Winona; Rev. F. C. Southworth, Duluth. Rev. W. D. Simonds of Madison will preach the closing sermon. The Unitarian society at Menomonie extends a cordial invitation, and will provide entertainment for all visitors. Robert C. Douthit, Secretary.

WORCESTER LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.—The annual meeting was held on Wednesday, April 17, at the South Unitarian Church, Worcester, with an attendance of one hundred and thirty-five women, eleven county towns being represented. The annual reports were read, that of the secretary's showing a large increase in the attendance during the last year and a growing interest in league matters. Officers for the year 1895-96 were elected, as follows: president, Mrs. Calvin Stebbins; vice-presidents, Mrs. C. H. Davis, Mrs. G. W. Kent; recording secretary, Mrs. A. B. R. Sprague; corresponding secretary, Mrs. W. M. Freeman; treasurer, Mrs. W. H. Hackett; auditor, Mrs. George D. Gifford; executive committee, Mrs. J. B. Stone, Mrs. D. D. Keyes, Mrs. Marshall Flagg, Mrs. George E. Francis, Mrs. E. E. Foster, Mrs. Henry Harrington, Mrs. Bowen Adams, Miss Mary Trumbull, Mrs. Gardner C. Whiting, Mrs. H. G. Taft, Mrs. J. A. Aborn, Mrs. Nathaniel Seaver. It was voted to send a contribution of $8 to the Unitarian church at Wolfeboro, N.H., and to take up a contribution for the South Unitarian Church, Worcester. After the business was over, the programme for the day was taken up. The general subject was "Education of Girls"; and Mrs. William F. Abbott read a sketch of the life of Lucy Larcom, whom she styled a self-made woman. Mrs. Abbott questioned if her early struggles did not produce the strength that enabled her to accomplish such grand results.

After the intermission taken for luncheon Mrs. J. B. Stone read a paper on "Does the Present System of Education fit our Girls for Domestic Life?" which was a comprehensive history of the education of woman to the present time. The second paper, "Does a College Education increase (or tend to increase) the Restlessness of the Modern Girl who after Graduation is not obliged to be Self-supporting?" was written upon by Mrs. Mary W. Fuller and Mrs. Calvin Clarke, both of Lancaster, Mass. Mrs. Stone read the answers to this and the preceding question that had been given by many prominent women. Several college girls who were present spoke, all acknowledging the "restlessness" attributed to them, but felt it was just this restlessness that made progress possible. Mrs. Emma E. Foster, who had for a subject "Shall the Girl as well as the Boy be Trained in Business Methods?" treated it most delightfully in dialogue form. Scene, a five o'clock tea. Place, a corner of a drawing-room, where a few women were discussing the possibility of finding any one capable of filling the office of treasurer of their new club. The only two women who had the desired qualifications came in later, and told how they were trained when girls to keep accounts and to know something of business methods. The meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the retiring president, Mrs. Austin S. Garver, who has served most acceptably for two years.

Business Notices.

An Important Change.—It will be good news to many women in this city that the Paine Furniture Company have decided to open a special department of inexpensive dining-room furniture. This does not mean a cheaper grade of furniture than the regular work, but a class of cabinet work in which the elements of economy are carefully studied, within the limits of sound construction and the latest ideas and improvements. By reducing the number of different styles, and eliminating all superfluous expense, this company hope to offer an attractive line of dining-room furniture at a saving of 25 to 30 per cent. over present prices. The new department has just been opened, and is already immensely popular.

The last personally conducted tour to Washington under the auspices of the Royal Blue Line leaves Boston Wednesday, May 8. The rate of $23 covers every expense for the trip of seven days. Members of previous parties express themselves as delighted with the accommodations furnished. A detailed itinerary may be secured by addressing A. J. Simmons, N. E. P. A., 211 Washington Street, Boston.

What Mr. Edward Atkinsons terms "progressive reduction" in industrial products is well exemplified in the china and glass makers' art. The patent fuel-saving kilns and other labor-saving inventions have largely reduced the cost. Jones, McDuffee & Stratton, seven floors, are an object lesson; and thousands almost daily visit their establishment in Boston.

Strong and clear, soft and steady is the light which comes from the Miller Lamp. It is a positive luxury to read or sew by it.

No Safer or More Efficacious Remedy can be had for Coughs or any trouble of the throat than "Brown's Bronchial Troches."

Deaths.

At Ogdensburg, N.Y., 10th ult., Edward Davis, aged 45 yrs. 5 mos.

MRS. IRVING SEYMOUR.

It is with regret we announce the death of Mrs. Irving Seymour, who passed away at her home in Boudla, So. Dak., at 2.30 A.M., April 20. For days and even weeks she had patiently awaited the silent messenger, and was ready, feeling safe in the protection of the Everlasting Arms. Many there are who will miss the loving, thoughtful friend. Her sympathy ever went out to the unfortunate and those in trouble. Having fine literary taste, she was always finding just the bright helpful crumbs of comfort, and distributing where most needed. Who of the children of her acquaintance will not remember her for the thoughtfulness in sending them magazines and papers filled with beautiful, uplifting thoughts? She leaves a husband, son, and daughter to mourn her loss. The funeral was held in the Methodist Episcopal church, which was filled to its utmost capacity. The services were conducted by Rev. Helen G. Putnam, Unitarian minister from Fargo, No. Dak., a very dear friend of the deceased. A FRIEND.

MRS. JAMES HOOPEE, JR.

One of the stanchest and most ardent friends of humanity passed on to heavenly scenes of sympathy and labor when Mrs. James Hooper died at her son's home in Cambridge March 31. Born in 1801, of old Puritan stock, upon which was grafted the liberal faith, she was pre-eminently a Unitarian, an early and late abolitionist, ailing for the freedmen to the last day of her life. With her husband, the late James Hooper, Jr., of Walpole, N.H., she entered heartily, fifty years ago, into the temperance crusade, at the cost of much social feeling. In middle life she was for twenty-five consecutive years a teacher in the Sunday-school, rarely missing a Sunday. During our Civil War she burned midnight oil sewing to supply the needs of our sick and wounded soldiers ministered to by the Sanitary Commission. After the war she worked for the freedmen, in whose education and uplifting she never lost interest. During the last quarter of her long life she resided with a son and daughter in Cambridge, visiting occasionally her younger daughter and grandchildren in New York. Her interest in humanity never flagged. She was the constant friend of the poor, the weak, and the oppressed everywhere. She died suddenly, at the great age of ninety-four, after an illness of only three hours, in perfect possession of all her mental faculties. In her death the heavenly host has gained a strong and well-drilled recruit; and her brave spirit will undoubtedly thoroughly enjoy release from the hindrances of earthly existence. But her mental and physical vigor had been so remarkably prolonged in the flesh that her sudden departure takes away a strong tower, the loss of whose support will be deeply felt by a wide circle of friends. THE GOSPEL OF JESUS.

O Brother, who for us didst meekly wear
The crown of thorns about thy radiant brow!
What gospel from the Father didst thou bear,
Our hearts to cheer, making us happy now?
"Tis this alone," the immortal Saviour cries:
"To fill thy heart with ever-active love,
Love for the wicked as in sin he lies,
Love for thy brother here, thy God above.
Fear nothing ill,—'twill vanish in its day;
Live for the good, taking the ill thou must;
"Toil with thy might; with manly labor pray;
Living and loving, learn thy God to trust,
And he will shed upon thy soul the blessings of the just."

PERSONAL INFLUENCE.

BY HOWARD N. BROWN.

"Because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps."—1 PETER ii, 21.

All deep thinkers have felt the wonder of what Saint Paul calls "the mystery of Godliness." A great German philosopher viewed the moral law written in his heart with the same awe that he regarded the innumerable host of heavenly bodies disclosed at night in the firmament on high, and it is much more than a coincidence that these two wonders should have been linked together in his thought.

To the casual glance the wide arch of the heavens above us is only a larger pattern of such domes as we erect, "fretted with golden fires." But, when we begin to probe that vast expanse with our telescopes, and see the great ranks of shining suns stretching away into invisible distances, we find ourselves in the presence of an infinite universe; and in the attempt to grasp the thought that, though we were to travel these starlit avenues forever and forever, we should never come to an end of them, our mind is quickly overwhelmed by the limitless spaces through which its imagination essays to roam.

So, though the facts of the moral nature mean but little to a careless inspection, when we begin to investigate them, we find ourselves in the presence of infinite reason and will. If we stop to consider what it means that there are things which we ought to do, irrespective of any happiness or comfort of our own at stake in the matter, we stand before the whole mystery of the being of God. All human goodness is Godliness; and duty is a word which, when we look into it, leads us straight to the conception of one infinite, all-embracing mind.

In the outward universe the amazing fact is that all these suns and planets, across the millions of miles that separate them, send out an influence by which they govern and control one another's movements,—a fact toward whose explanation we have hardly taken the first step when we have found the law that states the method of this influence. The question, What is gravitation? is still unsolved; and there is as yet no promise of a satisfactory answer.

It is something to have learned that the tides of the sea are due, in part, to the pull of the moon upon the earth's mass; but how does the moon exert this influence? We are not able to pull anything ourselves unless we lay hold of some physical attachment. We can hardly imagine that, simply by walking before it, a horse may pull a heavy load, without being harnessed to it in any manner whatever. Yet here is the moon, without hands, without harness, simply riding on through the heavens, and drawing after it the enormous tidal wave which heaps itself against our shores. There must be some powerful bond between the two, but there is no bond that we can discover. We have as yet only a name for that mysterious influence that binds the rolling worlds together.

So in this other universe of mind we learn that one holds over another a power no less wonderful and inscrutable. Greatly exceeding any ability of ours to move by conscious effort, by speech or argument, the life of another soul is the native, inevitable influence of mind on mind. This is a perfectly silent and secret force, which each one possesses. So that, wherever we move, we are, so to speak, deflecting others from their orbits.

It is this that makes the better part of the power of example,—a power which, in the common observation of mankind, has been found everywhere mightier than precept. We may have been accustomed to think that the value of a good life is dependent upon the world's conscious recognition of its beauty. Men say to themselves as they see it: "That appears to be worth striving for. Let us, therefore, rouse up our sluggish energies to work for it." But there is vastly more than this to the power of example. It holds men when they do not see that it is better than themselves, when they put forth no conscious effort to reach its likeness,—even when they fight and rebel against the force by which they are unconsciously drawn. Does the sea say, "It were good to be up there above the clouds, and therefore I will reach up as high as I can lift myself toward those serene heights"? The sea is lifted by a power with which its own will and liking have nothing to do; and such a power there is in the good life to compel a rising tide in the life of others, though men are wholly ignorant of the change that is being wrought in them.

Simply living and going about our usual employments, we continually move and sway each other by our habits of action and the opinions we express. Some are strong, while others are weak, in the exercise of this personal influence. But one must go very far down in the scale of being to find a life about which no other revolves as a satellite; and, as we mount up toward the heights of human greatness, the power of the single mind to alter the character and shape the destinies of the race is enormously increased.

Even in the life of animals this power undoubtedly has its part to play. Anatomists find no peculiarity in the throat of a bird that sufficiently accounts for its peculiar song; and the inference is that the bird learns its song, in part at least, by imitation, taking its notes naturally from those that have sheltered and fed its young life. Much more when we study the life of men this copying by one of what he finds in another becomes a most important factor of the process by which human conduct and character are shaped. It is not only that the child bears the stamp of its good or evil parentage, but, daily and hourly, in the intimate association of the home, the personality of the more mature minds with which it comes in contact is being deeply impressed upon its plastic nature.

In every good school there is a training which does not come from rules of deportment or the exercises written down in books, but is of quite as much importance as any part of the standard educational methods; for the mind of the pupil is instinctively forming itself upon the mind of the teacher as a model. It was once thought that almost any one would do well enough as the teacher of young children; but now it is better understood that during those first years, when childhood is most impressionable, it is of the highest consequence that it should be supplied with the best personal influence.

All this belongs largely to the unconscious side of our life. We can no more help giving out such influence as may be in us than we can help breathing; while we, in turn, inevitably receive from others such drawings along or aside from the path of right and duty as they are fitted to impart. I am persuaded that, though in ordinary life this may not be a very large power, there are cases in which it extends far beyond all limits that we can assign to it. There are born kings of men who bring vast multitudes under the spell of their personal influence, and lead them almost wherever they choose in willing obedience. No factor of our history is larger or more interesting than the power which these exceptional minds have wielded.

It is not fear alone, or selfish hope, that puts a great nation at the feet of a conqueror like the first Napoleon, but the magic of some inexplicable force that his personality exerts. Even in the training of domestic animals, no good system of control can be established on the idea that they are to be managed solely through their fears, or without recognition of the fact that they are, as a rule, glad and proud to serve the superior intelligence, when they understand what is required of them.

Men never have been and cannot now be governed merely by appeals to their selfish motives. They are everywhere and in all times born hero-worshippers, anxious to make heroes out of commonplace material, when the true metal is not readily found; and they are easily led captive by the stronger intelligence, which knows how to put itself before them in heroic attitudes.

The power of the relatively few whom the world really admires and loves to sway the thought and desire of the masses of men, and to change their character for better or worse, is enormous and, I believe, incalculable. We do not yet know, when mind strongly dominates mind, what are the fixed limits beyond which this influence cannot go. If the results of recent experiments in psychology are to be trusted, then we have but to magnify the personality which exercises such wonderful control to bring almost all the so-called miracles of the New Testament within the bounds of scientific possibility.

There are conditions under which one mind may say to another: "Follow my example. Do as I bid you." And not only has the mind thus bidden no strength to resist the command, but there comes to it a hitherto undreamed of strength to obey; to rise out of weakness that seemed without remedy, and perform works of stupendous might. We do not yet know the limits of this personal influence. Obviously, it is a mighty force, capable in some hands of achieving wonders, and of accomplishing in all our lives, if we know how to use it aright, a work of the very highest significance and worth.

Now there must be conditions which it is necessary to observe in order to make this force effective. We should be inclined to say—should we not?—that an immoral mind cannot exercise much dominion over the hearts of others. But, though we may think that evil ought to be powerless, we must not shut our eyes to life's stern and serious facts. We have to see that the strength of evil example is great,—only less powerful, to say the least, than that of the sincere and honest character. Selfishness and brutality are able to cloak themselves before the eyes of many in so fair a show of spirited and courageous enterprise that they hold for their victims something of that fatal charm which serpents are said to possess. What warrant have we, then, that good example has any advantage whatever; that, if we live in the sight of our children an honorable and an upright life, the effect of it upon them may not be wholly neutralized and overcome by the specious attraction of some impure character with which they chance to come in contact?

We have this warrant at least, that there must be trust in the mind to bring it, in any complete measure, under the spell of another's influence; and none but an honest soul can long inspire that trust which enables it to rule in another's life. If you tell a falsehood to your friend, you may not at once lose the hold you have upon his heart; but every falsehood subjects you none the less to a serious risk. For, if it be discovered, and it is plain that you have deceived with sinister intent, you have erected against yourself in the mind of your friend a barrier of distrust which years of patient effort may barely suffice to remove.

Good example has therefore, always and everywhere, one great advantage over all that is bad. The more it is regarded, the more confidence it inspires; while the fascinations of evil, though great for a season, perish with the first exposure of the blackness hidden at its heart. When you think of the young spirits gathered at your fireside, so soon to be thrown into the midst of the world's great turmoil, you can hardly disguise from yourself that the pure influences of the home have powerful competitors in those false charms which sin knows how to wear. But do not doubt that, if the personal influence of the home has been really good and true, it will follow the mind wherever it goes, as the grasp of the sun follows the comet through its widest wandering in outer space, and will outlive all evil forces that tempt the mind astray.

Again, as the power of example, to be effective, demands trust in those who are subjected to its influence, not less does it demand a strong faith in the silent, secret domination of the spirit, on the part of those who undertake to be to others an authority or guide. If you would have your example, your interest in spiritual things, and your devotion to life's higher aims and duties, tell upon the heart which merely loves pleasure and its own way, then you must believe that it will tell by its own weight and force, and must not be forever rushing in with threats, exhortations, and entreaties, to piece out its supposed weakness.

Too much government is the bane of households as of nations. That nagging, insistent, imperious discipline, which has little trust in the power of personal example, and which knows no righteousness save that of implicit obedience to the letter of the household law, is still too common in the homes of our people. Obedience is a great virtue, and one cannot deny that strong men and women came from those Puritan households whose discipline was like a rod of iron. But this rigid system perhaps spoiled as many characters as ever it made; and it wholly failed at length, because its strength was mere narrowness and total lack of flexibility.

When it is a question of shaping the life of a child, be sure that there is a power in your daily walk and conversation to compel imitation and obedience where unyielding rules too often drive the young mind to concealment and hypocrisy. Trust that silent force of example to do the larger part of the work which you wish to accomplish. Be not in too much haste to remedy all that is amiss upon the instant; but wait for that force which reaches the very springs and sources of the life, and whose results it may take years to ripen, rather than pinch a growing character into any mould of arbitrary requirements.

He who ordained the natural laws of our being has provided a way by which, surely, though slowly, all the good that is in the world shall act to cure the evil and lift up the weak; for the superior power of example lies altogether on the better side. We may trust that way to make full use of it. The lion-tamer looks steadily into the eye of the savage beast with which he stands face to face, confident that by his very bearing he can keep it in subjection. So it is of the very essence of strong personal influence over men that it should depend upon its own native might, and should not stoop to the bluster or intrigue that betrays a doubtful mind.

But there is one more quality that is essential to make example a living and an active force; and this brings us close to the thought of the apostle, that the Christ who suffered for us is the great exemplar in whose steps we should tread. We know that there are instances of virtue, and even of self-sacrifice, which appear to be almost perfect and sublime,—only, somehow, they do not seem to be alive. They have the cold faultlessness of a marble statue; and, however we may admire them, they do not thrill us or inspire us, like some less perfect patterns of courage and devotion. In common speech, we demand some heart in goodness before we yield to it much affection or esteem; and there is a pas-sionless virtue which seems to possess everything save that vitalizing trait.

Where the informing spirit of a life is a cold, stern sense of duty, it will not show much of the power which great example has always manifested to compel emulation and obedience. There must be love of right and truth, and there must be love of men, to give a mind strong and lasting command in the lives of others. However we may think the divine wisdom ought to have made men, certainly, it has so fashioned human nature that love is the most regal quality of its life. There is nowhere else such "making of bricks without straw" as on the part of those who undertake to dispense with that quality, or in whose schemes of social economy no account is made of this, life's strongest sentiment.

Much is forgiven here on earth to those that love much, and it is not forgiven or overlooked in men if they love but little. An imperfect virtue with this to help it will shine out over the world far and wide, where an otherwise faultless life, lacking the gift of love, will melt no heart and light for no soul the way to heaven. Now, the very badge of love is its power to suffer—not merely with hard and stoical endurance, but gladly and freely—for those whom it holds dear. Love does not count its losses, or ever complain to Heaven that its sacrifice has been in vain. Love submits even to be nailed to the cross by cruel hands, and then says: "Father forgive them. They know not what they do."

It is not accident or caprice, therefore, that has made the cross a symbol of the world's greatest religion, and has set up the image of the crucified one at every wayside shrine along the paths of an older Christian civilization. It is this deep truth of universal human nature: that a strong and holy love, which suffers and, if need be, dies for men, is above all others the conquering force in the life of the world. We can perhaps afford to give up the symbol: we cannot afford to forget the truth for which that symbol stands.

The love of Christ has enthroned his example in the hearts of men higher than any other mark of human perfection, and given him the greatest power to draw others after him that any soul of man has yet possessed. And this, perhaps, is as deep as our plummet will ever reach into the mystery of that influence which mind exerts upon mind.

Above all, it is the mother's love that makes her all-powerful in the home; and her affection shows us the one true and strongest quality of love everywhere,—that is, its longing, at any sacrifice, to confer joy and blessing, its willingness to pay any price of suffering that may be the cost of another's good.

Where that is, the soul will be strong to impress itself on the life of others. Where that is not, however it may plead or exhort, there will be few to follow. And so it is no expression of weakness when upon the throne of the highest we place an eternal and a perfect love. Within the range of our knowledge we have no word which tells of a more supreme authority or a more commanding power. A universe governed by love is ruled by the highest conceivable spiritual force, and not without warrant do we ascribe this majesty to the infinite Father of us all, whose hand is over us in all our ways.

Finding in our own life this power, which above all others has made us what we are,—the power that shaped our lives in infancy, and is most intimately connected with the wonderful force of all good example,—we say this can no more be our exclusive property than the magnetism of the lodestone can be its peculiar gift.

As all worlds are flooded with currents of that magnetic force which draws the needle to its constant pole, so the great deeps of being must be full of this other power which in us binds mind to mind and heart to heart. God is love, and it is love that makes him the eternal Lord and King. May that wise and holy influence be stronger to guide us than all our sins and fears, and in its keeping may our hearts find their perfect rest now and forevermore!

If we must try to state in words the religion embodied in the person of the Christian Founder, we may perhaps resolve it into an intimate sense of filial spiritual relation to a God of righteousness and love, an unreserved recognition of moral fraternity among men, and a reverent estimate of humanity compelling the faith that the dead live.—James Martineau.

DR. MARTINEAU'S LATEST WORD.

In the Nineteenth Century for April we have a review of Mr. Balfour's "Foundations of Belief" which has all the marks which distinguish Dr. Martineau. Although it is from the pen of one who has reached fourscore and ten, it is as vigorous, profound, and rich in elevated spiritual thought as any of his former works. Three subjects he briefly touches are of supreme importance,—Natural and Revealed Religion, the Incarnation, and the Atonement.

NATURAL AND REVEALED RELIGION.

The twofold implication that nature is self-active and God's agency intrusive is a childish misconception which compels us to seek for a more tenable interpretation of the contrasted terms. This we at once obtain if, under the words "Natural and Revealed," we look at the relation, not of the opposite fields of phenomena studied, but of the opposite movements of thought in the minds that meet and find each other. The human intelligence, in its natural working on its own experience, beats out the steps of inference which lead to a knowledge of God, more or less distinctly realized. This is a process consciously, even anxiously, elaborated in conformity with recognized laws of rational judgment: man is the explorer, and stands at last in the divine presence, rendering the worship of his "Natural Religion." But the God who has made himself accessible by this mediate process has not renounced the freedom of infinite Spirit, or bound himself not to commune with the freedom he has lent to the finite spirits of his children; and, according to their needs, or in response to their aspirations, he comes to them unseen, with a new flash of insight, the hint of a higher ideal, or the touch of more hopeful enthusiasm, which lifts them from their level life and joins them to the prophets who best know his counsels and win men to his righteousness. Here, then, the initiative is with God, of whose quickening and illuminating wave of power man is the recipient. In his consciousness that he has not worked it out for himself it comes to him as revelation, and is accepted as a trust given for the enlargement of faith and the consecration of life. Here, then, "Revealed Religion" is the immediate divine knowledge by the communion of God's Spirit with man's, as distinguished from the natural religion earned by the mediate operation of the human faculties of search.

THE INCARNATION.

In the particular case of Christianity, taken as defined in the three creeds, the human need to which it responds is said to be deliverance from the terror of so stupendous a universe as this and so insignificant a life as ours, in thralldom to the body, with the image of God, if ever there, effaced by the inherited features of a brute ancestry. What could so surely check and relieve the self-contempt of such a creature in such a world as the assumption of his nature, and the experience of its humiliations, and the consecration of its opportunities by the Son of God? Since that life of pure devotion, of vanquished temptation, of sublime sorrow, and its return to God, have not the estimates of moral greatness expanded to the dimensions of the visible and invisible heavens? Is there a constellation in the sky fairer than the galaxy of graces in a holy soul? Is there any planetary cycle that will outlast the immortal life of the children of God? Reborn under the Christian inspiration, we rise at a bound from the stunning shocks of physical nature, and are no longer alone and lost in the infinite spaces. The real drama of existence is with the spirits, whether near or far, who can aspire and love, and will act like ourselves or above ourselves.

There is, no doubt, a profound truth involved in this estimate of the belief in the Incarnation. It has determined in the right direction the long-trembling balance between two competing ideals of the divine nature,—identified in the one case with the fearful aggregate of predetermining cosmic forces, and in the other with the wisdom of an Infinite Mind, partly committed to a steadfast order, but amply free to pity and to love. Has, then, the living God manifested himself in the Son of Mary? Then we are not lashed to the wheel of necessity, but in the hands of one who "has compassion on the multitudes," who has not ordained temptation and sorrow and death without knowing what they are and how they may be sanctified. Is this, then,—this "stricken of God and afflicted,"—his "Son"? Then we, too, are his sons; for this is our "elder Brother." Such an answer to the fearful and desponding heart does meet a pressing want, and often, doubtless, has relieved it. But to cite this result as an important evidence of the Incarnation miracle is hardly admissible; for, were it fiction instead of fact, it would affect its believers as it does at present. The whole creative impulse, indeed, which directs the religious imagination and shapes its significant myths and ever-growing oral traditions, is the yearning of some spiritual thirst within the soul, or the pathetic silence of thought on some unansured problem. The need and the response are sure to find each other out, whether the initiative be taken from the secret prayer of man or the realizing gift of God.

Anyhow, the essence of the influence claimed for the Incarnation doctrine lies in this, that by humanizing God it draws him within the sphere of our affections, gives deeper meaning to our assurance that he knows our trials and our griefs, and identifies the moral perfection and "beauty of holiness" which is loved of God with our own aspirations of conscience and enthusiasm of worship. In other words, the Divinity of Christ destroys the dread distance between the infinite God and our finite selves, by bringing to the front of a great human drama the spiritual attributes—actual in him, possible in us—which make the personal natures homogeneous and qualify us also to be "sons of God." But, in order to reveal this homogeneity, was it necessary for God to be born and pass through the conditions of finite humanity? Whatever of godlike character such a being evinced would in that case belong to him as a unique subject, compounded of two natures, and would afford no sample of what might be expected from us "mere men." But let the order be reversed, and from the human level let one appear who, born in the flesh, is reborn in the Spirit; let him, through a few pathetic years with tragic close, leave an indelible impression of how divine may be a life of man at one with God,—and the unification and communion of the earthly and the heavenly spheres thus personally realized are forever secured as the meaning of God for the soul of man.

A secret feeling of this overflow of the divine essence into humanity contributed, I believe, not a little to the intensity—at first view so strange—of the early Arian controversy. Was the "person" of "the Son" of "essence like the Father's" or of the "very essence of the Father's"? According to the Arians, the former; for they ranked him as still among the "creatures" of the divine hand, though of a high order. According to the Athanasians, the latter; for he was uncreated,—not an organized product brought into a certain grade, however eminent, of thinking and acting life on terminable lease, but spirit itself, with its creative and self-directing powers, commissioned freely to conduct the divine administration of an appointed finite province of time and space. Is not this, then, a true conception, that we see in the mind of Christ the very essence of the mind of God in what he loves and requires to see in us; not the passiveness of an instrument or the obedience of a creature, but the filial devotion, the self-renunciation, the enthusiasm of all righteous affections, which must forever constitute the ethics of all worlds? In opening to us this co-essentiality with God through his own personality, did he show us what is true of his own individuality alone? On the contrary, he stands, in virtue of it, as the spiritual head of mankind; and what you predicate of him in actuality is predicable of all in possibility. This interpretation of his life on earth carries the divine essence claimed for him into our nature as his brethren. In him, as our representative, we learn our summons and receive our adoption as children of God.

THE ATONEMENT.

The "Incarnation," thus extended from the person of Christ to the nature of man, may fitly be called "the central mystery of revealed religion." When Mr. Balfour places on the same line with it the doctrine of Redemption through the atoning blood of Christ, and finds in this belief a satisfying response to a legitimate need of the human soul, I can only wish that he had more explicitly defined the ethical beliefs which he has saved from the blight of naturalism. For, however naturalism may fall short of the ideas of sin, righteousness, and responsibility, as interpreted by the conscience, it does not, like the vicarious atonement, assume them only to cripple and betray them. That personal guilt and goodness are exchangeable qualities that may be shifted by compact, like deficit and surplus between debtor and creditor; that the "Judge of all the earth," having announced a penalty for wrong, cannot remit it to the penitent offender, but may transfer it to a willing innocent; and that, in this way, the actual sins of all Christian believers have been bought off by the sufferings of Christ, and his holiness placed to the account of the redeemed,—are propositions condensing into a small compass the maximum of contradiction to the very essence of morals. If it be a "pressing need" of human experience to which such doctrine brings response, it is assuredly no "ethical need." When the conscience, cleared of its film, looks with open eye upon a recent sin, does it urge the penitent to pray, "Lord, do let me off!" and suggest as a supporting plea, "Or, if some notice must be taken, here is one who loves me, and will suffer in my stead"? Do you hear in this the voice of repentance, or that of selfish fear, that doubles guilt in clutching at escape on any terms? Compare with this haste "to be saved" the nobler thought of Plato, "that impunity is a more dreadful curse than any punishment, and that nothing so good can befall the criminal as his retribution, the failure of which would but make a double discord in the order of the universe. The offender himself may spend his arts in devices of escape, and think himself happy if he is not found out. But all this plotting is but part of the delusion of his sin; and, when he comes to himself and sees his transgression as it really is, he will yield himself up as the prisoner of eternal justice, and know that it is good for him to be afflicted, and so, for the first time, to be set at one with truth." To Mr. Balfour the problem of undeserved sufferings in the world appears, though not theoretically solved, at least practically lightened by the sympathetic endurance on the cross of the very God who administers them. To me, I confess, the difficulty seems driven to its extremity when the holiest of beings is allowed, by the maximum of suffering, to buy off the penal dues of all the sinners who will accept the release.

THE BLESSED BIRDS.

The birds do an immense amount of drudgery for man, though they sometimes reward themselves for this hard work by dainty tidbits of ripening fruit. A pair of common American robins or thrushes have been watched while they carried three thousand earth-worms to one brood. Woodpeckers destroy eggs and larvæ which would literally develop millions of destructive creatures, both in forests and orchards; and one of the most inveterate foes of the canker-worm is the beautiful oriole, were it but allowed to live and hang its swinging cradle in the elm. For every wing of black and gold on a young girl's hat an apple-tree is stripped of leaves and young fruit and left brown and ugly in the summer sun, or an elm is denuded of its graceful foliage by the loathsome canker-worm.

Says Eldridge E. Fish, in "The Blessed Birds": "The beautiful little indigo-birds, looking like patches of blue sky among the green leaves, are nearly gone. The tanagers, with their tropical brilliancy, are almost extinct. . . . The flickers, with golden wing-shafts and crowns of crimson, are

A New Move.

During the last six months we have made a special feature of low-priced dining-room furniture, and the result has been so successful that we have now opened a large new wareroom devoted exclusively to this one class of work.

In connection with the opening of this new department we have made some very low prices on Sideboards and Dining Tables. We have taken some of our best medium-priced Dining Sets, and marked them at a figure never before known. The greatest bargains we have ever offered in this line are here this month.

Bear in mind that this is not a cheaper grade than our regular furniture. It is made in our best style, fully warranted, and there is nothing more honestly built in our entire establishment. It is simply closely figured with a view to every possible economy in cost. It is made in a less variety of patterns (which saves considerable expense) and with less expensive trimmings and ornaments; but otherwise it is constructed in our best manner.

Ladies desiring furniture which shall embody all the latest ideas and conveniences with small expenditure should visit our new wareroom.

hunted like outlaws. The American gold-finches, so sprightly and so musical, and formerly so plentiful in every field and orchard, where they were at home in trees or on pasture thistles, gems of jet and gold, are now seen only occasionally. They were too pretty to be allowed to live in this wicked world. The bluebirds have had an equally hard fate. . . . A few more years of such wanton warfare on these unbought yet priceless blessings, a few more years of crime against the wise order of the world, and men will walk the voiceless fields and woods, where, instead of bright wings amid the green foliage, and artistic structures filled with eggs and fluttering birds, only unsightly nests of crawling worms will dangle from bush and tree. In place of soothing, happy bird voices, only the fretting hum of troublesome insects will worry the listening ear."

Who is responsible for this waste of life in the bird kingdom? There are those ready to blame the scientific collector for a great deal of it. Of course, a certain number of birds are killed for museums and for study; but what are the facts? The number killed in one season in Florida for ladies' hats—one man alone collecting one hundred and thirty-five thousand skins—exceeded the specimens of birds in the National Museum at Washington and in the American Museum of Natural History in New York put together. Yet these collections represent birds from every part of the world, and they have been fifty years collecting. Scientific students, as a rule, are conservative, and do not needlessly sacrifice life.

Not so much can be said of amateur collectors. They are careless and grasping. The rarer the bird, the more intent they are to secure it. The thought of protection, that it may increase and multiply, does not seem to cross their minds. They should certainly be restrained, and taught to study the living bird in its native haunt with opera-glass, and by long, patient search and observation. They will thus acquire much more than bird-lore. Neither should they be encouraged to make collections of birds' eggs; for, though each boy takes but one egg from a nest, two or three comrades will soon empty it. No, the naturalists are not the chief sinners in this war of extermination.

Greater sinners than the ornithologists are the women, whose thoughtless vanity is responsible for untold innocent deaths, and for the bitter cruelty necessary to secure the plumes with which they adorn themselves. Every egret plume waving from a woman's hat represents a murdered mother and a nest of little ones left to starve. The exquisite plume grows only in the reproductive season. Instead of nodding over the little flock, a thing of beauty in its own place, it is torn out to deck an ignorant or a heartless woman's head. One sees comparatively few songbirds in hats now, but the egret plume is still eagerly sought.

Spiritual Life.

He who sincerely loves God cares more for the spiritual progress of his neighbor, and for consoling and helping him, than he does for his own repose.—Saint Teresa.

Grace ever attendeth him who is duly thankful. Be, therefore, thankful for the least gift. So shalt thou be meet to receive greater. But that cannot be little which is given by the most high God.—Thomas à Kempis.

Life is made up, not of great sacrifices or duties, but of little things, in which smiles and kindnesses and small obligations, given habitually, are what win and preserve the heart and secure comfort.—The Churchman.

Put a seal upon your lips, and forget what you have done. After you have been kind, after love has stolen forth into the world and done its beautiful work, go back into the shade again, and say nothing about it. Love hides even from itself.—Prof. Drummond.

The maelstrom attracts more notice than the quiet fountain, a comet draws more attention than the steady star; but it is better to be the fountain than the maelstrom, and star than comet, following out the sphere and orbits of quiet usefulness in which God places us.—John Hall.

He only is great of heart who floods the world with a great affection. He only is great of mind who stirs the world with great thoughts. He only is great of will who does something to shape the world to a great career. And he is greatest who does the most of all these things, and does them best.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

When one thinks that nobody cares for him, and that he is alone in a cold and selfish world, he would do well to ask himself this question: "What have I done to make any one care for and love me, and to warm the world with faith and generosity?" It is generally the case that those who complain the most have done the least. The Lutheran.

He who never connects God with his daily life knows nothing of the spiritual meaning and uses of life,—nothing of the calm, strong patience with which ills may be endured; of the gentle, tender comfort which the Father's love can minister; of the blessed rest to be realized in his forgiving love, his tender fatherhood; of the deep, peaceful sense of the infinite One ever near, a refuge and a strength.—Archbishop Farrar.

Literature.

"IN WOODS AND FIELDS."*

The pen of Augusta Larned has long been familiar to the readers of the Christian Register, whether in the "Home," in her interesting "New York Letters," in her exquisite descriptions of travel, in the poet's corner, or in some moral, social, or spiritual study on the editorial page. City life has not dimmed her appreciation or dampened her enthusiasm for the world of nature; and perhaps none of her writings call forth more admiration than her letters and poems, in which the life, the joy, the beauty, and mystery of nature speak and sing through her.

In this volume we have not a dried herbarium of pressed flowers, or any artificial mimicry of nature, or any colorless photographs of the outward world: we have the soul of nature itself. It springs into bloom; it exhales in fragrance; it breathes through the trees, sings with the birds, sparkles with the dew, twinkles with the stars, or beats with the rhythm of the sea. Theocritus has come back to us, and sings in English as easily as in Greek. This gentle bard, whose nimble spirit the author invokes, seems to have been easily persuaded "To bless this strange and virgin soil,

And, by the simply glad refrain,
Charm us from greed and barren toil."

But one can just as easily see that these poems are not simple literary reflections or imitations of Theocritus or any other writer. They are not pictures copied from some other canvas. There is nothing second-hand here. They are fresh, immediate inspirations from the spirit of Nature herself. They are descriptive, but not didactic,—impressions rather than catalogues, but with more of accuracy and finish than the impressionist is wont to put on his canvas, and with more ideality than the realist infuses into his. Nature has a body and a soul, and Miss Larned gives us both. We see things as they are; but, what is more, we feel them. Read her poem on "Summer Noon," and the thermometer will go up to summer heat. It might be hard to construct a single visual picture from this poem. There are many pictures wrought in one; but you feel the poem in your blood, and may be tempted too quickly to throw off your winter clothing, till you turn to "Winter Twilight," which is as exquisite a transcription of a winter sunset as one may easily find in verse. We shall spoil the unity of the poem in an attempt to quote from it:—

"A church spire rises dark and still Against an orange sunset sky.
No burning cloud broods o'er the hill,
No fleck of flame floats far and high.

"All vacant the entranced air,
Save filmy webs of color dyed;
And all the ridges, bleak and bare,
Are bathing in this magic tide.

"Close-clinging mask, the snow enshrouds
Each tiny dell and sculptured knoll.
The dying god, unveiled by clouds,
Brims with his blood earth's Parian bowl.

"Far, far beneath the glens are lone,
Ringed round with fir-trees' dusky shade;
And banded solemn tone on tone
The purple o'er the blue is laid.

*IN WOODS AND FIELDS. By Augusta Larned. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

"Still low the sunset findeth room
To burn the fringes of the night.
Eclipsed in glory and in gloom,
The earth has vanished from our sight."

But it is rather spring and summer in all their various moods which furnish key-note and rhythm for the poet's song. It is the sprouting corn, the tiny leaf-bud, the drowsy-lidded flowers, heaven's sweet dews and vernal bowers, the white-throated finch, or some other attribute that allures her. There is here not the pantheism of the philosopher, but the pantheism of the poet, who feels the throb of God life in all creation, and translates the humble milkweed into this beautiful psalm:—

"Small spinner of the fields,
Where are thy fairy reels?
Thy busy spindles fine,
To mesh this silken twine?"

"I know thy distaff green,
Fretting the satin sheen,
Of thread more delicate
Than wrought Ulysses' mate.

"The laces from thy loom,
This poor and common bloom,
Would deck Titania's trail
Or Queen Mab's bridal veil.

"Thou art all fantasy,
Like some fond poet,—he
Who from his heart untwines
The stuff of mazy rhymes.

"Winged his songs shall go
The wide world to and fro,
As thou dost wing thy seeds
Out of thy being's needs.

"At nature's still behest
Is spun thy downy breast,
To thin and silky sails,
That catch the autumn gales.

"And through the air I see Thy little colony
Voyaging in azure space,
To magnify thy race.

"But canst thou ever guess
The need of toil and stress,
While thou the livelong day
Shouldst spin thy heart away?"

"Nay, instinct blind and slow,
That way the sap doth go,
By some mysterious path
In thee hath turned to faith."

Miss Larned writes not only as the artist, but as the devotee. Nature to her is not the refectory, but the shrine in her cloister. There is no formality in her service, nothing of creedal conventionality, no tagging on of a religious label to these verses, as the scientist classifies his birds and flowers; nor is there anything morbid or dreary. The religious quality is the tinge that colors the whole, the blood that circulates within, and which gives light and vitality to the conception. Who can fail to respond to this exquisite liturgy of nature in the eloquence of silence so beautifully conveyed in "At Evening"?—

"A prayer exhales from out the wood,
The prayer of Nature to her God;
And in this low and purple glade
The strolling herds pause, half afraid.
So deep the peace, so deep the rest,
An infant on its mother's breast,
With even pulses breathing balm,
Can image forth the perfect calm.

"Within this hushed and sacred hour
The silence blossoms like a flower;
And color melts unseen away,
And leaves the silver and the gray.
So thought gives place to vague content,
The soul of music twined and blent
With reveries dim and pleasing throng,
A soundless chant, a wordless song.

"The mountains bend to lesser height
Beneath the majesty of night,—
An awestruck circle, hand in hand,
A linked and mighty praying band.
And we, too, light the inner shrine
To worship here the All-divine;
When consciousness his throne reveals,
Within its fane the spirit kneels."

So in "The Buddhist Prayer" the perfect union of the soul with God is sung in such a soft, musical benediction that, forgetting we are Christians, we say a prayerful "Amen!"

But we must not mutilate or dismember more of these poems. We simply welcome our readers to the pleasure which is before them. Their summer outings will not fail to be richer and more delightful with this little volume as a companion.

The fine and delightful finish of these verses is something which seems to belong to the very texture of the poem, as the color belongs to the flower or as the polish of the marble is an attribute of its particles. We lay down this charming book, and ask ourselves, Who of our living American poets can write or convey more beautifully the spirit of nature than the author of "In Woods and Fields"?

JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE. Essays by Kan'zō Uchimura, Tokio, Japan.—As the writer of these essays says in the preface, "So much is written about Japan by travelers, who examined it at the rate of forty miles an hour," that there ought to be a prompt welcome to opinions "of native

DINNER WARE.

Never in the history of Pottery manufacture was the cost of the ordinary lines so low as now. This is the result chiefly of the progressive reduction caused by modern labor and fuel saving methods.

We have recently landed by ships "Feliciana," from Hamburg, the "Bostonian" and "Catalonia," from Liverpool, the "Belgian King," from Antwerp, and the "Lillian L. Robbins," from Hong Kong, importations including new designs of DINNER AND TEA SETS, rendering the exhibit in our Dinner Set Department (3d floor) replete and complete in all grades, from the low cost decorated Dinner Set for the Cottage as low as eight dollars, up through more than one hundred and forty patterns, foreign and domestic, to the most expensive decorated Porcelain Services to be found on this continent. Dinner Sets at thirty dollars that two years ago would have cost fifty dollars. More than forty of the one hundred and forty decorated patterns are stock patterns, which can be had in sets or separate pieces, and readily matched, an advantage always appreciated by experienced housekeepers.

Stock patterns cost no more than patterns of which separate pieces cannot be obtained.

To accommodate our extensive stock patterns, we have added to our premises, so that now we have more than TEN THOUSAND bins occupied to meet this demand.

Intending buyers, or those interested in seeing present styles and values, compared with last year, will find the ware marked in plain figures. One price only at retail, and no deviation.

The present prices do not represent a "marked-down sale" or "closing out values," but are simply the REDUCED PRICES, based upon the REDUCED COST, of reliable ware.

We will thank any patron to point out on what item, if any, we are above low market value, as we are not undersold on equal ware if we know it.

Besides the many new shapes and decorations, patrons will find the OLD BLUE WILLOW WARE, the OLD BLUE CANTON CHINA, the OLD BLUE DRESDEN ONION CHINA, the OLD BLUE WEDGWOOD, and other of the Standard WORCESTER ROYAL PORCELAIN and HAVILAND PATTERNS.

In the GLASS DEPARTMENT will be seen the newest patterns of CRYSTAL CUT GLASS for wedding gift pieces. Also LOW COST PRESSED GLASSWARE for seashore and rural outfits.

In the Art Pottery Rooms will be seen the choicest novelties in China from Mintons, Doultons, and the Royal Worcester Potteries, adapted to wedding and complimentary gifts, and on the Main Floor elegant Plant Pots and Pedestals, Umbrella Stands, Toilet Sets, etc. Our stock at this season was never larger, more valuable, and comprehensive than now, comprising the best products of foreign and American potteries and glass factories; and prices were never so low.

origin." The book will doubtless help readers to appreciate better the national characteristics, even though it is sent out with confidence only in its purpose, and none at all "in the syntax and gerund-laws" of the English in which it is written. The book is interesting in every way. The mission of Japan is expressed as that of reconciling the East with the West, of being the advocate of the East and the harbinger of the West. An appendix contains a justification of the Korean War, which is an earnest plea for sympathetic neutrality from the nations of the world. Despite the disclaimer in the preface, the English of the book is remarkably good, and the writer shows his intimate acquaintance with the history and literature of other countries.

How WE ROSE. By David Nelson Beach. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 60 cents.—The beginning of this little book reminds one strongly of Mrs. Oliphant's "The Little Pilgrim," in that it gives us in a prose poem the experience of one who has died and wakened in the other life. It is all simple, tender, and true-hearted, showing the man back of the thought. It is more than that; for the breadth of sympathy is of the intellect as well as of the heart, and its insight recognizes the reality in all searchings for truth and in all religions, never comprehended by any of them, greater than all of them. The last chapter is different from the others, and shows that manly indignation with wrong is not incompatible with loving help for the wrong-doer.

PICTURES IN VERSE. By George Lansing Raymond, L.H.D. With Twenty Illustrations by Maud Stum. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The pictures and the illustrations in this volume harmonize better than such things do for the most part. Both will appeal to certain people in proportion to their lack of literary judgment and appreciation of what is good in art. A certain mustiness is the prevailing note in either form. There is more promise, however, of something better in the pictures than in the poems; and we are inclined to think that, if the illustrator had been working up to the level of something simple and strong instead of down to the level of something weak and sentimental, she would have done much better work.

DOCTOR JUDAS: A PORTRAYAL OF THE OPIUM HABIT. By William Rosser Cobb. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co.—"Opium is the Judas of drugs: it kisses, and then betrays." The writer of this book had the misfortune to learn the truth of this saying at the terrible price of personal experience. He has written with the sense of solemn responsibility; and he assures us that the facts of this "blinding, absorbing, frightful slavery" are given with most faithful exactitude. The multiplicity of details will render the book chiefly valuable to those who are entering a like experience, and may be thus influenced to leave toxic drugs alone, or to physicians who may be interested in the pathological aspects of the case.

HEADS OF ENGLISH UNITARIAN HISTORY, WITH APPENDED LECTURES ON BAXTER AND PRIESTLEY. By Alexander Gordon, M.A. London: Philip Green & Co.—This is an outline intended as a guide to learners. The history of English Unitarianism is not easy, many of its passages being obscure and complicated; yet it is the key to its meaning. The appended addresses are intended as specimens of an ampler treatment of special passages, and deal with three important sections: the Non-conformist exodus of 1662; the Unitarian Rebirth of the last Century; and the Legalization of Doctrinal Change by the Chapel Acts of 1844.

THE ARMENIAN CRISIS IN TURKEY. By Frederick Davis Greene. G. P. Putnam's Sons.—This book has already been noticed at length in our editorial columns, and its importance emphasized. It is interesting in itself as an historical account of Armenia, and a book of information about the physical aspects, inhabitants, and administration of Eastern Turkey, as well as most valuable for the accuracy of its reports about the Sassoun massacre. It contains much about which every thoughtful citizen should be informed, and it ought certainly to have a wide sale.

Literary Notes.

Charles H. Kerr & Co. of Chicago announce for immediate publication "Cash vs. Coin," by Edward Wisner; "The Garden of Eden, U.S.A.," by W. H. Bishop, which proposes "a practical solution of the labor question" and "a readjustment of domestic economy"; "Sister Gratia," a book which aims to entertain rather than instruct; and "The Zigzag Paths of Life," by Matilda Vance Cheney.

Miscellaneous.

The Massachusetts Year Book and City and Town Register for 1895, of which mention was made last week, is published by F. S. Blanchard & Co., Worcester, Mass. It is a most useful compendium of information.

MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as Related to the Inward Life. By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D., Author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. Cloth, red edges, 50 cents; full gilt, $1.00.

Contents: 1. A Wayside Prophet; 2. The Joy in Harvest; 3. Monuments of the Leaves; 4. The Mission of the Snowflake; 5. Down to the Lake.

The third volume in the cloth-bound series of "Life" books,—"A Child of Nature," by Rev. Dr. Marion D. Shutter,—is already meeting large and favorable notice. The book is so handsome externally that many, seeing the 50-cent edition, at first suppose it to be the $1.00 edition. In its contents, the book, while entirely different from either of its predecessors in the series, is certain to meet with a no less cordial reception. "The graceful little volume," as the Boston Traveler calls it, has much of interest and much of meaning for all who shall read it, and, from cover to cover through its 111 pages, presents vividly, by tender and wise and picturesque object-teaching, "the message" of Mother Nature "that is ready for the human heart."

THE STORY OF CHRISTINE ROCHEFORT

BY HELEN CHOATE PRINCE.

BOSTON.

The characters are finely drawn, and the story is from beginning to end interesting and timely, and the style is exceptionally pleasing.—Advertiser.

Its theme is unusual, and the grace and delicacy with which it is worked out are more unusual still.—The Literary World.

A novel of striking merit and fine quality, Courier.

Intensely interesting from cover to cover.—Gazette.

NEW YORK.

A charming love story is woven into the web of the tale, which is pure in morals and related in a dramatic style which the author uses with great felicity and much power.—American Stationer.

A story of much interest, excellently planned and well written.—Public Opinion.

CHICAGO.

French provincial life is very well portrayed in this book, the characters are charmingly delineated, and the scenery of old pastoral France is as attractive as words can possibly paint it.—Journal.

The personal touches, scenes, and conversations are delightful.—Times-Herald.

CAMBRIDGE.

It is altogether probable that the story of Christine Rochefort is very largely founded on fact; and it is the internal evidence of this that enhances the reader's interest in the book, and gives it the air of verity it possesses in such a marked degree.—Tribune.

WORCESTER.

The book is timely, and the ability with which it is written makes it more than that. Many of the situations are strong, some are remarkable.—Spy.

CHARLESTON.

The author is evidently well acquainted with French provincial life, and describes it admirably. . . . The old Marquise du Chatelet is a delightful portrait. The novel is a decided success.—News and Courier.

PHILADELPHIA.

An earnest story, with a refinement of tone that should be expected from a granddaughter of Rufus Choate.—Times.

DETROIT.

It is a strong picture of important conditions, and the story is to be numbered with the stronger novels of the season.—Free Press.

MINNEAPOLIS.

The writer gives a splendid picture of French provincial life, . . . and seems to have a natural heritage of power and ability.—Tribune.

ROCHESTER.

Singularly fresh and vivacious, and the theme is discussed in a strikingly original manner.—Herald.

TO A ROBIN.

BY CONSIDER B. CARTER.

O robin redbreast, welcome but too soon!
The wind is bleak upon the dreary wold,
The flocks complain within a sunless fold,
The brook goes rippling down in frosty tune;
But thou, courageous bird, dost presage June,
With love-song warbling from the maple's spray
To thy brown mate demure, that morn and noon
Will brood her bower home where nestlings play.
Sing on, sweet bird, thy joyful roundelay!
For not for man alone the earth and air:
God's winged voices are as dear as they.
And all have need of love's protecting care,
The while, like thee, we build and sing and rear,
Until, alas! like thee, we fly away.

GRANDMA'S BIRTHDAY.

BY REBECCA PALFREY UTTER.

Mary and Tommy came bursting into the sitting-room like a young hurricane. Mary threw herself on the lounge, and buried her face in the pillow, shaking with unrestrained laughter; and Tommy tumbled down upon the hearth-rug, giving vent to his feelings by shouting and clapping his feet together in the air. Dickle, the youngest, was the most dignified of the three. He sat down in his little rocking-chair, looking with some amusement at the performances of his brother and sister, but seeming a little abashed. He held in his hand a large bunch of flowers. His real name was not Dickle: Tommy was responsible for his being called so. One day the "hurrying wind" of April scattered a few freckles on his small nose; and Tommy called him "freckle-nose Dick," and then "Dicklenose freck"; and then it was shortened to "Dickle." But his father and mother and grandmother did not call him Dickle.

"Well, children," said the mother, looking up from her mending, "what has happened now?"

"O mamma," said both the children at once, "it was so funny!"

"Let me tell, Tommy: I shall splode if I don't tell it."

And Tommy averted the disaster by yielding.

"You know, mamma, it's grandma's birthday; and we thought we'd celebrate. We were going to have Dickle present some flowers and speak some poetry. So Tommy and I made some poetry. This was it:—

'Dear grandma, 'tis your birthday morn,
And we are glad that you were born.
We bring you daisies
That every one praises;
We bring you cups of butter
And hawthorn buds that flutter.'

Don't you think that's a nice verse?"

"I've no doubt grandma liked it very much," said the mother; "but, somehow, I never noticed that hawthorn buds flutter."

"No, they don't," answered Mary; "but Tommy said it must rhyme, anyway, and that 'flutter' was a nice word. And papa said that after 'cups of butter' it would be better not to say anything about 'flower,' or else grandma might think it was a receipt for cake. And so we had to say 'buds'; and, then, we really did pick buds, to make that all right. Well, we made Dickle learn it; and we got him so that he said every word just right. And one day, when grandma was out on the piazza, we took him up to her room, and showed him how to do it. We thought we'd have him go in with his hat on, and stand right in the middle of the rug by the little table, and then take off his hat and make a bow, and speak the poetry, and give grandma the flowers, and come out again; and, if he did it right, I was going to give him my soft rubber ball, and Tommy was going to give him three marbles. And, then, Tommy was going in to give his present; and then I was going in to give mine. Well, Dickle went in with his flowers; and Tommy and I listened at the door. But we didn't peek, for fear grandma would see us. He said it just exactly right, and Tommy whispered to me that he believed he'd give him four marbles. But, when he came out, he had the flowers in his hand. 'Why, Dickle!' said Tommy: 'you forgot to give her the flowers!' 'She wasn't there,' said Dickle. And, sure enough, mamma, grandma was out in the garden all the time; and that baby never noticed it till he got all through."

"I are not a baby," said Dickle.

THE CHILDREN'S APPLE-TREE.

"That apple-tree will have to be cut down," said Mr. Cameron, looking out of the window one morning just after breakfast.

"Cut down!" echoed the children, in dismay.

"Why not?" asked their father, mischievously.

"It bears delicious fruit," said Max.

"There are several trees like it in grandpa's orchard."

"But this one belongs to me!" cried wee Robin.

"Why, papa," said Marjorie, "I could not learn my lessons in any other place so well as in that dear old tree."

"Poor lessons to-day, then," said Mr. Cameron. "Just listen to the rain dashing against the window-pane."

"Is that good poetry, papa?"

"Isn't it? Well, listen. If you young people can tell me anything about an apple-tree, and give three good reasons why that one should adorn our lawn, I'll spare it. We will consider the subject this evening. Max, the umbrella, please. Good-by!"

"Oh, mamma, cannot you think of a hundred reasons?" exclaimed Jeanie.

"Hardly. You must do the best you can. I will put in one plea."

"There isn't a thing to say," declared Max. "An apple-tree is an apple-tree, and that's all there is about it."

"Nothing! What was papa reading the other night about?"

"Oh, yes! And"—Here Max disappeared in the direction of the library.

"What can I find out about it, mamma?" asked Jeanie.

"Cannot you give us a botanical description?"

"I could write out all that I can remember of the lesson you gave us when we analyzed the blossoms last spring."

"That will please papa."

"What can I do?" asked Marjorie.

"Tell us what the poets have said about them."

"Oh, I shall like that!"

"Me, too," pleaded Robin. "What can me do?"

"We'll see," said mamma.

Max found plenty of allusions to apples, but could not seem to arrange them to his satisfaction. At last he came to his mother, saying, "I should like to write a fine essay, mamma; but I don't know how to do it."

"Papa will not expect an essay, Max. Write down all that you can remember of what you have been reading."

Jeanie and Marjorie had too much material, and mamma wisely drew her pencil through two-thirds of it. Robin could hardly keep his verse until evening, and so the stormy day passed pleasantly away.

"Well, children," said Mr. Cameron after supper, "how about the apple-tree?"

"Papa, how can you even think of cutting it down?" said Jeanie.

"Well, what have you to say for it?"

"Everything!"

"Everything?"

"We have played in it so long!"

"Just think of the beautiful blossoms!"

"And the handsome red fruit in September!"

"I've written a sort of an essay," began Max.

"We must hear it," said his father, sitting down before the fire, and taking Robin on his knee.

"I've got a verse! I've got a verse!" cried Robin.

"Shall we begin with the youngest?" asked Mr. Cameron.

"You had better," said Max, "or he will fly into pieces."

"Papa, don't you remember the day when Robin first found a seed in his apple, and how he came running to us, saying: 'Toffee in 'e apple! Toffee in 'e apple!'"

"I was a baby then," said Robin, frowning. "I've got a verse to say now."

Then, standing between his father's knees, with his curly head thrown back, he recited in a shrill voice the following verse:

'Hats full, caps full!
Bushels, bushels, bags full!
Give me all that I can eat
Of juicy apples, red and sweet.'

"Ho!" cried Max, while Robin climbed back upon his father's knee, very much delighted and somewhat bashful, as the other children clapped him.

"Now we will listen to that 'sort of an essay,'" said papa.

"All right," said Max. "Here goes! 'When our forefathers came over in the 'Mayflower,' there were no apples in this country. But they soon brought over the young trees; and they thrived so well that now there are plenty of apple orchards all over the country, especially in New England.'"

"Especially in New England?" repeated his father.

"Yes, sir. I ought to have said the best are in New England."

"And the best tree in our yard," put in Marjorie.

"What a comfort," Max went on, "these young apple orchards must have been to our foremothers in the old colonial days, when they were homesick for their native land!" Mamma was saying that, and I put it in because it was a new idea. 'In our grandmothers' girlhood they used to have 'apple bees' (I wish they had 'em now), when they all met together in some pleasant kitchen to pare apples. Part of the fun was to pare the apples so as not to break the peeling. Then the long coil was swung three times around the head and dropped on the floor. Whatever letter it was most like, that was the initial letter of your sweetheart's name.'"

"Let's try it," said Jeanie.

"Keep still, children! 'Our old Teutonic ancestors used to believe that lightning had no power to strike an apple-tree, so they planted them close to their homesteads for protection as well as shade. You have all heard about William Tell, and the apple he had to shoot from his little boy's head.'"

"That's a fable," remarked Jeanie.

"Keep still, children! 'In Grecian mythology we read about the tree that bore the golden apples in the garden of the Hesperides, and how Hercules sought and found them under many difficulties.'"

"Where is the garden of the 'Sperides?'" asked Robin, thoughtfully.

Jeanie laughed.

"Then, again, in mythology is the apple that stirred up so much strife among the gods and the goddesses. One day, when they were merrily feasting, Ate, the goddess of strife, threw an apple into their midst, engraved with the words, 'To the most fair.' They all wanted it, you see."

"I should have given it to mamma," said Robin.

"Robin!" said Max, sternly. Then, going on, "The apple was once thought to be a symbol of perfection, and Alexander the Great had an apple made of gold found in the different countries he had conquered.' Mamma's making signs for me to stop, and I will,—only I want to say that some people would like the apple-blossom for our national flower, and I vote for it. Good-by."

"Well done for a little boy!" said papa.

"What makes you say good-by? Where are you going?" asked Robin.

"I only said it because I had to finish it off somehow," said Max.

After a little fun over Max's first essay, which he took very good-naturedly, mamma said, "Now, Jeanie."

Jeanie sat down on the rug, with her back to the open fire, that she might get a good light on her manuscript.

"In the vegetable kingdom the apple belongs to the Rosaceæ, or Rose family,—a royal family of fruits; for, besides the apple, it gives us the pear, peach, plum, and cherry, also the strawberry, raspberry, and blackberry. I think it might be called a royal family of flowers, too; for the rose belongs to this family, and other lovely flowers,—among them the wild meadow-sweet that mamma loves to gather for her pink jar.

"There are a great many different kinds of apples,—the greenings, baldwins, and russets, and others; and they are all supposed to have originated in the wild crab-apple tree, brought up from that bitter little apple, by grafting and cultivation, into the delicious fruit we all like so well. The blossoms have five rose-white petals, several stamens, and in the centre five long styles, leading to five little cells, that grow into five cartilaginous pods with dark brown seeds in them.

"We throw these pods—the core—away, and eat the calyx, which, being adherent to the pods, has grown and ripened into what we call the apple. The word 'apple' is from the Saxon word appel, their name for the tree.

"Biffins are dried apples; and it is also the name of a small apple that grows only in Norfolk, England.

"The wood of the tree is hard, and is used for shoemakers' lasts and for weavers' shuttles."

"Thank you, little daughter. Now what has Marjorie to give us?"

"A little poetry," Marjorie answered; and papa looked pleased, for he loved to listen to his eldest daughter's low, sweet voice in reading.

She began with Bryant's lovely poem called "Planting the Apple-tree."

Next came Lucy Larcom's "White Sunday," in which she sings about the apple-tree, and says of it:—

'A color not of earth, a tenderness
Of spotless snow and rose-blossoms clothed
The tree,
That stood up beneath the heavens, one flower.'

And then, so that the younger ones might not get tired, she ended by reading the "cellar scene" in Holland's "Bitter-Sweet."

"My verse was the prettiest," said Robin, when Marjorie stopped reading; "and I have been thinking of—thinking of"—

"What?"

"Of apple-dumplings!"

There was a good laugh at that, Robin's cheeks growing redder, until he burst out with, "And hot apple-sauce!"

"Roast apples!" cried Max.

"Let's have some! May we, mamma?"

Mamma nodded assent; and away rushed the boys, bringing back six apples, which they placed in a row on the hearth before the fire, the children tumbling in a rosy heap on the floor.

"Mamma, what is your plea? You said that you had one."

"I was thinking how much I enjoy the blossoms in May as I sit sewing by the nursery window.”

“Oh, and the robins’ nest! We all love it so well,” said Marjorie, softly.

“It shall stay with us.”

“We owe it a pleasant rainy day,” said mamma.

“Papa, here is the best of the roasted apples for you,” said Jeanie.—The Christian Union.

A TALE OF A BUTTERFLY.

There is a touching little story told of the late Charles Kingsley. One Sunday morning, at a church where he had to preach, he was going up the pulpit stairs, when he suddenly stooped down and, to the congregation’s surprise, disappeared from view. They sat patiently, wondering what could have happened; but the preacher still did not show himself. A church official who went in search of him found Kingsley in the vestry, looking closely at something which he held in the palm of his hand. It was a half-dead butterfly. The little insect had strayed in from the sunshine through an open window, and, while fluttering about, had in some way injured a wing. As it lay struggling on the stairs leading up to the pulpit, Kingsley’s quick eye detected it. His kind heart would not allow him to leave it there, to be roughly brushed aside, or perhaps trodden on. So he had at once carried it to a place of safety.—The Evangelist.

STORY OF THE PRINCESS ROSETTA.

Once upon a time, many and many a year ago, there lived a young princess whose name was Rosetta. Now, the three old ladies known as the Fates had been very kind to the little maid, as every one agreed; but, sad to tell, the princess herself was most discontented. A thousand times she stood at her turret window watching the crowd that passed below, and envying those with happy faces. She cried and cried, till her pretty eyes were red. She let little frowns tie hard knots in her white forehead and draw the sweetest of rosebud mouths all down at the corners. Then, chancing one day to look earnestly in the mirror, she cried again because she was not pretty. “Oh, what shall I do?” she sobbed. “I’m sure a princess ought to be beautiful, yet I am almost ugly. It is more than one can bear. I will go to the great wizard-bird, and beg him tell me what will make me different.”

Now, the wizard-bird was a strange creature,—so old, so very old, that no one on earth could tell anything about him. He had lived thousands and thousands of years since the world was covered with ice, and had grown so wise there was nothing left for him to learn. Often he wandered up and down the great cave where he lived, and talked to himself of his youth; of the days when he had flown miles and miles over vast ice-fields, gone deep into blue caverns of unknown depth, or perched on frozen precipices looking off over what seemed a glittering, dazzling world of glass.

Yes, he was very wise, this wizard-bird; and many came from far to learn of his wisdom. So also came the princess Rosetta, and begged him tell her how she might become beautiful.

“Silly child,” said the bird, “why shouldst thou care for so small a thing? Wisdom is better than beauty. Rather ask to be wise. Besides, how know I what will please thee? ’Tis all a matter of taste. Should I make thee fair, thou’ldst perchance choose to be dark. Go home, foolish one, and paint thy mirror till the reflection pleases. Then will I change thee thyself to correspond.”

“Ah, but paints would never stick to a mirror, good master,” said Rosetta, timidly.

“Take, then, these colors, my child,” said the bird. “They are formed from the rainbow tints prisoned in the ice crystals, and have a magic quality.”

So Rosetta hurried homeward, and painted and painted for many a day; but nothing seemed right. Light hair did not suit dark eyes, nor a Greek nose the little dimpled chin; and, as fast as she painted out the frown and the fretful little mouth, so fast they came back again, until the princess was in despair. Wandering up and down the picture galleries of the palace, she looked longingly at the beauties of long ago.

At last a sudden thought struck her: she would ask to be just like one of these,—the lovely dark-eyed girl with the sad smile, for instance. Sending quickly for the wizard, she told her wish.

“The little dark girl in the gold frame? Yes, yes: I remember her perfectly,” he said. “She was a cripple, and lived many years a sad, long life of suffering. If you would be like her, you must also take her life instead of your own; for one’s face is but the reflection of one’s life, you know.”

“Oh, I didn’t think of that,” cried the princess, dismayed. “Then I think I would rather be the little jolly, red-cheeked girl over in the corner.”

“Ah,” said the bird, looking at the portrait, “she was—let me see—a peasant, I believe. Those red cheeks belong to the sun and wind. Yes, she lived outdoors, tending sheep on the mountains. You must give up your palace if you would be her.”

“No, no,” cried Rosetta: “that would never do. Make me, then, like yonder proud queen.”

“Ah, no, my child,” said the wizard,—“not like her, surely! That pride of hers cost her dear; for she died in prison, alone and neglected, after many years of haughty resistance to the wishes of her subjects.”

Again and again the princess tried, till at last, discouraged, she turned to the wizard, saying:—

“Thou art wiser than I. Choose, then, which I had best be like.”

The wizard pointed to a picture turned to the wall, and bade the princess look at it.

Confused and surprised, Rosetta saw in the sweet, bright face that looked into hers a strange resemblance to her own. “Who is it, I pray?” she asked eagerly.

“Thyself, my child, as thou shalt be when thou hast learned that what is best for thee is thine already.”—Jessie B. Sherman, in Sacred Heart Review.

CHARITY.

A certain duchess was obliged to pay a visit to a convent on a cold winter’s day. The convent was poor, there was a dearth of wood, and the friars had nothing but their charity and the ardor of their prayers to keep out the cold. The duchess got a chill during her stay in the comfortless parlor of the convent, and returned home filled with pity for the suffering friars. While the maid was removing her mistress’s cloak, adding logs to the cheerful fire and preparing a warm drink, the duchess summoned her steward, and ordered some wood to be sent immediately to the convent. She then had her couch moved close to the fireside, the warmth of which, together with the cordial, soon revived her. The recollection of what she had just suffered was speedily lost in her present comfort; and, when the steward came in again to ask how many loads of wood he was to send, the great lady remarked carelessly: “Oh, you may wait. The weather is very much milder now.” The warmth of the room had cooled her charity.—Exchange.

THE DOG, THE BOY, AND THE BAG.

You have often seen a dog carry a basket or a pail, or even a newspaper folded up. I knew a big dog who would find his master’s slippers, picking them out from among a dozen pairs put in a pile to test him. This same dog would find his master’s umbrella, and carry it blocks to his office. The other day I heard of a little dog who had been taught to carry things for his mistress. He was a little poodle. One day his mistress was going out shopping, and she put down on a chair a small bag in which was some jewelry. Just then she left the room. Fido came in, concluded there was some work for him to do, and took the bag in his mouth and ran out the front door. He carried the bag blocks to the house of his mistress’s friend, where he left it at the front door.

The mistress was frightened when she came back, and found the bag had disappeared. She thought a thief had taken it, and notified the police, who began hunting for the thief. A small boy had seen the dog carrying the bag. Whether the dog acted guiltily, or whether the bag seemed too big for such a small dog to carry, I do not know. But the boy followed the dog; and, when he left the bag, the boy took it and followed the dog back, giving the bag to its owner. I wish I knew whether Fido ever learned that he had done wrong.—The Outlook.

When a boy frightens his playmate by appearing suddenly around a corner and saying “Bo!” he is using a very ancient word. There was once a general of the Goths named Boh, who was so fierce and warlike in appearance that for many centuries mothers hushed their children by telling them to be quiet or Boh would come and get them. This was finally corrupted into Bo, the familiar “scareword” of to-day.

THE TURK IN ARMENIA.

What profits it, O England, to prevail
In camp and mart and council, and bestrew
With sovereign argosies the subject blue,
And wrest thy tribute from each golden gale,
If, in thy strongholds, thou canst hear the wail
Of maidens martyred by the turbaned crew,
Whose tenderest mercy was the sword that slew,
And lift no hand to wield the purging flail?
We deemed of old thou heldst a charge from Him
Who watches, girdled by his seraphim,
To smite the wronger with thy destined rod.
Wait'st thou his sign? Enough, the sleepless cry
Of virgin souls for vengeance, and on high
The gathering blackness of the frown of God!

—William Watson.

BLESSING THE FLEET.

The blessing of the Iceland fleet, which takes place every year at Paimpoul, always attracts numerous visitors. When the fishing schooners are ready to set sail, the ringing of the church bells announces that the ceremony is about to begin. After vespers the procession, led by the sailors, marches through the principal streets and squares of the town, which are decked with flags in honor of the occasion, to the beautiful repository erected by the ship-owners at the end of the dike. There the Abbé Daniel, standing in the presence of those fifty-six graceful schooners, gayly bedecked with flags, which are to bear away these stalwart seamen to the chill fogs of Iceland, pronounced a discourse as eloquent as it was pathetic, and prayed that God would grant success and a safe return for both sailors and ships. Then, preceded by the cross, he made the tour of the floating dock, blessing each ship in turn and saluted as he passed by the great flag which waved aloft. Sacred Heart Review.

Spirit of the Press.

The London Christian World, in an article on the Armenian question, says:—
The best news is the announcement in the Times that Mr. Gladstone is about to deliver an important speech on the question. He has been eagerly studying all the material available. Next month a great meeting is to be held in St. James's Hall, similar to the famous meeting on the Bulgarian atrocities. The public is getting impatient. It might be possible to preserve patience if the Sassoun massacres stood alone, but the Armenian correspondents are all at one as to the existence of a present reign of terror. No man's life and property, no woman's honor, is safe from the greed, the murderous lawlessness, the lust of Kurd and Turk. How long is this to go on? is the question everywhere asked. One thing Lord Kimberley might have promised, and that is the publication of the suppressed consuls' reports since 1891. Why are they suppressed? Lord Kimberley said, "It would be contrary to their best interests that at this particular moment they should produce those reports, both because the inquiry is proceeding, and also because their publication would embarrass them in their action rather than strengthen their hand." This is simply fudge. Are the reports more damning than the reports of the special correspondents? If so, all the more reason why they should be published. The great need is full and accurate information; and we hold it to be the simple duty of the government to supply that information for the purpose of guiding public opinion.

Personals.

William Watson, the young English poet, has received a grant of $500 a year from the Civil List, a fund largely used for the encouragement of literature, art, and science.
The committee of Manchester College has obtained the consent of Dr. Martineau for a sitting statue in marble to be placed in the library of the college at Oxford. The commission for the statue has been given to Mr. Pinker of London.
"The hygienic treatment to which Dorothy Drew, Mr. Gladstone's grand-daughter, is subjected," says a well-known writer, "extends so far that she always goes bare-foot, indoors or out, except in very muddy or bitterly cold weather. Her dress and fare are of the simplest; and she is one of the healthiest, happiest, and most irrepressible of children."
ROBERT H. HAMILTON.—Many in Boston will remember the pleasant face and dignified manners of Mr. Hamilton, who has been travelling with the Tuskegee quartette. He was taken ill while singing in Dobbs Ferry, N. Y., and died early the next morning, March 27. He has been an earnest and faithful worker for Tuskegee since 1884, working early and late, "a clean-souled, honest man," always ready to help. Before that time he worked in the same way at Hampton, where he was a student.

DR. GEORG VON GIZCYKI.—Mr. W. M. Salter writes in the Cause of his friend, Dr. Georg von Gizcyki of the University of Berlin, who died March 3, and says: "Prof. von Gizcyki was a brave soldier for the true and right. Though devoted to the scientific study of ethics and philosophy, he had warm human interests, and was in sympathetic touch with the progressive social movements of the day. An invalid for years, having, indeed, to be wheeled by his trusty servant whenever he left the house, he never yielded to pessimistic thoughts, and was one of the sanest and most cheerful of men." The loss to the ethical movement in Germany is very great.

Here and There.

St. Louis has an electric ambulance; that is to say, a street-car fitted with an electric motor and arranged for the conveyance of the sick or injured.
The Boston Transcript kept a record of football accidents during the last season of about seven weeks. Three players were killed, one was paralyzed, one became insane, and nearly fifty others were injured, some seriously.
It is said that a stamp market is held on a certain morning of the week in the Champs Elysées in Paris. Tradeswomen with their aprons full of stamps, nurses, boys carrying little baskets, gather in crowds in the shade of the trees, chattering, gesticulating, and laughing, to buy or exchange their flimsy wares.
The oldest inhabited house within the limits of the United States is said to be that of Kilian Van Rensselaer, which stands opposite Albany. It is of Holland brick; and the front wall still exhibits loopholes through which the first owners formerly shot at Indians and wild beasts. The house is still in good repair, after being in constant use for more than two hundred and fifty years.
The London Standard prints a communication stating that New York City is the only town in the world where the cost of the average home owned by families approaches £4,000 sterling, and the interest charged upon the average mortgage exceeds the total year's earnings of the average bread-winner, and that the average bread-winner can no more own a home there than he can start a bank. Neither can he, for the same reason, rent a house. The same "observer" also points out that the population per mile is nearly the same in Philadelphia as in "Greater London"; but the persons per dwelling is only 1.10 in Philadelphia against 7 persons per dwelling in London.

The new vegetable shortening is the most popular food product of the day. Its use means good food, good health and a goodly saving in the end. Since the introduction of Cottolene, lard has no longer place in food or kitchen.

serves every purpose of lard, and serves it without grease, odor or indigestion. Those who have given Cottolene a fair trial never go back to lard. Be sure and get the genuine. Don't let any dealer palm off any of the many worthless imitations on you.

FILES OF "THE UNITARIAN."

I wish to say to persons desiring to obtain back numbers of the Unitarian in order to complete their sets, that they will need to attend to the matter between now and the 10th of June, or it will be too late. The present publisher, Mr. Geo. H. Ellis, can furnish back numbers since January, 1891, the time when the publication office was removed to Boston. But for the five years previous to that time back numbers can be obtained only from me. Most of the numbers of that period I can furnish; but I shall dispose of all before June 10, after which time it will be impossible for me to give aid to any in completing their early files.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.
I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.
I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

EIGHT LIVES SAVED BY A DOG.

Some years ago a vessel was driven on the beach of Lydd in Kent, England. The sea was rolling furiously. Eight poor fellows were crying for help; but a boat could not be got off through the storm to their assistance, and they were in constant peril, for any moment the ship was in danger of sinking. At length a gentleman came along the beach, accompanied by his Newfoundland dog. He directed the animal's attention to the vessel, and put a short stick in his mouth. The intelligent and courageous dog at once understood his meaning, sprang into the sea, and fought his way through the angry waves toward the vessel. He could not, however, get close enough to deliver that with which he was charged; but the crew understood what was meant, and they made fast a rope to another piece of wood, and threw it toward him. The noble animal at once dropped his own piece of wood, and immediately seized that which had been thrown to him; and then, with a degree of strength and determination scarcely credible,—for he was again and again lost under the waves,—he dragged it through the surge, and delivered it to his master. A line of communication was thus formed with the vessel, and every man on board was rescued.—Our Dumb Animals.

SOME PEOULIAR FRIENDS.

Mr. Andrew Lang tells us that we make a great mistake if we think that cats and dogs are natural enemies. He says that dogs are trained by man to annoy cats, that we have made them enemies. What is still more surprising, Mr. Lang has known a cat and a mouse who played together. When tired, the mouse ran back to his hole. Mr. Lang has seen dogs play with a fox until the scent was discovered by an old dog, who sprang at the fox. The young dogs then gave chase, following the bad example of the dog that had been trained by man to chase foxes. A lady who was very fond of animals owned a fine dog. Mice took possession of her house, and she was compelled to get a cat. War was declared at once between cat and dog. Some one had to be on guard all the time to protect the cat. At last the lady decided that they must be taught to live in peace. She made them know each other, and they became in less than a month friends enough not to watch each other; and in three months' time neither would eat unless the other was present and eating from the same dish. Just as this delightful point was reached, a friend gave the lady a canary. The bird, then, must be guarded from the cat. As the cat had gone freely about the house, this was not an easy thing to do,—to remember to shut doors, and to see where the cat was before a door was opened. The lady then decided that bird and cat must live in harmony. She succeeded so well that at last the cat, the dog, and the bird would drink from the same dish; and it was not an unusual thing to see the cat sleeping with the bird standing on her head.

Perhaps this was no more unusual than to have a cat accept and adopt a tiny puppy whose mother had died. The cat had five kittens. The puppy was put in the box with the kittens while the mother cat was away. When she came back, she discovered the little orphan at once. She was deeply interested. After a time she nestled down with a contented little meow and purr, and apparently loved the new member of the family as well as the older ones.

One day, in jumping into the box, she jumped on the pup; and he barked. She sprang from the box, terrified, her tail like a great plume over her back. She looked all about, but could not find the dog, that enemy of her household. She sprang back into the box, and, finding her treasures untouched, settled down.

Whether the pup had fallen in love with the sound of his own voice or not is not known. Having found it, he must have concluded that it was given for use. When the old cat had dropped off to sleep, Mr. Pup gave another queer little bark. The cat household was in an uproar: mother and kittens were in a wild state of excitement. Whether the perfect calm of the adopted child aroused the mother cat's suspicions or not is a mystery for those to decide who understand cat language. The mother cat boxed the pup's ears, and he barked again. Her tail came down to its normal size at once. She apparently assured her kittens that there was no cause for fear; that it was this friend of theirs, almost their brother, who had made the terrifying noise, and it was nothing alarming at all when you knew the cause.

From that day the pup continued to use his discovered accomplishment; for such, doubtless, he viewed it, as did the family. The mother cat and her adopted son lived together for years, the best of friends.—Home Queen.

Education.

Over eighteen thousand children have been trained by the Golden Gate Kindergarten Association of San Francisco during the fifteen years of its existence,—a number large enough, when grown to manhood and womanhood, to make a good-sized city.

Western Reserve University is to establish its first summer schools July 1. Schools will be opened in all the leading subjects taught in college. They are for the special use of teachers. Some of the most distinguished teachers of the university will give instruction. The time of the school is July 1-27.

About a year ago an experiment was begun in New York to train nursery maids in connection with day nurseries. It was proposed to place not more than two girls each in such nurseries as would receive them and give them a six months' course of training, at the expiration of which time a certain graded certificate would be given, with the expectation that many would take in addition the course at the Babies' Hospitals.

The very strongest argument for manual training is not the practical value of the skill which it develops, not even the moral significance of the sturdiness which it inculcates, but that it is something which includes these and the other ends of culture, that it is the increased intellectual power which is the necessary physiological result of such training. This is a large claim, and one that has never been urged before, I believe, on precisely these grounds. But it is a claim which can be fully substantiated.—Dr. C. H. Henderson, in The Popular Science Monthly.

Names of Chicago Streets.—A man from the country was riding west on a Madison Street cable car the other day. Pretty soon the conductor called out, "May," stopped the car, and a lady got off. A moment or two after he called, "Ann," stopped the car, and two ladies gathered their bundles and stepped off. Another block or two, and he called, "Elizabeth"; and the same performance was repeated. Then came "Ada," and a woman and child alighted. After a few more blocks he sang out, "Paulina," and three ladies left the car. The stranger had looked on open-mouthed, but this was too much for him. Clutching the conductor's coat, he asked, "Say, mister, do you know the name of every woman in Chicago, and where she wants to get off?"—Advance.

HAYES'S WATERBURY WATCH.

President Hayes was always noted for his thrifty habits, but some things which impressed the multitude as signs of meanness were really nothing but ordinary prudence. For example, we all used to wonder why he would persist, while drawing a salary of $50,000 a year, in wearing a silver-plated Waterbury watch, worth possibly $3. He was aware that his practice was known, and any astonishment manifested amused him instead of making him angry. In answer to a look of surprise, he would say, "I think that is a pretty plain watch for a President of the United States to carry, but it is good American make," as if assuming that this fact would counteract the effect of the cheapness of the article. The truth was that almost weekly a deputation of Western Indians called upon him, always bringing presents of some kind to the Great Father. Of course, he was expected to give something in return; and the object was to find something cheap and at the same time acceptable. Watches were a novelty to the Indians, and to present a chief with a watch which the Great Father himself had been carrying always impressed him greatly. Having discovered this, and not caring to distribute gold watches, or even silver ones, Mr. Hayes hit upon the expedient of buying nickel watches at $36 a dozen, and always made it convenient to have one with him against an emergency.—Kate Field's Washington.

Editorial.

THE Nominating Committee of the American Unitarian Association has sent out a list of candidates for the various offices in the Association. In the list of names will be found that of Mr. George W. Stone of Wilmington, Del., who is nominated as treasurer. It is not necessary here to enlarge on the qualifications of Mr. Stone for this important office. His training and his interest alike fit him for this position; but it may be as well to remind the electors that the election of Mr. Stone as treasurer is with the understanding that the Association shall have the whole of his time, and that he shall receive a salary sufficient to enable him to devote himself entirely to this work. This new policy expresses the determination of the American Unitarian Association to go forward. To do this, it must secure the larger resources which are at its command, and which we believe need only to be summoned. Let Mr. Stone have the cordial assurance of support which he needs before assuming this responsible trust.

UNITARIANISM has listened reverently to the words "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and its righteousness." Not on tables of stone, but in the heart of man, it has read the two great commandments, and accepted them as an ideal and inspiration for its work. It holds these not as a theory or as a doctrine, but as an affirmation of its holy gospel of truth and love and righteousness. Under the inspiration of these mighty convictions let it do its work. Let it not be diverted by captious criticism, by word-quibbling, or by fruitless controversies over names. It has had enough of these, and has learned, we hope, what lesson was in them. Its recognition of supreme elements was long ago expressed in the motto: "Liberty, Holiness, Love." It has attained the widest possible liberty in religion, and its liberty is sacred because of the opportunities it confers. In this glorious liberty let it bring forth the fruits of righteousness, joy, and peace.

DR. HEBER NEWTON of New York has been charged by the newspapers with heretical views on the subject of the resurrection. We are interested to see that the Churchman comes to his defence in this fashion: "Dr. Newton complains that the statements of newspaper reporters with regard to matters of which it is to be presumed they have made no special study are accepted with too much avidity by the public. His experience is an instance of the way in which a clergyman may be written down 'heretic' by a newspaper writer, and immediately charged by the voice of public opinion with denying the faith he has solemnly sworn to defend and maintain. The old proverb forbids the cobbler boasting beyond his last, and it certainly applies to the secular paper when it speaks beyond its knowledge and province. The special raison d'être of religious newspapers is that they may give accurate views and authentic information about things with which the secular press is not conversant, and about which it is constantly making unintentional misrepresentations. The reasonable citizen will take his political and mercantile information from his morning paper, and will not be misled by gross and serious blunders. If he wishes to know what the Church is doing, and what Churchmen think, and what preachers are saying, the only safe course for him to adopt is to read the religious papers." Of course, the Churchman is right in the high authority it assigns to religious papers; but we have not seen very much in that paper from which one might get an idea of what Dr. Newton teaches on this subject. Suppose the editor of the Churchman prints some of Dr. Newton's lectures. It would furnish desirable reading and not too familiar to the readers of that sheet.

A FEW weeks ago, in referring to the baptism of an infant simply as a sort of insurance to keep it from hell-fire, we said, "One would suppose that the theological superstition that the application of water is necessary to save a soul from fire ought to be dead as a mummy by this time." Our honest and earnest Roman Catholic contemporary, the Sacred Heart Review, in commenting upon this paragraph, says: "We have two observations to make on these passages. First, they are aimed at the old Calvinistic doctrine that 'there are infants in hell a span long.' The Catholic Church does not sanction any such horrible doctrine. Catholic theologians maintain that infants dying without baptism may enjoy a condition of natural happiness as distinguished from the supernatural beatific vision of God." We are glad that Roman Catholics to-day are not so cruel as their forefathers, nor as cruel as the Calvinists, who damned without qualification unbaptized infants. Our contemporary must not forget that even Wigglesworth, in his "Day of Doom," assigned to infants the "easiest room" in hell. The difference between Wigglesworth and the Sacred Heart Review seems to be that, while Wigglesworth assigned them superior quarters in hell, our contemporary assigns to them inferior quarters in heaven. We have no means of deciding whether a first-class room in the place of torment is better than a second-class room in the place of bliss; but we suspect that it is, and therefore that the modern Roman Catholic view is more merciful than the old Calvinistic one. But it does seem to us a little ridiculous that in this day and age the application of water by a priest should be credited with any such efficacy.

IN further commenting on the same paragraph, the Sacred Heart Review says: "The man who, in view of the position which baptism occupies in the Christian scheme, as revealed in the Scriptures, can deliberately declare that the doctrine of baptism is a superstition that 'ought to be dead as a mummy by this time,' certainly is not entitled to the name of Christian." It will be noticed that our contemporary apparently assumes that the only doctrine of baptism which is worth considering is that which regards it as a saving ordinance. It ignores the fact that baptism may be used, as it is by many Christians, as a service of consecration, in which it may be very beautiful and useful. Against this we have nothing to say, any more than against the service of marriage. But, when our contemporary says, "Baptism, then, washes away sins, and of course has a very intimate connection with our salvation," we admit that the difference between the Roman Catholic Church and the Unitarian Catholic Church is wholly irreconcilable on this point.

THE recent action of the board of aldermen of Boston in passing a resolution asking that, as a board, it might be abolished, grew out of a petulant resistance to the new charter which has passed the Massachusetts Senate, and which takes away the power of the board of aldermen to confirm the mayor's nominations. Filled with shame and indignation at the slight cast upon them, the board of aldermen proposes to commit suicide. Though this self-effacement is not so noble as it otherwise might be, it is not at all likely that the community would be plunged into grief and decide to wear mourning for thirty days if the board of aldermen were abolished. The cumbersome, double-barrel method of municipal government is costly, obstructive, complex, and inefficient. It is quite possible that it is the city council rather than the board of aldermen that ought to immolate itself upon the altar of patriotism by committing hari-kari; but two legislative bodies is more than any city requires, and more than most cities can stand. If, therefore, one of them is disposed to vote itself out of existence, it may well be encouraged to do so.

THE Maine Methodist Conference had a lively session on Monday of this week. It grew out of a resolution on the subject of "Sabbath Observance," accompanied by the report of a committee, which was presented by Rev. Everett S. Stackpole of Auburn. The report was remarkably liberal. It recognized the fact that changing opinions have already modified greatly the manner of observing Sunday. "Other modifications," it said, "await us. We confess that our fathers were too strict. Our wisest sons may think us so." The resolutions concluded as follows:—

The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath. Whatever ministers to his welfare, physical, mental, moral, and religious, is good. Recreation that brings real rest to the body and soul should not be prohibited. Works of mercy, charity, and necessity are harmonious with the works of the Father and the Son. Whatever draws the soul upward into communion with God is worship, and proper to the day. Not so many religious services should be crowded into the day as to weary the bodies and minds of worshippers. The notion that God is a stickler as to what twenty-four hours of the week should be specially consecrated to him is belittling to God and man. Custom and propriety commend the Lord's Day: historical associations endear it, and enforce its claim upon Christians. Great charity must be used toward those who conscientiously differ from us in their estimate of the day and its observance.

As might have been expected, these resolutions produced a hot debate; and one brother declared that the committee was knocking the foundations from under the Methodist Church, and that it was drifting to hell. A motion to substitute resolutions adopted at the conference last year prevailed, but the significance of this report could not be extinguished. It is a veritable sign of the times in modern Methodism.

OVERCROWDED SCHOOLS.

The facts set forth in the Forum for May by such painstaking observers and scientific men as James H. Penniman and Dr. Henry Dwight Chapin are humiliating to Americans. What would Froebel or our own Horace Mann or Elizabeth Peabody have said to a school where "one class reached the enormous total of 158"? As Mr. Penniman well says, "That the city of Brooklyn requires some poor woman to attempt it shows an ignorance of human powers and an indifference to human suffering that would be incredible of the Dark Ages."

It may be urged that that must have been an exceptional case. Let us hope so. But what are the figures in general? In the primary schools of Brooklyn there were last October 377 classes "in which the conditions of effective teaching and hygienic precaution did not exist." Of these, 231 had more than 60 in a room, 65 more than 70, 22 over 80, 18 over 90, 2 over 100, 16 over 120, 4 over 130, and 2 over 140. Yet in Brooklyn, the "city of churches," the people are supposed to have some intellectual pride as well as piety.

Boston receives at Mr. Penniman's hands a well-merited castigation. He quotes from the report of the School Committee to show that, without anticipating wants, more than $2,000,000 should be spent at once to provide suitable, safe, and sanitary buildings. Some of the arrangements in Boston, a city which rather prides herself on her schools, are characterized as "the most senseless and costly blunders ever made by parsimonious ignorance"; and quotations seem to amply justify the severity.

In Minneapolis more than 5,000 children of the first three grades are in school but half-time. In Philadelphia about 8,000 are similarly uncared for. In Milwaukee "it is estimated that there are nearly 35,000 persons of school age who do not attend school." Baltimore, Detroit, Richmond, Washington, and Buffalo all come under scathing review. In Buffalo about 20,000 children are not receiving instruction. No words beyond the mere figures are needed to show how utterly inadequate are the existing schools for properly educating the children of this country. Mr. Penniman ascribes this lack to the indifference and ignorance of parents and voters. He would have a school census taken every year and distributed in the community, along with facts as to the deficiencies and needs of the schools, that people may have information on the subject when the question of appropriations is under discussion.

Dr. Chapin writes on the crowding of schools as a cause of disease and in the consequent physical and mental stunting of the children. "Experience," he says, "shows that the health of children in our large schools can best be conserved by allowing 15 square feet of floor-space, 280 cubic feet of air-space, and at least 1,800 cubic feet of fresh air to each pupil per hour." There is probably not a city in this Union that could not make it possible for every child of school age to have this amount of moving and breathing room, if it would. Of course, the first expense would be great. But who can say how much it would be lessened by the lessening of expenses for hospitals, courts, reform schools, insane asylums, and pauper help? But the money for this great expense will not be voted by cities till the people who have influence demand it. Too often such persons know nothing about the public-school system, either from personal contact or from the association of their children with it. It is not strange that intelligent people with means should prefer to send their children to private schools, where the laws of life and health are observed, and where the very first requisite for all life, pure air, is abundant. But have such people any moral right to look after their own little ones, and do nothing to secure the same blessings for those who have neither intelligence nor power to secure it for themselves? For a republic which exists on a democratic foundation, and is dependent for its continuance on the intelligent suffrage of its people, to leave its children uneducated by the tens of thousands, or to put them into unsafe, unhealthy, and overcrowded rooms, is suicidal. If the public schools are not good enough for any man's sons and daughters, they should be made so.

Serious enough as it is, considered only on the physical side, this massing of children where they can receive no individual care has also a moral danger. The clever will go ahead in spite of it; but the dull pupils will grow in dulness, stupidity, inattention, and idleness, and, with the first chance, will escape the slavery of the school-room to wander on the streets, there to become an easy prey to bad habits, vices, and crime. Many a boy who is now in the truant or reform school, a plague and torment to all who have anything to do with him, might have become a decently intelligent and useful man, if from his youngest school-days he could have breathed a clean atmosphere, in a school-room, where he was one of thirty pupils, and if his hands as well as his head had been trained.

A GROWING WONDER.

The greatest wonder is that it seems no wonder to us. Shall we get used speedily to heaven if once we are so supremely blest as to attain unto it? Shall we become accustomed to its glories, and lose the faculty of surprise? It is the tendency of wontedness to flatten and depress all things to a level, otherwise the new grass-blade, the freshly born dandelion, the fretwork of shining buds, the vaporous cloud in a deepened heaven, the first catkins on the willow, the first red maple blooms, would fill us with joyous surprise.

These are the earth's firstlings, her babies. She rocks and dandles them with peculiar pride. The sharp winds cannot stay her tenderness, and the miracle expands from day to day. Though we do not consciously wonder or rejoice, it tingles in our blood, it wings our feet, it gives lightness to the step and brightness to the eye. Even the city denizen, with perceptions atrophied between brick walls, feels the change of light, the new retinting, as early radiance and the lustre of lengthened days falls in hazy beams and wavering splashes along the cliffs of houses.

This oldest source of poetry is still flowing. It is the miracle none questions, the resurrection we all behold,—divine power illustrated in germination and growth, the exquisite energy of the little germ to shake free from mould and dead leaves and obstructing roots, and burst forth into light and freedom. It is a forward step in the path of progress, a quickstep taken just at the right moment, to some rhythm and vibrating force unheard, unknown of us. The roots of the vegetable world are bedded in the eternal sources of power. The quickening in that dark laboratory where they lie is far more wonderful than all the stories of elves and fairies. This hidden dynamo is preparing all things in the secret places of growth. There is nothing beautiful above ground that was not made in that workshop. The smallest leaf and petal is there tinted and veined in ways that hold to all the mystery and unfathomableness of nature. All the delays and retardings, the urgent heats, the relapses that chill, but do not kill, are making for progress in the upper miracle play.

These things have their deeper charm and meaning in symbol. Whether through conceit, or pride of intellect, or the profoundest intuitions of the soul, we are led to believe that the inferior forms of nature exist as a basis for the higher forms of life in man. Without the seeing eye and the listening ear and the mental apprehensiveness to which they report, the most exquisite display of beauty would be nil and void. A world, however glorious, untenanted by thinking, sentient beings, chills the imagination, if it does not affright it. The endless waste of ordered energy is as paralyzing to thought as the sterile doctrine of chance.

Our instinct tells us the heart of the universe must feel some other heart beating in unison with its own. Man wakes up nature, and makes it alive. It is cruel, unfeeling, remorseless, unless he projects his sentiments upon it. There could be no beauty unless the mystery and meaning of beauty had stirred within him a principle that leaves utility out of sight, that exists solely for itself, is an end, a perfection, a completion in its unusableness, in its escape from all the bonds forged to bind it, —a something that will not dig or grind or bake or brew, but helps all processes, lubricates all the wheels of life in ways incomprehensible to him who feels its power. Man's ability to project himself, the color and quality of his soul, into all visible forms of power and beauty is the endless miracle. Spring would not be significant, were there not an answering spring in the heart. The push of leaf, tendril, branch; the climbing impulse in the fibre of a green blade; the opening eye of the wild flower, —these are infinitely suggestive, pathetic, delightful, to his sentiments, because we feel in ourselves like necessities of expansion, like possibilities of pushing up through the dead growth of human life a living tendril of thought, affection, impulse, resolve, that may lengthen until it impinges on an unknown world of truth and beauty. We feel, if we do not comprehend, the imperative need of casting the old husk, dropping the dead leaf, tricking ourselves with new powers and forces, new capacities of love and insight.

The power of life is seen in nature; the power of transformed life, in man. Progress, the divine birthright, tints with tender meaning every cloud, touches with infinite suggestiveness every bud and blossom. The early days before the leaves, when sap is coursing joyously, and life puts sluggish sleep and inaction under its feet, is the most perfect felt symbol of the conflict within, where the soul contends with its lethargy, its impediments, its lower appetites, its lassitude of will, rises and asserts its kinship to all goodness, all nobility, all heroism, all devotion to high and inspiring ends. Nor is the progress uniform. Like the spring days, it advances, retreats, is worsted, loves not parallels and straight lines, goes forward by zigzags and masterly retreats, to find the path of least resistance.

We stumble and grope, and lose our way, and wander in cold and darkness; but at last the divine touch of God's spring finds us. If we have the upward impulse, it will as surely come out to sun and air and gentle breezes as the grass-blade comes after long and patient waiting. Through our very temptations and chills, blindness and groping, the tender hand is stretched forth. At last there is warmth and beauty and shimmer of color in the air. The hard sky relents, a bird vision, a distant wordless song, strikes the soul's ear. We are transformed, converted. We see how sordid, poor, and mean was the path we trod, how we have been shut up in close, stifling enclosures instead of living in God's fresh air, with the sky and its millions of stars over our head. Unless these relentings come to us on the vernal tide of the spirit, the material spring would lose its deepest significance,—the possibility of the soul's growth and renewal. The changes of the outer world have their deep poetic lesson. Though but dimly comprehended, they correspond to the springs of hope and aspiration in the deepest parts of the nature of man. They help us to the higher transformations. Insensibly, they lead us to new life, new joys, a new and consoling faith. If we can feel no upward reach that shall help us to growth, to assimilation, to the working-up of all experience—even our sins and mistakes and errors and stumblings, our perversities and wrong-doings even—into the purposes of a new mind and heart, the growing wonder loses its lesson of infinite love,—the open door for the escape of the nature from all fettering conditions into freer air, into those blessed possibilities that thrust aside the past, that make the soul worthy of immortality. The dry stubble accumulates, the dead branches rot, the fallen leaves heap themselves, and are no longer assimilated by eager germs of life. How can we escape the conclusion that, if there is no pushing of green spires, no promise of the great triumph in a higher realm, nature's plain song and revival is no more to us than the humming of some intricate bit of machinery,—not a poetic suggestion, but a contrivance for temporary ends, untransmutable into sustenance for the soul? The growing wonder is sent to soften, to thrill, to lead us to look within for the deepest analogies. Man is rooted in a universe so far from being wholly utilitarian that every particle of matter is stamped with the power and potency of beauty, appealing to no appetites save the immortal hunger.

All true impression of beauty turns the glass inward. We know its potency by what we have felt, by what it has enabled us to feel. We know that, when our dulled sensibilities first begin to tingle at its touch, we have planted our feet on the path of progress. Moral analogies with the physical life awake in us. We grow out of the stupid state of the unobserving, unadmiring heart. Germs long latent in us feel the touch of a new life. All nature, the world of man, is quickened with new suggestions. This is our budding time, our time of putting forth new leaves. The more points of life and sensitiveness within us, the more we grow. Progress consists in the setting-up of new points of sensation and perception in the soul. It is the earnest of endless life. The more meaning we see in life and nature, the more our breadth of being, our possibilities of grasp. This endless progress, reaching constantly toward new conquests, is our earnest of the future conscious being. It demands effort, it demands love and reverence of ourselves, of humanity, above all, of God. His guiding spirit shall open to us all the doors of the universe it is best for us to enter; and who can say how far the path of progress may lead into new worlds and the heart of all mystery?

WAITING.

It sometimes seems as if every influence of our age makes for action. There is abroad in the world a growing sense of power which comes in the belief that we can do something to alter old conditions, to help on the evolution of the good and the civilized; and we are bidden to work as never before for the thing we believe in. Miss Vida Scudder has showed us in her recent sympathetic and inspiring book how something like this is the spirit of modern poetry, moving, as it has moved, from contemplation to action. It is also the spirit of serious life. Perhaps, by very force of contrast, the old, old necessity of patience, which is pressed upon us as closely to-day as ever, seems harder and more unbearable. Yet the necessity is there; and in individual life, as in social reform, we must meet it, and adapt ourselves to it as best we may, since it will never yield to us. Science shows us evolutionary progress and the steady onward movement toward something not yet revealed; but it hints at the same time of the marvellous patience that has awaited each unfolding in the past, and shows no haste now, for all our impatience and anxiety.

Rev. Howard N. Brown emphasizes in the beautiful sermon published in the Register of last week the power of personal influence, and bids us trust ourselves more completely to it. In the home, for instance, it is not what a mother says so much as what she is that influences her children. To some of us that is the root of our deepest discouragement, perhaps. It would, doubtless, be the testimony of more than one mother that, in the long process of "bringing up" her boys and girls, it was never they who gave her any real trouble or perplexity for the present time, but that she had had infinite trouble in managing herself, and that she could fairly ascribe to some deficiency of her own, some lack of tact, some unresisted strain of nerves, some bodily weakness or spiritual misgiving, every individual experience with her children that in itself pointed toward failure instead of success. It is only gradually that one learns how to work on long lines, neither hasting nor resting in the fulfilment of responsibility like this. Through it all it is only the larger vision that helps piece out one's own shortcomings, and teaches how to distinguish in the child between those impulses which are transient in their very nature and those which make for character development. One needs something of the infinite patience to wait steadily, hopefully, through the times when action would only hinder, not help; and mothers at least ought to understand what Emerson means when he talks about "a brave and cold neglect of the offices which prudence exacts, so it be done in a deep upper piety, a consent to solitude and inaction which proceeds out of an unwillingness to violate character."

Into many a life comes a period of comparative inaction, when the ordinary interests seem ended or their direction altered. Illness or sorrow may withdraw one for a time from the world hitherto familiar. Sometimes it is the pressure of unaccustomed duties that keeps the hands busy while the thoughts have strange leisure. Sometimes the mother of little children feels as if she were losing the intellectual growth that comes from study and close contact with living outside interests, even when the home seclusion and tender duties are most dear. It is sometimes hard to believe it at the time; but in later years we often see that from such periods, when all we could do was to "Lie and wait in God's great hand,

A patient bit of fallow land,"

we drew the strength that was to suffice for the coming struggle or the appreciation that could recognize a victory.

There are different kinds of waiting, just as there are different kinds of doubt. One is that of Matthew Arnold, who sought in self-restraint and steady obedience to law the way to endure unanswered questionings and unsatisfied longings. Another is that of Clough, whose heart was shaken by the same questionings and the same longings, but who threw himself on God, or at least on the hope of God, and felt that truth must be, even where he could not find it. How far removed are both from that rebellion which recognizes no law but its own will, no waiting-time between the sowing of the tiny seed and the unfolding of the perfect flower! Yet a third kind is best of all, that of Browning, who recognizes as no other has ever done all the disappointment and slowness of growth and warp of circumstance that make the prophecy of future good seem only an illusion, and yet can wait with the certainty of perfect trust. Love does not deceive, and the end shall requite the waiting. Life seems nobler and better worth the living every time we surrender ourselves to the influence of one whose daring faith held that the love of Evelyn Hope, the "Palace of Music" reared by Abt Vogler, the "Redemption" of Guido, are all included among the certainties of life. One grows willing, even in times of perplexity and darkness, to accept Pompilia's message left for Caponsacchi,—
"Let him wait God's instant men call years;
Meantime hold hard by truth and his great soul,—
Do out the duty."

Usings.

THE Christian Register has a strong corps of book reviewers of great ability and knowledge, some of them distinguished writers themselves. One of them is preacher, poet, and essayist, and is able to read and review a small library of books every week—and make nothing of them! There is no handwriting more familiar in this office than his. His writing is not so microscopic as that of a certain Western minister, which occasionally requires a magnifying glass for its interpretation. This is large enough for a circus bill; but, alas! it is not always as legible. Occasionally, a council of experts must be called to decide what the writer has said or what he ought to say. Recently a book notice was received in which the proper name of an artist was so ingeniously written that it might be any one of three or four different names. The board of experts was summoned, and a council held. The first name had a Tennysonian suggestion: it was evidently "Maud." The last name might have been Sturn, Shun, Stun, or Strun. It seemed altogether improbable that one woman should have so many names, even if she had been married a number of times. The copy was therefore returned to the writer with the following pencil note by the editor:—

"My dear Lampwick,—What is Maud's last name?"

The reply which was received a few days after showed more electric light than kerosene oil or lampwick. It is a glimpse behind the scenes, and it will show our readers who are not familiar with the making of a newspaper the abuse which an editor often receives from people who are allowed to write for his journal without being charged a cent for the privilege. The letter is as follows:—

"Come into the garden, Maud,
For the "June"-bug's wits have flown.
Come into the garden, Maud,
And make your surname known.
You are not "Sturn" with me.
Then be not "Sturn" with him;
For the hair is scant on the top of his head,
And his eyes are getting dim."

Dear B.,—Maud's name is Stum. How could you think it anything else, except, possibly, "Sturn"? but that would have been a gratuitous impeachment of the "r." I consider the "u" as I wrote it absolutely perfect. I challenge history and art to produce anything better of its kind. It is the letter pronounced "you" or "yew" or "ewe." Do I make myself plain? The next letter, "m," is, perhaps, less absolutely perfect, but still fine. These judgments represent not merely my individual opinion, but a consensus of the competent. More in sorrow than in anger,
Yours all the same.

In the same book notice the reviewer referred to this lady as "he," indicating a mental confusion not wholly chirographic. But the proof-reader with great compassion corrected the error. We believe that the artist will appreciate the combined efforts of proof-reader and editor to have her name and sex properly given. The brilliant lines of the reviewer are fruit meet for repentance.

Brevities.

The calendar reads May 7; but, with the mercury at eighty-six in the shade, we are living in the middle of July.

The Congregationalist says of our Martineau number, "A worthy testimonial of love"; and it quotes some of the tributes of orthodox writers.

Rev. Thomas R. Slicer has charge of the department of "Good Government Clubs" in the Basis, the new weekly edited in Buffalo, devoted to good citizenship.

Nature is putting on a new suit of clothes with wonderful rapidity. As a whole, there is not much change in the fashion. Yet every gardener may notice some variation when the flowers bloom.

The Boston Beacon says: "If every member of the American Protective Association would read and inwardly digest Archbishop Ireland's lecture on 'American Citizenship,' the animus of 'Know-Nothing' politics would be effectually disposed of. Patriotism is something higher than sectarian or racial prejudice, and Archbishop Ireland sounded its key-note in his address at the Boston Theatre."

Let one read the extracts we make from Prof. Irving J. Mannatt's article on "The Living Greece" in the Review of Reviews, and he will see what remarkable progress Greece has made since its liberation from the Turkish yoke. A recent article in the Nation showed what strides Bulgaria had made since it secured its freedom from the same domination. Judging from the progress Armenians make in this country, there is no doubt they could do as much for their own land if they had a chance.

The Congregationalist, in referring to a rainy Easter in Boston, says: "We wonder how that minister felt who, in preparing his Easter sermon, had read over one thousand pages, when he looked out of the window Sunday morning and saw the driving rain-storm. There are some trials from which the laity is entirely exempt." We suspect, however, that the man who has sawed through so much timber is likely to serve the sawdust in his sermon. We sympathize most with the congregation.

Last Saturday afternoon that lifelong advocate of justice and liberty, Mr. Henry B. Blackwell, received a complimentary dinner in celebration of his seventieth birthday. On Monday afternoon Rev. Daniel Livermore and his wife, Mary A. Livermore, celebrated their golden wedding at Melrose, and received the congratulations of many friends. Such happy marriages as that of Mr. Blackwell and Lucy Stone and of Rev. Dr. Livermore and his wife are the best answer to the charge that woman's suffrage would disintegrate the home.

According to the Minneapolis Journal, a San Francisco saloon-keeper has tried to revenge himself upon the clergy, who have been seriously interfering with his business. He petitioned the county supervisors to pass an ordinance forbidding all side and rear entrances to churches, and permitting no person but the sexton to have a key. He further petitioned that preaching be made a licensed profession, and that no clergyman should receive a license unless he bore a good character, or else was fortified with a written certificate signed by twelve good citizens, tax-payers, and property-owners. The petitioner omitted no formality in the whole proceeding, even to the employment of a competent lawyer. For an answer he was respectfully referred to the definition of clergyman and saloon-keeper, as found in any good dictionary.

From a recent tribute to Dr. Martineau by Rev. Joseph May we quote the following: "Long occupying the position of the leading philosophical thinker of England, of any church or school, Dr. Martineau seems to me to have been the most spiritual thinker of our modern day. His insight into spiritual realities never, amid all the eloquence of his unrivalled diction, becomes confused with the imaginative process of the poet's mind. It is the realistic observation and report of the seer of the spiritual world. But, high as he soars, there is always a practical quality in this preacher's thought, due to its reality and sincerity, and to his ethical fervor, which makes his preaching the most influential and inspiring, as it is the most splendid our times have known. I think him incomparably the greatest preacher of the last two-score years in either country and of any sect."

A PRINTING-PRESS FOR OKLAHOMA.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Rev. M. J. Savage has undertaken to raise $100 to help a liberal minister in Oklahoma to buy a printing-press. He acknowledges the receipt of $10 from Mr. Thomas Gaffield and $10 from Rev. C. G. Ames. Further contributions will be welcome. They may be sent to Rev. M. J. Savage, Church of Unity, Boston.

CHILD INSURANCE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and the many earnest men and women in the State who have been interested in the bill to limit child insurance, should not despair because of its defeat in the legislature, but, indeed, take fresh heart for still greater effort from the fact that, as the hearings progressed, and the nature of the collections by the insurance companies of the savings of the very poor, and retaining such money as their own in a great many cases, through lapsed policies, was brought to light and understood, more interest was taken; and more prominent men and women appeared to favor the bill to stop this business.

Especially, too, because the bill, so ably presented by Mr. Read, who fought for the society single-handed against six opposing lawyers, including our ex-governor, received the approval of the committee, which spent three weeks in its consideration, and hence was more competent to decide as to its merits than the House at large, which had the measure before it only part of one day, and then decided against it in a manner which plainly showed outside influence.

During its debate a large proportion of the seats in the House were empty, the members not being in the hall; and one of the leading speakers in opposition stated in his remarks that "he did not pretend to know much about the matter under discussion, but was opposed to interference with personal rights." He could as well have been opposed to all laws against drinking, gambling, etc. However, when the vote was called, the members filed in, and voted in large majority against the bill. Truly, the report that the five thousand agents of the insurance companies throughout the State had been at work on representatives of their sections seemed to have a basis! The method had been pursued of having petitions come from different towns against the bill, and basketfuls of such petitions were brought in. It can be understood how easily an insurance agent in each town, under orders from the head company, could get up a petition of a few names and send to the State House. Who could tell as to the identity of these names? In fact, Mr. Editor, the great quantity of these petitions, and the size of the vote itself, ought to be a convincing proof of the power of these companies, with their five thousand agents throughout the State; and is it strange that this little humane society should by such methods have been defeated in its first attempt to rectify this great evil? But the question was won for the society on its merits before the committee, and decided against child insurance.

The following is from the Transcript, May 4:—

It has been said in this correspondence that the work of the lobbyist is not all done at the State House. There has seldom been more convincing corroboration of this statement than was this week afforded in the defeat of the bill to prohibit the insurance of children under the age of ten years. The companies engaged in this department of the insurance business have agents all over the Commonwealth; and it is said, and easy to believe, that every one of these agents was instructed to labor with the representative in his district and get him, if possible, to vote against the bill.

Let not the noble efforts to stamp out this miserable business flag or fail!

CARRIER PIGEONS.

BY MABELLE P. CLAPP.

I send them forth, my pigeons white:
I may not follow their swift flight,
Nor may I see where they alight.
I can but hope some human soul
Will welcome them when dark clouds roll
Across the sun, amid the toll
Of deep-toned curfew bells.

I send them forth, and bid them tell
To those who still in bondage dwell,
Bereft of hope, that "all is well,"
That God still rules, though sin and woe
Have shadowed this fair world below,
That tender love is brooding low
Above the restless earth.

I send them forth, but thou must guide
Their flight o'er trackless prairies wide,
O'er land and sea: I can but hide
The words of comfort I have found,
The helpful thoughts that fears confound,
The hope that all my life has crowned,
Beneath their fluttering wings.

ART IN THE HOSPITALITIES OF THE HOME.

BY JAMES LEONARD CORNING, SR.

I am thinking now of a spacious house—a baronial mansion, it might be called—approaching completion in one of the rural suburbs of New York. Seen from afar on the highway, embosomed in the verdure of meadow and forest, it impresses one as having been built, not as a monastery, but with the amplest recognition of social privileges and obligations,—an impression which gets manifold confirmation upon a nearer approach, and especially on entering its spacious halls and wandering through its many chambers.

And just here I bethink me that domestic architecture of modern days has experienced "a change of heart," if one may use this phrase without irreverence. In days not very far away in the past a dwelling-house was a utilitarian box, with little or no attempt in the accessories to nourish or gratify æsthetic feeling. The old Romans used to print "Salve" in mosaic on the pavement in the vestibules of their dwellings, making silent confession thereby that their construction had nothing about it especially inviting. But the domestic architecture of a generation gone did not offer even this poor compensation for the utilitarian commonplace which dominated it from basement to ridgepole. But the days when any master mechanic or builder could be an architect have gone, as we hope and believe, never to return; and the architect who constructs the dwellings of our time must be an artist as well as a mechanic.

Here, then, in the external and internal pattern of a house the first law of hospitality asserts itself; and a public sentiment of ever-growing imperativeness demands implicit obedience. Let us be thankful for that.

And now come the problems of interior decoration and furnishing, which involve a multitude of successes and of blunders as well, in materializing the conditions of a hospitable home. Here, likewise, the demand has created the supply; and new professions have come into existence, whose incumbents are supposed to have a fund of artistic instinct and culture. All this to the end of making the home inviting to the inmates thereof, and to make a warm welcome for every guest. We have now come upon a group of functions involving high privileges and grave responsibilities, concerning which a great deal could be said which there is no space here to say.

Let us return now to the great baronial mansion which we were looking at from the highway when we began this paper. It is nearly ready for occupancy now; and, if we may judge by the character of the host and hostess, a memorable house-warming waits in the near future. Being a rural home, designed for occupancy during but a fraction of the year, there will, very likely, be no extravagant outlay of an artistic kind. Nevertheless, art must have a place on the walls and in the cabinets, else all other appliances of hospitality, of which there are many, will encounter strange incongruity and contradiction. Let me now specify one thing which I would do in the artistic equipment of a home, if I could do but one, as a loyalist to the higher institutes of domestic hospitality. I would invest the price of a single first-class oil painting in a cabinet of albums of large size, representing the story of the art of the ages from prehistoric millenniums to the present time. And now I think I hear some critic ask if it is necessary to turn a house into a university in order to fulfil the requisitions of hospitality. By no means: a fanatical dream like this is far enough from my thought. And yet I submit it to any man's honest judgment if culture, of some sort and to some degree, is not an allowable, not to say necessary, factor in the department of hospitality of which we are speaking. And, of all branches of culture which are susceptible of being popularized, perhaps the story of the art of the ages is the chief one.

During a residence of more than a dozen years in Europe I have collected several such cabinets as I am speaking of for American homes, and I believe the proprietors of those homes agree that a very large and entirely practical element has been added to their appliances of hospitality. I should do a kindness to thousands of hosts and hostesses who are struggling with the problem of entertaining evening guests if I could tell them how to materialize this idea, and likewise show them how cheaply this can be done.

But the walls of our home are still vacant, and waiting for occupants which will speak a welcome to the guests. To fill these vacant spaces wisely and well, so as to make a hospice of the home, is not an easy task, I assure you. Certainly, if your pictures are only decorative, as a great many are, the difficulties involved are not so many or so great. But, if higher ends are sought, as they must be in order to fulfil the requisitions of a true and worthy hospitality, then there is great need of intelligent foresight and an artistic instinct, which people are not commonly born with, but acquire through large experience.

The proprietor of a spacious mansion in a great American city found it necessary, in introducing electric lights into her rooms, to remove all the paintings from the walls. Calling in a picture-dealer to superintend the work of rehanging them, it was found, when he had finished his contract, that he had so changed the arrangement of the pictures as to leave a large vacant space on the parlor wall. Nothing could be more natural at this stage of the little game than to send his business card to the lady with a catalogue of paintings which he had for sale, with sizes, through a most extraordinary providential dispensation, exactly matching the vacant space left on the parlor wall! Fortunately, the lady was thinking of hospitality, while the picture-hanger was thinking of business. And so his little mercantile trick didn't work, and four or five square feet on the wall yet wait for worthy occupancy.

But several hundred square feet of vacant space are waiting to be worthily filled in our suburban home; and, with the permission of the host and hostess, and at the risk of being accounted a little meddlesome, I am going to venture, at another opportunity, upon a few hints fitting to the occasion.

ON UNIVERSAL RELIGION.

BY DUREN J. H. WARD, PH.D.

Because there is no "universal" religion, and because, from past or present tendencies, it may be doubted whether there ever will be, yet even these are not reasons for setting the subject aside. Its discussion may be profitable, if conducted with the right understanding. It is not a topic to dogmatize over. However, many a field apparently as barren has proven fruitful when cultivated with a proper calmness and a realizing sense of the difficulties.

Left free to think, the different circumstances of men's lives are sure to make them think differently. They can, therefore, never agree in all particulars. And, surely, such an agreement would be most undesirable. What Edward Lear calls "a state of perfect and abject unanimity" would be the most deplorable as well as the most inhuman of conditions. There could be neither freedom nor progress. Manifestly, then, the much talk that we hear about "universal" religion must mean something else than it says.

For hundreds of centuries men have been disputing about their points of view and their doctrines. But we have now reached an age of most curious conditions. They desire to agree with their fellows, while at the same time they are determined to maintain their individuality, their independence. A few of them seem willing that others should also hold this standpoint. They have entered upon a stage of advanced politeness, or of courtesy applied where courtesy has heretofore been mostly a stranger. This might be termed "the etiquette of faiths." In this attitude is discovered a new bond of union,—a union on the ground of universal toleration, a union which has nothing to do with one's faith, a union which brings together the most incommensurable elements, and holds them only by the humane bond of mutual respect and mutual demand. And they call it "universal religion."

About the religion in it there is nothing universal at all. Religion is universal, but there is no universal religion. Nor does the new position suggest any coming universal religion. It shows that, ultimately, religion will have as many phases as there are individual outlooks. The more freedom of thought and the more use of thought, the further off is the possibility of complete uniformity of faith. The days of uniformity of faith end with the days of authority.

But this uniformity of belief is less important than men have believed. To have uniformity of sincerity and earnestness and human sympathy is more important than men have believed. This, then, is the thing that is meant when men talk of "universal religion." It is not religion at all. It is the outcome of whatever religion or faith they have. It is an improvement in the quality of religion, resulting largely from its greater breadth. It is morality,—an approach to universal morality. It is the flower of independence in matters of faith, or it is the fruit of freedom in religion. This is the sort of universality in morality that leads to and ends in diversity in religion. It is based on an old maxim not before carried into practice; namely, "In essentials, unity; in non-essentials, liberty; in all things, charity." Such an attitude is the greatest desideratum. Out of such a spirit will come the greatest possibilities in the way of human development and progress. From it may be expected that general or approximate agreement on the more fundamental and more comprehensive principles of life. One may, perhaps, say that, if there is one eternal Energy and one grand Unity of Truth, the spirit here described will lead men ultimately to some common understanding of their relations to the universe,—to the God who has been and is still so differently understood.

This as yet vague and but dimly discerned conception is all that exists of "universal religion." Dimly as it is conceived, it is an inspiration around which to rally the uniformity of sincerity and earnestness previously spoken of. The human effort in this direction is known in our day as the "scientific search for truth." By the honest, systematic method of science we are yearly arriving at clearer hints as to the nature of eternal Law and Being.

Granted that the most developed of mankind are nearing a time when there may be some unanimity of sincerity and effort, what are the pivotal points around which they might rally? In other words, what could be their creed, religious and moral? Whence could it be drawn?

Let us experiment. What are the sources of belief? Where do men get their knowledge? What is faith? What is religion? What is a creed?

To begin with the last first, religion is not a creed; but a creed is the expression of the religion that one feels or aims to feel. And religion is our recognition of the Power and Law and Life that answers action and responds to upward effort.

Faith is our trust in it. It is the induction that we make from the facts of experience. These facts are gained from our own lives or from the life of mankind. We term these sources, speaking in the largest way, science and history, including, of course, "sacred" history.

Our creed, then, would be the best attested explanations of the world and of man, regarded from the point of view of morals; i.e., it would be the best explanation we can arrive at on which to base our conduct in human relations.

How difficult is the actual formulation of the articles of such a creed the reader may judge by his individual dissent from the following compiled statement of faith. If he thinks he could formulate a more "universal" one, it might be interesting to him to try it, and send his result to the present writer to see how much corroboration he would obtain. In its briefest and simplest words, the creed might be thus expressed: I believe in God and man, and in human love for God and man. (See Mark xi. 29-31.) Being further explained, the creed is:—

I. I believe in one infinite, eternal Energy, self-existent Source, Power that makes for righteousness, God, "the Father of mercies," the Love Universal.

II. I believe in God's ever-present revelation in nature and life; that revelation is an unveiling not of God's face, but of man's; and that his will is made known to us in our verified discoveries and laws of science and in the examples and lessons of history.

III. I believe in mankind,—God's highest children on earth, born in lowliest simplicity (both race and individual), but with divine potentiality, taught of God by experience, with the ages ever reaching greater likeness to the divine nature, never perfected, always aspiring, always growing.

IV. I believe that sin is the survival or residuum of the prehuman life become conscious, that there was no bad till the good came, that it is the advancing good which makes the existing bad, and that man's real interest is in the problem of the origin of the good rather than the origin of evil.

V. I believe that life is for living, that living is growing, that growing is outgrowing, that the end of life is growth, and that the end of growth is the beginning of death.

VI. I believe that the ideal of the individual man has been indicated in the saintly types of the ages, and most especially in the one actually supreme life of Jesus, the Christ.

VII. As I believe in the divine Oneness, so I believe in one human family, divinely related, mutually dependent, hence by nature each other's helpers and keepers.

VIII. I believe that no one is responsible for his birth; that every one is born helpless, and is through many years utterly dependent on society for life, for sustenance, and for that education which fits him for living-getting and citizenship.

IX. I believe that by heredity, by circumstances of infancy, of education, of greater or less assistance, we reach adulthood with unequal physical powers, varying tastes, differing insights, and every grade of moral development and religious inclination.

X. I believe that in a thickly populated and pre-empted world these conditions do and will make misery and premature death the unavoidable lot of myriads of our brothers and sisters, so long as the doctrine prevails that human life is naturally and necessarily a competitive struggle for existence.

XI. I believe that reason is the latest and highest phase of development, and that its exercise in social relations will supplant the cruel and inhuman competitive death-grapple by brotherly interest and co-operation.

XII. I believe this exercise of the moral reason will lead to "the union of all who love in the service of all who suffer."

XIII. I believe that God in his world has provided a source of supply for all the wants of all his offspring, and hence that poverty and wretchedness are the fault of social arrangements.

XIV. I believe that "an injury to one is the concern of all."

XV. I believe it a divine law, "From each according to his capacity, to each according to his needs."

XVI. I believe that to be Christian is to have unlimited positive morality; that, where the spirit of Jesus imbues it, a soul is not content so long as any human brothers and sisters suffer or merely exist.

XVII. I believe in living in one world at a time, and that the best possible preparation for future life is the fullest right use of the life that now is.

XVIII. I believe that the way to heaven is heaven; that heaven and hell are states of soul, independent of place.

XIX. I believe that these principles were immanent in the divine Nature from the beginning, are now, and ever shall be, world without end, Amen.

MODERN GREECE:

WHAT PROGRESS IT CAN SHOW.

What has Greece to show now for her blanket mortgage? Sixty years ago not a mile of wagon road, to-day above 2,000 miles built (often over mountains) at a cost of ten million dollars. Twenty-five years ago five miles of rail connecting Athens with her seaport, now some six hundred miles of railway in operation, connecting the capital with most of the Peloponnese and opening up a good part of Acarnania and Thessaly; while the Piræus-Larissa Railway, which is to open up the rest of Central and Northern Greece, and ultimately direct communication with Europe, is mostly ready for the rails, and would be running now but for unlucky financiering. The English builders—now ousted—have done some daring engineering, especially in tunnelling Mt. Othrys. The Corinth Canal—which Periander dreamed of and Nero began—has been finished, so giving a short and safe water-way from the Adriatic to the Ægean. Lake Kopais has been drained, not only uncovering prehistoric cities, but reclaiming 60,000 acres of rich alluvial soil. The Greek merchant marine counts (1893) 116 steamers of 83,508 net tonnage, and 944 sailing vessels aggregating a burden of some 250,000 tons. Much of the carrying trade of the Levant and nearly all of that on the Danube is in Greek bottoms. With a sea-line—in proportion to area—seven times as great as France's and twelve times as great as England's, Greece maintains 69 light-houses and is building as many more. Her steam factories are worth some $6,000,000. With an area of some sixteen million acres—largely mountain—she has five and a half millions in field and forest and five millions in pasture. The acreage in currants and vineyards has increased a hundred-fold and more since independence. The agricultural produce foots up $21,000,000 a year. Still the country imports breadstuffs to the value of $6,000,000 annually, which Thessaly could readily produce, and may be expected to produce when the railway opens up that great wheat-field. This saving alone would nearly pay the interest on the foreign debt.

When Otho came to the throne, education was practically unprovided for. To-day Greece offers free public instruction for fourteen consecutive years to every Greek child within the kingdom or without it, a curriculum stretching from the alphabet to the university. There are 2,278 demotic or primary schools, 281 Hellenic or grammar schools, 41 gymnasia; special schools of agriculture, of war, of the navy; a woman's college (the Arsakeion) with 1,500 pupils; a Polytechnic, teaching all the arts from chiselling a statue to building a steam engine; and a complete university on the German model, with 120 professors and 3,500 students, 1,000 of them being "subject Greeks" from Turkey.

With all the outcry about war expenditures, her little army is smaller than our own (24,877 men in 1893), costing only $2,000,000; and her gallant little navy costs only $600,000. The highest salary of general or admiral does not exceed $1,200. It will be seen the farm is getting improved and the policing is not too costly, considering the rascally environment.

Give the Greek a chance, and he will pay his debts. Give him room enough for his energies, and he may yet rise above his parish politics and redeem the East. The Great Idea is not hollow, the Panhellenic dream has a basis of reality. It has been well said that "the Hellenic race represents the motive power in the Ottoman Empire to-day as it did twenty-two centuries ago in Persian Asia." Scarcely more than a third of the Greeks are within the territorial limits of the Greek Kingdom. In European Turkey the Greeks outnumber the Turks nearly three to one (1,996,000 against 700,000), and form forty per cent. of the total population, while in intelligence, energy, and organization they count more than ninety per cent. In Asia Minor the Greeks number nearly 1,700,000, or just one-fourth of the Turks. All told, the Greeks are to the Turks as 6 to 7½ (6,102,160 to 7,500,000); they outnumber the Servians nearly four to one; they outnumber the Bulgarians more than two to one; and they are two-thirds the number of the Bulgarians, Roumanians, and Servians combined. More than that, the whole Ægean seaboard is historically Greek ground, and has continued so through all the ages. "As Greece proper extends under the sea toward Egypt through the Island of Crete, so it extends northward to the Danubian regions, by a long line of territory bordering the Ægean. Thessaly, Macedonia, the ancient Chalcidice, Thrace, are Greek countries."

"Constantinople itself is in the ethnological Hellad. Hellenic Turkey has no geographical unity except in connection with the waters of the archipelago which bathe all its shores." So Élisée Réclus, Nouv. Géog. Univ., i. 145. If facts and figures can prove anything, they establish Hellenic title to the European estate of the Sick Man. And now that the Greeks have retaken Thermopylæ and possess the vast wheat-field of Thessaly, a few more advances would bring them to the Bosphorus. There is an old oracle floating about the country and diligently kept alive by the priests, that, when Greece again has a King Constantine and a Queen Sophia, she shall win back Constantinople. Constantine and Sophia have come, and only wait their turn to mount the Hellenic or the Panhellenic throne.

While Little Greece is doing and enduring so much for Greater Greece, there should be reciprocity. The subject Greeks are far richer than they of the Free Kingdom: they should help bear its burdens. The little kingdom throws open every door of education to the Greek of other lands, feeds him as a refugee from oppression, fights his battles, and incurs the bulk of her debt in the name of Panhellenism. She calls herself the Kingdom of the Hellenes, not of Hellas; and all Greeks are born subjects of King George, if they so choose. They sent their representatives to choose a king and frame a constitution; and now it is high time to put their shoulders to the wheel in support of the kingdom. Building monuments like the Academy and founding schools like the Arsakeion are noble services: lending a hand to keep the ship afloat were still better. The Free Greek might well reverse our colonial watchword, No representation without taxation.

In common with all civilized peoples we owe an incalculable debt to old Greece. To the living Greek we can make some return in a generous national sympathy. And we can lend a hand in his distress. We can buy his silks, finer than Penelope ever spun. We can order his marbles; for Drosinos and Broutos have revived the traditions of classical sculpture, and Parian and Pentelic breathe again. We can travel in Greece, and get a larger yield of felicity on a given outlay than in any other country in the world. And we can go in for the Olympic Games next year, sure of a royal welcome and laurel crowns. We can give, too, an unstinted support to our school at Athens. Then we might send a minister to Greece without requiring him to straddle the Balkans and represent us at rival, if not hostile, courts. He must be a shrewd diplomat who shall gracefully carry Panhellenism on one shoulder and Panslavism on the other. But we should first take off our tax on Greek currants, the one ewe lamb of Greek revenue. Then we shall have a better right to chide the Turk for his blood-tithe of tribute children.—Prof. J. Irving Mannatt, in Review of Reviews for April.

EVERY-DAY PHILOSOPHY.

BY REV. WILLIAM ROUNSEVILLE ALGER.

VII.

The perceptions of the intelligence light the mind, but the affections of the heart alone can fire the soul. The glow of the ice-blink does not make the icebergs any warmer.

The complacent egotist tastes so good to himself as to breed in him a distaste for everybody else. And, when one loathes his fellows, he becomes loathsome to them. Then the repellent reaction this provokes from them tends intensely to generate misanthropy. The wretched misanthropist is generally but the complacent egotist gone to seed.

Religion, as interpreted by a true grasp of the speculative content of Christianity, is the gift of an infinite wealth to an infinite destitution. And the amazing miracle of grace is that this gift has but one condition; namely, our free acceptance of it.

Every form of repining desire is a fatal obstacle to blessedness. He who is content with God will find that God is content with him. And this is blessedness, a life in which creature and Creator unite.

When the transcendent intellect and the inspired imagination speak to the prosaic understanding, the prosaic understanding cannot understand what they say.

Egotism, with its sin, vice, and crime, is always the repetition of an unchanged monotony,—one eternal round of discord, wrong, and penalty. Pure, disinterested sympathy, with its obedient train of virtues, uses, and delights, is perpetually developing itself in fresh varieties of form and fruition. New heavens and new earths are thus constantly creating, while the same old hell answers the purpose forever.

We never overcome evil by the obliteration of our powers, but always by their perfection.

What is the difference between a robin and Saint Francis of Assisi? In the robin the cosmic part asserts itself as the whole: in Saint Francis the divine whole asserts itself in the part. Cosmic consciousness is divided without distinction: divine consciousness is distinguished without division. The happy bird is a beautiful form of life, moving about in the whole as if it were the whole: the free saint is a transcendent repetition of the whole, in whom the focussed All comes to fruition realization.

Carlyle was accustomed to complain that God did not seem to do anything. He wanted to see Omnipotence interfere at once with the wretched course of affairs, and instantly set all to rights. The utterance was a characteristic explosion of the pessimistic morbidity of the critic. God can be nothing less than the absolute perfection of activity. He does not intervene with his irresistible power to smash in pieces everything that appears wrong, because he has made men free and given them a sublime destiny to work out by means of their own conquests over evil. Could Carlyle have added to his great qualities an equal patience and modesty, it would be hard to set bounds to the good he might have done. His genius was alloyed with a pride and violence which repel his readers. The habit of censorious comment on Providence is not only impious in itself and ruinous in its reaction on him who practises it: it is also ridiculous in its fathomless incompetency. What can be more absurdly incongruous than for a creature to criticise his Creator? It would seem as if any one who believes in God at all must feel it to be a duty to hold that the universe, on the whole, is properly governed, and that whatever ought to happen will happen. But many a man, especially at the present time, is so conceited as to feel himself quite entitled to launch his indiscriminate condemnations abroad in all directions, and garrulously ventilate his private scheme of what had better be.

"And so each day he unto God pours forth
Advice he fancies is of priceless worth;
And his wife takes in sewing
To keep things a-going
While he is out superintending the earth!"

When alone is man truly happy? When the inclinations of the heart coincide with the directions of the reason, while both harmonize with the efforts of the will, and all are crowned with the approving benedictions of the conscience.

CO-OPERATIVE COMPANIES.

BY ELLEN BATTELLE DIETRICK.

During the past year the projectors of three different co-operative companies have honored me with a request to become one of their directors, to allow them to use my name, even if I could not give either time or thought to the management of the business of the proposed companies. Of course, no conscientious person would ever lend his or her name to help float a company of whose business details he or she knew nothing. I was obliged to decline the honor proffered me by the three different sets of projectors. As many such schemes are afloat among laboring people, possibly it may interest them to learn why I did decline. At any rate, it will do no harm to state my reasons.

It was not because I am opposed to co-operation in principle; it was not because I do not firmly believe, on good foundation for belief, that the co-operative principle may be worked out successfully in practice; it was not because the time is not yet ripe for practical co-operation to begin; it was not because I had any cause to doubt the perfect sincerity and integrity of the projectors. But it was simply and solely because the views of co-operation published by these men proved to my mind that they are unpractical men, unversed in the management of business so complex as that they propose to undertake, and that they have a thoroughly wrong idea of how to begin co-operation in buying, selling, and manufacturing. If my judgment be correct, they will either have to get their practical experience and education at the expense of the gullible stockholders (most of whom will, probably, be poor, hard-working laborers) or else they will never get such education at all; and their huge kites, after soaring aloft conspicuously for a brief time, will ingloriously tumble to the ground, leaving the stockholders to moan for their money which is lost in the collapse.

All of these companies start out with these two chief assumptions: first, that it is necessary to sell a great deal of stock before they can begin; and, second, that they must have "first-class talent" in the man of business who is to manage. I believe some of them propose to start with salaried officers, of course paid out of the money which the people send in. Now, strange as it may appear at first glance, these assumptions are the reasons why I distrust the knowledge and judgment of these projectors, and why I conclude that they themselves do not even faintly comprehend the essence of co-operation, and, consequently, do not understand its possibilities and impossibilities. Co-operation means working together. There have been thousands upon thousands of co-operative companies started in the United States only to fail utterly; and their failure was always due to the fact that they either did not know that co-operation does demand working together or that the members were too lazy, or too stupid, or too selfish, to work together. All of them started with the absurd notion that a co-operative company and a joint-stock company with salaried officers of first-class talent are exactly the same thing. This is a fatal error. While so-called co-operative companies (really, miserably planned joint-stock companies) have been crashing all over our country during the past forty years (forcibly illustrating the truth of the proverb, "A fool and his money are soon parted"), co-operative companies of the genuine stamp, started by merely ordinary day-laborers, unsalaried, pretending to no sort of uncommon talent, but who knew how and were willing to work together, have prospered, and continue to flourish like a green bay-tree.

Every successful co-operative company in the world has had to primarily adopt the mottoes, "If you want a thing well done, do it yourself," and "Keep thy shop, and thy shop will keep thee." The genuine co-operator wants to know what his money is doing, where it is, and what he is getting for it. He wants to receive the education as co-operative business manager himself, not to send his hard-won wages off to some strangers whom he never saw, and of whose ability or honesty he is equally ignorant. He knows that the most important part of every human action is the foundation-laying. He therefore, very sensibly, distrusts the judgment of those who spend all their eloquence in depicting the huge and gorgeous buildings, which are lovely as are all castles in the air, with not a word as to the slowly laid, unprepossessing, but vitally important foundation.

Any man who imagines that within a few years the people can be led to take a "united action" which will revolutionize manufacture and distribution is (I say it thoughtfully and deliberately) a shallow-minded man, so far as his judgment of what can be done with human nature goes. Human nature is a certain kind of stuff of which it can be accurately predicted what it will do at certain stages of its mental development, under any certain given conditions. Thus, for instance, when human nature is not yet trained to reason, it is swayed by appeal to its passions and emotions; and any glib-tongued or swift-penned beguiler can, by skilful play on its passions and emotions, rouse a limited portion of it to any sort of "united action" of a spasmodic character. (Observe that qualification, for it is important.) Thus human nature can easily be roused to destroy, to fight, burn, or pillage, or to any other sort of united action which gives vent to its stirred-up passions.

But the whole history of the human race—black, white, red, and yellow—is one long series of positive proofs that the whole people can never be led to take united action in regard to anything which is really for their own best interests without long, weary years of tedious education. The more complex the project in which they are asked to unite, the more hopeless the possibility of their ever (as a whole) uniting. Now, I put it to the consideration of any sensible person, if it has during forty years repeatedly proved impossible to get even a hundred people of one village to unite in taking possession of all the manufacture, production, or distribution of the articles required by that village, what sort of a miracle will not have to be worked to get all the people (or even a large part) of the United States to so unite?

One of the first requisites of wisdom is to recognize what you can and what you cannot do, and experience helps wonderfully. A very wise man can even learn by the experience of others. Doubtless some day we shall have air-ships as plentiful as steamers, but men have been working upon the idea for over a hundred years without yet being able to put it in practice. Doubtless some day the human race will have arrived at the virtue of individual self-control, able to co-operate beautifully because the members are all self-controlled; but, though the theory has been published and urged for over three hundred years, the results are not yet vastly encouraging. To recognize these facts demonstrates that one has studied human nature, and has discovered that it is not puffy, to be moulded by anybody within a few years, even with the most glittering promises of the benefit to follow the moulding.

In order to start an even faintly promising co-operative company, the following conditions must be observed,—conditions as necessary as certain kinds of soil and climate are to the flourishing growth of pineapples. The co-operators must be persons of good, sober judgment, willing to practise some self-denial for their common benefit, able to donate a portion of their time to the management of their project, willing to dispense with any salaried servants until long after success is assured. All of the co-operators must be settled residents in one locality, well known to each other, and of character which has been tested and found good and stable; and all of them must be willing to start with one small branch of business of simple nature, to learn that thoroughly before adding another to it, and to move forward cautiously, step by step, buying and selling rigidly for cash from first to last. While every other sort of a co-operative scheme, the world over, has failed, notwithstanding the most favorable launching, the kind I have just described has never failed. On the contrary, as everybody now knows, twenty-eight poor, untalented, unsalaried weavers, clubbing together simply to pay cash for a chest of tea at wholesale, and selling it at retail to themselves, thus laid the cornerstone of a business which in twelve years from their start had earned a profit of over $60,000, and which now buys and sells bread, meat, sugar, and clothing as well as tea, besides manufacturing its own flour and other goods.

Those men were of a very different calibre from our volatile, visionary, roving, ambitious Americans. They did not despise the day of small things, and thus laid a perfect foundation, educating themselves as their now ponderous building slowly grew, brick by brick. The workmen's co-operative societies in Great Britain now possess, jointly, a capital of over $35,000,000. Where are the workmen's co-operative businesses and manufactures of the United States?

It is not a question of first-class talent. It is a question of the kind of character essential to make successful co-operators. Americans have a showy brilliancy and the "gift of gab," but the English have the bull-dog tenacity and the unwearying patience which count in business. We do not have successful co-operation simply because our "co-operators" will not co-operate. If a co-operator will not co-operate, how can we have co-operation?

STEPS TOWARD THE HIGHEST.

BY REV. HENRY A. MILES.

Some seem to think that the existence of God should be proved by a solid chain of argument, and should be the product of a demonstration as certain as the amount of five added to five.

Who does not know that this is far from being the fact? Philosophers have long searched for a scientific proof. Not that they needed it. Most of them had a conviction to which demonstration could add no strength. They have been fascinated by the problem. Its solution would immortalize them. It would be a triumph like the quadrature of the circle or the invention of perpetual motion. No one has succeeded. Hence the history of moral philosophy all through the ages shows the wrecks of baffled attempts.

The cause is very obvious. Our science, our logic, such good things in their place, are poor things when applied to God. A mere atom called man on one side and an infinite Being on the other side can at first be described only by contrast. Who would set out to measure by a ten-foot pole the distance from us of the planet Neptune, remote many millions of miles? There must be some approximation of the measurer to the measured. Our conditions of thought, our comparisons, our discriminations, our intellectual processes, break down when transferred to a subject so much beyond their reach. Evidently, God did not intend that he should be cognizable by such instruments. He is outside, beyond, and above them all. Otherwise he would not be an infinite object. Some one who has a narrow, sharp mind says he cannot prove there is a God. I am glad he cannot. I should not wish to believe in a God whose dimensions were not too large for him to grasp.

Is all this the same as saying that God cannot be known at all? Far otherwise. It is only admitting that capacities fitted for the finite are misplaced when turned to the infinite. A microscope is serviceable to examine the wing of a fly; but, if you would trace the belts of Saturn, you must change the instrument. When you come to deal with the vision of God, you must change your instrument. You must turn to that part of your nature which has some relations with the boundless. You need not go far to find it. In reading the old arguments to prove the existence of God, it seems as if it were thought there was need of something recondite, far fetched, requiring to be stated with a precision and strength never before reached. Men have looked through the human mind, and through all history, to make the discovery. But there is no necessity to ask who shall ascend up to heaven,—that is, to bring God down,—or who shall descend into the deep,—that is, to bring God up. For, lo! he is in thine own heart. "He that loveth not knoweth not God." This is more than a Biblical text: it is a psychological fact.

We must not take that word "love" in any literal or narrow way. It is the misfortune of all language that expressions often lose the breadth of meaning that filled their primal utterance. They contract a shrivelled sense. It is not merely our affections that are here referred to, but our aspirations, our tastes, our imaginings, our longings, our conceptions of the pure, the perfect, the beautiful, the eternal; in other words, our entire emotional and æsthetic equipment. Who can give an exhaustive description of such a being as man, if all this be left out?

Here is the fourth story of a nature which, beginning in bodily sensations, rising up to instinct, ascending then to intellect, finds its completion in a forefeeling of something grander and diviner. This is in the nature of every cultivated man. It is the inspiration of all true poetry, the life-breath of all high art, the spur to progress, the rebound against hard and coarse realities, the tastes that cherish supernal purity, the windows through which we look into the ideal, the wings on which we soar in the visions of hope, the impulse to all real nobleness and grandeur. Here, also, is the topmost attainable knowledge. It is not logic; but soul.

The heart that is never swept by these profound emotions may not admit the existence of God. It is a compliment to the grandeur of that idea. It must be a God after a small pattern whom such a soul can comprehend. Standing on the shore of some petty inland lake, one may have a poor conception of the vast extent and sublime power of the ocean, and may even deny there is such a thing. Is it through insufficiency of proof, or is it through the position of the observer? Climb up to the top of some projecting headland, and see what you think and feel then. Meanwhile the ocean is there, majestic, boundless, irresistible, in spite of all your doubts.

It would have been easy for God to compel our assent. But on this point we are not under a law of force. We are invited by gentle persuasion. So much is our freedom respected. This is God-like. It wins our attention, encourages patiently and tenderly our aspirations, and even asks the co-operation of our affections and will. And what, on the whole, do we find the result to be? Are there many who die absolute atheists?

We are so accustomed to speak of knowledge as coming to us through intellectual processes that we are not quick to see that it can come to us in any other way. An age which exalts books, schools, colleges, statistics, science, and which trains the eye, the hand, the memory, the common sense, is prone to distrust everything that rests only on what we poorly call feeling. And yet feeling, using the word as denoting what is large and upward tending, constitutes a part of our spiritual antennæ, and gives a certainty beyond formal proof.

How do we know the friend who of all human beings has come closest to our heart? Suppose a tricky logician should try to show that you have no scientific certainty of your friend's existence, saying you never saw his soul, you know nothing of its essence, adding that all your evidence is unworthy of trust, that your eyes and ears deceive you, that you may have been in a dream in all your friendly intercourse with him, as if you had been the victim of a lifelong delusion.

You would have a short answer to all that. You would say, as I do not find, so I shall not lose my friend by a syllogism. I know him by something which none of your foolish talk disturbs. He lives within me. He is intertwined with every fibre of my heart. And God is the response to all that is highest and divinest in my nature. If we cannot reach him by one giant intellectual rebound, there are steps by which we may "draw nigh" unto him. And this way is open to all.

Spiritual Life.

We do not believe immortality because we have proved it, but we forever try to prove it because we believe it.

No mere spasm of goodness will make a right life, for we rise no higher than our habitual thinking.—New York Observer.

The progressive element of religion is to be found in an ever-expanding moral ideal as human experience enlarges and the human conscience increases its refinement and its range.

While many hold that the golden age of the world is gone, we hold that the golden age is to come. We believe in to-morrow rather than yesterday. We see the prevailing tendency to be on the side of good, a continual reaching forward toward the better. So we turn with gladness to the newer thought, as prophetic of the world as it is to be.—John Learned.

The Sunday School.

The Unitarian Sunday School Society Anniversary meeting will be held at King's Chapel Thursday, May 30, at 2 P.M. A fine list of speakers and subjects has been prepared, and will be duly announced.

The Sunday-school at Washington, D.C., has copies of the "Carol" to give away where they can do good. Any Sunday-school desiring this help can address Mr. Edward B. Eynon, 1113 N Street, N.W., Washington, D.C.

Mr. Edward B. Eynon has been made superintendent of the Unitarian Sunday-school in Washington, D.C. This gentleman has served as secretary and treasurer at the same school for seven years, and has never been absent from duty one day. This is a remarkable record.

The "New Song and Service Book" was published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society April 4. A month has elapsed, and the first edition of three thousand copies is about exhausted. The book has gone into between forty and fifty Sunday-schools, East and West. A new edition is nearly ready.

The remaining five Channing Hall "talks" on "The Life of Jesus" will be condensed into three. Teachers and others who have been in attendance will please to remember this, and guide themselves accordingly. The last "talk" of the season will be on Saturday, May 25. On May 11 the subjects treated will be "The Last Supper" and "Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane." On May 18, subjects, "Jesus before Pilate" and "The Death of Jesus." May 25, subject, "The Resurrection." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

TO DELEGATES AND ATTENDANTS.—Delegates and attendants at the meetings will report, upon arrival, at the Third Unitarian Church, north-west corner of Monroe and Laflin Streets. Take the Madison Street cable cars, and get off at Laflin Street.

Religious Intelligence.

THE Unitarian society of Hyde Park have voted to extend a call to Rev. A. G. Pettengill, formerly of Boothbay, Me.

REV. C. W. PARK, having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship of his fitness for the Unitarian ministry, is hereby commended to our ministers and churches. W. L. Chaffin, Chairman. D. W. Morehouse, Secretary.

REV. F. J. GILE, having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship of his fitness for the Unitarian ministry, is hereby commended to our ministers and churches. W. L. Chaffin, Chairman. D. W. Morehouse, Secretary.

REV. J. H. TUCKER, having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship of his fitness for the Unitarian ministry, is hereby commended to our ministers and churches. W. L. Chaffin, Chairman. D. W. Morehouse, Secretary.

THE Worcester League of Unitarian Women will hold their last meeting for the season on May 15, at the Second Parish Church, Worcester. Morning session at eleven o'clock, afternoon session at two o'clock. General subject, "Religion." All women are invited.

THE Brotherhood of Christian Unity have sent out a circular signed by Bishop Vincent, Rev. David H. Greer, Dr. Barrows, Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, and Mr. Robert C. Ogden, asking for co-operation in their plan of devoting Whitsunday to a consideration of the subject of "Christian Unity." All ministers are asked to preach upon this subject that day, and to join the movement for making it an annual custom. Feeling that Christianity is growing weary of its divisions, they hope by this plan to develop sympathy among the churches, and thus prepare for the ideal "unity in diversity" of the Church universal.

CHILDREN'S MISSION.—The annual meeting of the corporation of the Children's Mission to the Children of the Destitute was held at the Home, 277 Tremont Street, on Wednesday, May 1, when the following persons were elected Executive Committee for 1895-96: William H. Baldwin, president; Warren P. Tyler, vice-president; Rev. Samuel B. Cruft, secretary; Henry Pickering, treasurer; Thomas Gaffield, Ellis L. Motte, Clarence W. Jones, George W. Fox, William E. James, Dr. J. Foster Bush, Franklin Brown, Herbert H. Ceiley; superintendent, William Crosby.

MISSION WORK IN OKLAHOMA.—In September, 1893, Rev. Charles H. Rogers went to Oklahoma City, and preached the first Unitarian sermon ever delivered in the territory. He was urged to remain by some of the leading citizens, and in the course of the next six months was able to secure, fit up, and dedicate a chapel seating about two hundred and fifty. He has preached in that chapel every Sunday since to congregations varying from one hundred and fifty to the full capacity of the room. The chapel is paid for, save a small debt to the Church Building Loan Fund. Last winter Mr. Rogers commenced holding evening services in the probate court room at Guthrie, the capital of the Territory. He has there an organized society of fifty-three members, and an average congregation of seventy-five. Oklahoma City and Guthrie are about forty miles apart, but trains run so that it is feasible to speak in one in the morning and the other in the evening. Thus the two principal cities of Oklahoma have Unitarian preaching every Sunday. Mr. Rogers has also held bi-weekly services at Downs, where the first steps toward organization have been taken; at Norman, which is the seat of the Territorial University; at Edmund and at Crescent City. He finds the people ready to hear the Unitarian gospel on week nights as well as on Sundays. Quite recently Mr. Rogers has found a coadjutor in Rev. W. W. Buchanan of Guthrie, who has found his way into the freedom of the liberal faith. Mr. Buchanan has been one of the leading Trinitarian Congregationalist ministers in the Territory. He will take charge of the movement at Downs, and proposes to organize movements in Chandler and Perkins, being well known in both these places. Thus in little more than eighteen months our Unitarian gospel has gotten a good foothold in this newest of Territories. Two churches have been organized, and the message has been given in six other localities. Calls have come from several towns, to which our minister has not yet been able to respond. In addition to his preaching, Mr. Rogers has procured a printing-press, and proposes to edit and print a monthly paper, which, with tracts and leaflets, he will circulate widely in that new South-west. To obtain the press has quite exhausted his limited means, and he greatly needs $25 to purchase type to carry on his enterprise. Mr. Rogers, being a practical printer, believes heartily in making his fingers supplement his voice in preaching Unitarian "glad tidings" in Oklahoma. T. B. F.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Dr. William Everett will preach May 12. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

Ministers' Monday Club: May 13, 10.30 A.M. Rev. F. H. James will preside. Rev. Henry Powers will give the address, on "The Outburst of Patriotic Spirit: Its Cause and Meaning."

The annual meeting of the National Guild Alliance will be held in Channing Hall, 25 Beacon Street, on Wednesday, May 29, at three o'clock. All churches are requested to send delegates in the interest of this young people's organization. President B. R. Bulkeley will preside. There will be good speakers and pleasing music. Business meeting, for delegates only, will precede the mass meeting in Room 10 at two o'clock.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—To meet the demand of our Post-office Missions for liberal religious literature, it is proposed to print from fifteen to twenty of Mr. Crothers's sermons during the coming year. It is believed that much can be done in this way to interest the increasing number of people who are awaking to the need of a broader belief. The annual subscription will be one dollar. Subscriptions at this amount are solicited to increase the circulation. Those giving more than one dollar may send names of persons to whom copies will be sent. Subscriptions may be sent to J. T. G. Nichols, 63 Brattle Street, Cambridge, Mass.

LINCOLN, MASS.—Rev. W. H. Pulsford of Waltham has kindly consented to supply here for the summer, excepting during August, when it is hoped that Rev. B. R. Bulkeley of Chicago may be with us for one or two Sundays.

NEWBURG, N.Y.—During the latter part of the winter and early spring one of the orthodox pastors of Newburg inaugurated a "parliament" of denominations, the ministers of the different sects in the city, except the Unitarian, being invited on consecutive Sunday evenings to answer in turn the question, "Why am I a Presbyterian?" "Why am I a Roman Catholic?" "Why am I a Jew?" etc. The local press commented sharply on the fact that the courtesy of an invitation to take part in these meetings was not extended to Rev. Arthur H. Grant, the Unitarian minister. As a result, great interest was aroused; and Mr. Grant, at the request of some of his friends, consented to speak in the Academy of Music on Sunday afternoon, April 28, on "Why am I a Unitarian?" At the appointed time an audience of nine hundred people assembled to listen to him. At the close of his eloquent address, which was received with unmistakable marks of appreciation, he challenged the orthodox ministers of Newburg to meet him at the same place and on the same hour on the following Sunday, to defend in joint debate the following four fundamental evangelical doctrines:—

(1) "That the Bible is the inspired and infallible word of God."

(2) "That God is tri-personal; and that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost are each 'very God of very God'; and that the Son is equal to the Father."

(3) "That, in consequence of the fall of Adam, human nature is utterly depraved and corrupt."

(4) "That those who do not accept the atonement of Christ in this life are to be eternally punished and tormented in the next life."

Accordingly, on Sunday afternoon, May 5, over twelve hundred people crowded into the Academy of Music to listen to the discussion which was announced to take place between Mr. Grant and one of the Baptist ministers of the city who had accepted the challenge to defend the above propositions. A desire has been expressed by many that Mr. Grant continue these services in the Academy of Music for a few Sundays longer.

ROCKLAND, MASS.—The Unitarian church here sends out a little pamphlet to explain its organization and the Executive Circle plan. The diagram which represents this plan is very suggestive, showing how the Executive Circle embraces every activity of the church, as an organized body, in all its relations to the community and the world at large. Its four departments are religious, philanthropic, Sunday-school, and social; and each includes several distinct activities.

ROXBURY, MASS.—All Souls' Church: Rev. William H. Ramsay of Salem will preach Sunday, May 12. Services at 10.30 A.M.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.—Rev. Stanley M. Hunter preached recently on the question, "Is Life Worth Living?" considering it from three points of view. Accepting the popular theology, which makes life end either in heaven or hell, the answer must be in the negative. With the atheistic view, that we are the victims of fate, the answer is the same; but for the rationalist it is always possible to make things better, and to look forward with hope.

SHARON, MASS.—On Sunday, April 21, the pastor, Rev. E. M. Hickok, preached on "Armenia," giving an historical sketch and present needs. This was followed by resolutions prepared by Mr. George H. Kempton, which, duly signed, were forwarded to Washington, D.C., and to England. The Sharon society is actively striving to keep itself afloat, grateful for recent gifts from the Alliance Branches, and hoping to make a success of its biennial fair in the coming summer. The interest and attendance have steadily increased, and the spirit of good will and affection manifested from the first still exists between the pastor and the people, who fully appreciate the sermons to which they have listened for two years.

STURGIS, MICH.—Rev. Mr. Buckley preached an eloquent sermon on May 5 about "Principles and Personalities." After the service a business meeting was held, which discussed the feasibility of continuing the services for another year; and the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

"Resolved, To promote reverent free thought and an unsectarian spirit in religion, and, above all, to strengthen faith in the life of purity, righteousness, and love,—this is the purpose and aim of the Unitarian society of Sturgis, and for the maintenance and the carrying forward of these principles we pledge our personal devotion and financial help."

TAUNTON MASS.—The First Parish in this old town of the Old Colony has no intention of becoming an institutional church, but it is alive to the value of the machinery of organization. Two committees have been appointed recently,—the one on Hospitality, whose duties are obvious enough, and the other a Committee of Conference. This second committee is made up of representatives from the smaller bodies within the parish,—the Sunday-school, the Women's Alliance, the In His Name Club, and the like. Two meetings of the Conference Committee have been held; and a preliminary examination has been given to plans for parish work, which are to be perfected during the summer and put into operation in the autumn.

TORONTO, CANADA.—The Unity Club of the First Unitarian Church has just closed a most interesting and successful season under the presidency of the pastor, Rev. H. H. Woude. The aim of the club is to study, not create, literature; and among the subjects presented at the various meetings were: "Oliver Wendell Holmes"; "Art Critics at Work"; "Charles Darwin"; "First Aid in Emergency Cases"; "Tennyson as a Song-writer," with musical illustrations; "Lowell as a Humorist, as a Poet, and as an Essayist"; "Mrs. Humphry Ward's 'Marcella'"; "Modern Psychology,—the English School, the German School"; "The New England Puritans"; "The Unitarian Descendants"; "In my Library," by Mr. J. Davis Burnett, the possessor of the largest and most valuable private library in Canada; "A Few Facts about Sweden and its People"; "Musicians and their Music," with illustrative selections from their works. Several of these papers were of a high order of literary merit. The season's work as crowned at the conclusion, on April 15, with a lecture by Mr. Woude, who is a well-known Shakespearean scholar and interpreter, on "Shakspeare, the Man," before a large audience in the church. After the lecture the members of the club with their friends had a closing reunion.

WICHITA, KAN.—Rev. W. S. Vail reports that the church in Wichita is in a more hopeful and prosperous condition than at any time during the last year and a half. It has losses, but has made them good; and its spirit is hopeful. If Southern Kansas makes a good crop this year, the church will thrive; but, if there is another year of drought and failure, the prospect will be dark for everything, including Unitarian churches. Mr. Vail has two outside movements on his hands which are interesting. One is a little Universalist church at Valley City, to which he drives every other Sunday afternoon. Here is an audience of about fifty, mostly farmers, who welcome his word, and gladly pay him for coming. The other is a new movement in Newton. This is a railroad town of seven thousand people. Last winter a little knot of a half-dozen were induced by Mr. Vail to try the experiment of a Unitarian service. In three months the half-dozen has grown to thirty, who hold services in the pleasant Woman's Club room every Sunday evening, Mr. Vail reaching them by train after his afternoon service at Valley City. Some of the best people in the town are deeply interested, and the prospect of a church in the near future is hopeful.

WORCESTER CONFERENCE.—The May meeting of the Worcester Conference will be held in Hudson May 15 and 16. The sermon on the evening of the 15th will be preached by Rev. Stopford Brooke of Boston. The subject of the devotional service which Rev. A. S. Garver is to conduct on the morning of the 16th will be "The Work of the Church." The essay of the forenoon will be read by W. F. Greenman, on the topic, "The Immediate Advance of Unitarian Congregationalism." Discussion opened by Rev. G. W. Kent. In the afternoon the general topic, "To What Kind of a Church would I be Loyal?" will be treated by several laymen, as follows: "The Preaching," Jonathan Smith of Clinton; "Missionary Work," Archibald M. Howe of Cambridge; "Practical Philanthropies," F. E. Holman, Clinton.

ESSEX UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.—Meeting at Newburyport May 14 and 15. Tuesday evening, May 14, sermon by Rev. W. R. Alger. Wednesday, May 15, 9.30 A.M., devotional meeting, led by Rev. F. A. Gilmore of Haverhill; 10 A.M., business and address by Rev. G. W. Cooke of the Temperance Society and Rev. D. M. Wilson, New England superintendent of churches; 11 A.M., address by Rev. George Batchelor, secretary of American Unitarian Association, on "The Transition from Philosophy to Religion,"—discussion to follow; 1 P.M., collation; 2 P.M., address on "The Church and the World," by Rev. George D. Latimer, followed by discussion. The hospitality of the Newburyport parish is offered for Wednesday, and a large attendance is hoped for. Ask for round-trip tickets on the railroad. Alfred Manchester, Secretary.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

DELEGATE SOCIETIES.

According to our record, the following societies, having sent "a contribution for missionary uses to the treasurer of the Association for two successive years,"—the last having been placed in his hands "on or before May 1,"—are entitled to representation at the coming annual meeting "by the persons of its minister and two additional lay delegates." If any omissions are discovered in the list or any society fails to receive blank credentials, it is desirable that notice should be sent to me without delay.

GEORGE BATCHELOR, Sec'y.

ARTHUR LINCOLN, Treasurer,
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Business Notices.

The Merrell-Soule Company, of Syracuse, N.Y., offer $10.00 each for twenty of the best written articles on the merits of the Nonesuch Condensed Mince Meat, containing not more than three hundred words, giving, from actual experience, a detailed description of its quality, cleanliness, and convenience. The only condition imposed is that each article must be accompanied with a picture of the girl holding a pie, cut from the outside wrapper of a package of Nonesuch Mince Meat, as evidence that the writer has actually used it. The name of this paper must also be given. This offer will expire July 1, 1895. All rejected manuscripts will be returned to the writer.

How they do it.—The very practical way in which the Paine Furniture Company goes to work to construct a popular piece of furniture may prove interesting to our readers. They begin by ascertaining the needs of the room or apartment in which the piece is to stand, and then endeavor to satisfy those needs in the new design. How admirably this plan may be worked is well illustrated in another column in the case of a hall stand. We commend to our readers a perusal of the announcement.

One advantage of the Miller Lamp is that it can be lighted without removing the chimney. If it had no other superiority, this one appliance would commend it to every purchaser.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

DAY.

IN EXTREMIS.

Not from the pestilence and storm,
Fate's creeping brood, the crouching form
Of dread disease, and spectre dire
Of wrack and loss, of flood and fire;
Not from the poisoned fangs of hate,
Or death-worm born to be my mate,—
But from the fear that such things be,
O Lord, deliver me!

Fear dogs the shadow at my side;
Fear doth my wingless soul bestride.
In the lone stillness of the night
His whisper doth mine ear affright;
His formless shape mine eye appalls;
Under his touch my body crawls.
Now, from his loathsome mastery,
O Lord, deliver me!

I would not loose me, if I might,
From touch or sound or taste or sight
Of all life's dread revealing. Nay,
Were I God's angel, I would stay
Here on this clod of crucial grief,
And learn my rede without relief;
But from this basest empery,
And last, I would be free.

My fiend hath poisoned even the cup
Of faith and love. I may not sup
But horror grins within the bowl,
And spectre guests affright my soul.
Yea, and the awful Sisters Three,
Spinning the web eternity,
Have lost their solemn state, and wear
The Furies' snake-bound hair.

Out of the jaws of hell and night
Lead my sick soul, O Sovereign Light;
Let me tread shivering through the cold,
Despised, forsaken, hunted, old,
Unloved, unwept, beneath the ban
Of sharpest anguish laid on man.
But from the monster foul I flee,
O God, deliver me!

—Alice Brown.

The Pulpit.

ETERNAL LIFE.

BY REV. A. B. VORSE.

"I go to prepare a place for you; and whither I go ye know, and the way ye know."—JOHN xiv. 2, 4.

These are precious words which this interview in John's Gospel records, and of which my text forms a part. How full they are of the comforting spirit of the Master! They have seemed to me his great hymn of comfort to the sorrowing heart of humanity. They have the peculiar quality of the hymn in being addressed to the heart. They breathe the tone of the consoler in a time when only the simplest assuring word is of any avail, when comfort comes—if at all—through what speaks to the troubled heart. Are there not times when we turn to this interview with the disciples as to a fountain that never fails, so close upon our need is the word it brings?

Two great spiritual facts seem to blend in his words. There is the unity of things spiritual, and out of that truth there is set forth a conception of spiritual experience which presents the "hereafter" in the "here." The words assert that matters of the spiritual world are parts of one spiritual force and being; that, in this regard, the present and the future unite to form one living reality; and that immortality and heaven are coming, and are already come in the life that is of the spirit.

To immortality, therefore, we attach two meanings. Under one of these meanings we refer to a future state of existence,—existence in another world, after life in this world shall come to an end. Under the other meaning we refer to a quality of life,—the immortal as aspired to and lived, as sought for and pursued,—a quality and result upon life here and now of the best and the highest life.

We have these two ways of regarding immortality. Both represent conditions of the immortal kind; and we need the blending of both in our experience, as principles by which to live and by which to work out life's destiny. In shutting out either, we weaken the hold upon life in the spiritual sense. We belong to immortality in this double sense,—in the sense that we live on after death, and in the sense that we have an immortal nature to unfold and to make the chief end of existence in all living. It is the object of the seed hid away in the soil not only to live above and beyond its place underground, but also to develop the best life accordant with its nature, whether underground or above it. Its true quality and outcome of growth begin with that earliest start of life in the germ. So it is in the case of man. In thinking of living on, and at death rising as an immortal being from earth to heaven, he is to think of living well while he does live; and he can do that only as he lives the immortal life. In both senses immortality is to come into possession and realization. The fact of immortal destiny and the quality of immortal living are to unite in him. The fact of continued existence in another world and the quality of immortality in the life he lives in this world,—both enter as elements in his true development, both are streams of influence which he must have for a full unfolding of his life. When unitedly they go into effect to give his thoughts direction, when he shapes his course under their influence, when in their light he plans his life, he is then in the way that leads toward the perfect life.

In any thought of existence in a future world we are often perplexed by a type of life that seems to contradict it. We think of the design in such a boon to influence mankind in this world and to reveal signs of its reality in their being and lives; but we are perplexed by the manner in which the evidence is here wanting. We turn our eyes upon a side of life that seems materialistic and sordid. We look upon the millions and millions of human beings who have, or seem to have, no perceivable conception of life in the spiritual sense, who even make their lives to consist in getting through with life's outward needs and conditions. Its tasks, its hardships, its stern demands for service they unwillingly render. Where does any other world touch them! How little, often, do they seem to have thought about it! How far away does it all seem to them, and how far away to you, as you stand in their presence and estimate them in the spiritual scale! As you regard them in their crude life; as you look upon their rayless, hard-set features; as you form an estimate of their capacity to take a single step above their present condition of life,—you may, in such a presence, have to call to mind your strongest reason for immortality in trying to think of them as immortal. And not only down upon what we think of only as low in the scale of being, but up in more highly favored and highly gifted ranks of men, do we often encounter a similar perplexity. You will there find men who are still living close to earth; you will see a condition of life over which you will again be led to ask, Where is the sign that a future world is touching them with any hint of itself, what is there in or about them that gives you a hint of life beyond when they die? And what answer do we make? We reply to this that we have still the proof of the spiritual nature to offer. It does nothing to disprove our immortality, nor the destiny in store for them. The truth is, it is by such points of difference in the scale of being that the truth of a future world begins to be confirmed to us. That men do not stand on the same spiritual level is most true. On the spiritual scale men range in grades and even types of capacity; and if, as I have intimated, there are those who seem not to be immortal, there are others who show a spiritual capacity which makes any thought of their dying absolutely impossible. And it is just this difference and distinction which makes a starting-point for reasoning ourselves out of the perplexity which these differences and distinctions present. I do not say that these distinctions prove anything absolutely for immortality, but that they have a place in the chain of the argument by showing that it takes another world of the future to make anything accordant with reason out of this world of the present. These millions on the one side who show no hint; and then, on the other, those in whom the undying spark does show itself present, and in signs of increasing magnitude, are distributed to men out of rising sources of the spirit within them and over them,—as in the stars, so in men,—in degrees of intensity and brilliancy, until the spiritual in certain rare souls flames out like sunlight. It is a difference which impels the belief in another world to round out and complete men's share in the privilege and the joy.

This is the light on all the perplexity and on all the problem which the varied conditions of life in this world set before us. Even though quite true that in heaven, as on earth, one star differeth from another, there is there to be the fulfilment of life to all: the meagre outlook here for the unspiritual shall there show that God has not left himself without a witness in any soul, and that all shall know him, even from the least unto the greatest. We therefore need the fact of a future existence as the only fulfilment of what is stored, and in various degrees distributed, in the present. For look at what is thus stored, and which points toward the day of fulfilment by every prophecy of the human soul; and then undertake to solve the problem of human existence, if there be no future. We find it impossible to deal with the problem of existence itself, except on the theory that a future existence is a reality. What other outcome is possible to what God has given us in this life? What other chance, even, for fruit to what his hand has sown in the nature of man? What other sequel to longings deep in the soul, or to high hopes that burn on after the fires on the hearth of time and sense have gone out and left the hearthstone cold,—cold, but with dear faces still stamped upon our vision, with sweet voices still making melody in our hearts, with our hearts still holding our precious treasure, and with an intensity and longing that would turn life into an unspeakable mockery but for a reality of sweet communion awaiting us in another world? And so comes a belief in a future state of existence; and, as ground for the belief, we can apply the same terms as are at times used with reference to a belief in God, and say: "I believe in a world beyond, because this world would be inexplicable without it, but explicable with it. I believe in life beyond the grave, because it is the only possible solution to life this side of it." And, if we take the language of Jesus to his disciples in my text, I seem to hear him saying: Do you raise a question of that future? Then have a future in the present. The truth is, you already have it. You cannot in any moment sever yourself absolutely from it. That future is with you in some true sense here and now. It is here in your being. Your being contains its promise, your thoughts project themselves in its direction, your hopes open toward its joys, and, in certain ways, your plans have in them something of its tendency. And so we have the "whither I go" in ways we cannot ignore, and not any more can we ignore the presence with us of some conception of the "way" which joins itself with it. Yes, on the common plane of life there is with you the fact of the "whither" and the "way." It is wrapped up with your powers as a man. It lies at the very heart of character. We all feel it so, and are asking, "Whither is character tending, upward or downward,—upward into the light or downward into darkness?" "Whither," O young man? "Whither," O young maiden? It is something that joins itself to your being. It is not simply a destiny of the future: it is here with you, as a state or condition. What you are in character, what you are in life, tells of the direction in which you have hitherto come; and this at any time will show the future to which you go. In our thought of the words of Jesus we have indeed a future world in view; but, clearly, it is a conception which holds the hereafter in the here.

If one is thinking of going to London, he does not touch upon London till he gets there. Even his preparation for the journey thither may have nothing in it that is decidedly peculiar to that city. It may be a trip across the sea and a visit to a foreign shore that enters into his plans of preparation. And so he could make preparation, and just as well change his mind, and not go to London, but to some other city. Have not men too often thought of the city of God in that light?

But the "way" and the "whither," as matters of the spiritual being, are quite different from that. They describe what is here with us in the soul as a present experience. Heaven as a "whither" to which we go is also heaven in which we are as we walk in the way of its conditions and its joys. So that, while, in a very true and significant sense, it awaits our coming as the heavenly city of happy anticipation, outlying the voyage of life here below, and thus, in its stored treasure, and the promise it holds out to us, is the great overarching consummation and joy of this mortal existence, there is yet more to be thought of about it. In an equally important sense it is to be known as the fact and the experience of the true life here in this world; and to know in our lives of the "way" is to know something, at least, of the "whither," to know it in what experience will teach us about it, being in it with him, our Master and Lord.

We trace this other important fact. It is that Jesus talks of the future with no mention of death as intervening. "I go to prepare a place for you" are words that have no hint of a dark shadow overhanging death,—not even a hint of anything other than a "passing on." "I go." That is here Jesus' conception of death. In place of hinting at a termination to life, we get only the vision of a door through which to pass into a wider opportunity of being. In his case "to go" was to enter upon the further mission of preparing the way for the coming of his disciples. It was to be a blessing that should revert back upon them and the world, and make brighter the mansions which the Father had provided. With this in view, his words are, "It is expedient for you that I go away." The full harvest of blessing that was to spring out of his life was to proceed from that continuance of life into which he would enter. Here in the body he was not looking for that fulfilment. In the nature of things, this was not to be expected. But he would go and prepare a place for them; and he would "come again and receive them unto himself, that where he was they might be also." It was "to go" that he might be with them as never before,—with them in the comfort and the power of the spirit, with them immanently, and with them through the sacred significance which would attach itself to his name, and this deeper hold upon them of his truth and his life.

This, truly, is sublime interpretation of death. And is it not also, in any case, its true illustration? Does it ever mean anything other than "to go" and to "come again," and to "come again" in sweet communion, and in blessing? Do we not know something of the reality of the experience from that life into which our dear ones have gone? A beautiful light reverts back upon the way, and shows us that they who "go" come again, and make the future more of a reality and more inviting and sweet to our souls.

A TALK WITH DR. MARTINEAU.

The London Christian World gives its readers the following interesting account of an interview with Dr. Martineau:—

We availed ourselves the other day of Dr. Martineau's permission to visit him at his well-known and commodious residence in Gordon Square. Our representative says: A kindly greeting awaited me; and I soon found myself comfortably installed in the Doctor's own particular study chair, while he, with a charming and unaffected courtesy which came from and went straight to the heart, set himself to discuss the topics on which I wanted to hear him speak. As we chatted, I had leisure to study the fine face before me,—the clear gray eye; the firm mouth; the mass and power of the broad, deep-lined forehead. It was difficult to realize, in listening to the musical voice as it glided easily and with fulness of mental resource from subject to subject, that the speaker had entered upon the tenth decade of human life.

"You have almost made a record, Doctor, in point of years, as a public worker," I remarked.

"Oh, I don't know about that," was the brisk reply. "I remember now being in Dresden in 1848, the Revolution year, and attending a great function, the 'Constitution's Fest,' at the cathedral, where I heard an admirable extempore sermon, delivered without a note, in a clear voice, perfectly heard by every one in the vast audience. The preacher was Dr. Ammon, and he was at that time ninety-three years old. That beats me, you see."

"But your record is wonderful. People would like to know your secret of keeping a sound mind in a sound body so long."

"Ah! but I have had my break-downs,—a very bad one in 1873. I was engaged at that time in a controversy with Mr. Herbert Spencer, and was working at high pressure. I was seized with attacks of giddiness, which compelled me to stop work. The worst came when stepping out of a railway carriage in visiting some relatives at York. I felt myself whirling round as though fastened to Ixion's wheel, and nearly lost consciousness. The medical man whom I consulted there said it was apoplexy, and hinted that it meant the end. Dr. Andrew Clark, however, my London physician, did not confirm this verdict. He attributed the attack to irregular circulation in the brain, and ordered rest and freedom from excitement. I gave up my London pulpit,—for I never preached without a very strong drain upon the emotional nature, which now seemed dangerous,—but continued my professorship and my literary work, and have kept steadily on ever since."

"Have you adhered to any special regimen or habit of life which you regard as contributing to your longevity?"

"There has been nothing very special. For many years I was an abstainer,—mainly on moral grounds, and as an example to my children. Latterly, however, my doctor, in view of my somewhat languid circulation, has prescribed a spoonful of whiskey at night, which I take regularly. I work in the morning till lunch. We dine at five; and I take it easy till eight, when I have a cup of tea, after which I get my best working hours,—namely, from eight to midnight. Then I go to bed and sleep soundly."

Turning to matters theological, I remarked, "I suppose you find a great difference in the theological climate from the time when you first commenced your public career?"

"Yes," said he, musingly: "there has been a great softening, and at the same time a hardening. Personally, I have been treated of late years with an almost affectionate regard, which I am bound to acknowledge, by the London clergy. I go sometimes to the debates at Sion College, and they insist upon my speaking. Unfortunately, however, I find myself generally at a very far remove indeed from the views I hear there."

"It is very difficult indeed," he continued,—"I fear, in fact, almost hopeless,—to get the generality of the clergy to look facts in the face. A large mass of them are excellent, hard-working, self-denying men; but they are so immersed in the round of their parochial duties that they never seriously examine fundamental questions. They know next to nothing of Biblical criticism, or of the real history of the first two centuries of Christianity."

"Do you think, Doctor, that one of the meanings of Sacerdotalism is that it represents to the rank and file of the clergy a shorter cut and an easier road to influence than that furnished by painstaking scholarship?"

"Perhaps," he replied. "Altogether, this Sacerdotal revival is to me a sad and humiliating business. Only a short time ago I heard a prominent High Church theologian read a paper in which he gravely discussed the question as to what became of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament after the elements had been partaken of. The conclusion arrived at was that they reascended to heaven when the process of digestion had been completed!"

"Talking of theological divergences, I remember, Doctor, you belonged to the Metaphysical Society, with such opposites in it, if I mistake not, as Manning on the one side and Huxley on the other. Did you, as the result of your discussions, seem ever to get nearer to some common ground?"

"In some cases yes. It is curious that I found myself most in sympathy—in many points, at least—with the Roman Catholics. One of our number, for instance, was Ward,—'Ideal Ward,' as you remember he was called, from his book,—one of Newman's set, who went over to Rome before him. He became an intimate friend of mine, and we met constantly. He showed his confidence in me by sending me proof-sheets of a volume of lectures delivered by him, in his capacity of professor of philosophy and theology at a Catholic college, for revision. It was on 'Nature,' and I found little in it to dissent from."

"Do you entertain, then, any hope that the Roman and other historical churches will eventually revise their creeds so as to bring their thinking into line with present-day knowledge?"

He shook his head. "I see no prospect of it: to become learners instead of infallible teachers seems too great a sacrifice."

"What, then, is to be the issue?"

"I expect it will be, sooner or later, the smash-up of organized Christianity as it at present exists, when the indestructible elements of it will reappear in new forms."

Dealing with the relation of Unitarians to other Christian bodies, Dr. Martineau said: "I do not believe in organizing on a Unitarian basis as such, and I would not give sixpence to a 'Unitarian chapel.' I tell people that to put that name outside is to inform Trinitarians that there is nothing in there for them. In my Liverpool pastorate I had convinced Trinitarian members of my congregation right through. My principle is that of Baxter,—that a church has no right to impose a creed or confession, but should rely upon the sufficiency of Scripture and the right of private judgment. No member of the congregation has the right to inquire as to the conscientious belief of his neighbor in the next pew."

"How about the minister?"

"So long as he preaches, lives, and works in a manner which is helpful to the spiritual life of the congregation, let him be supported, and the same freedom be accorded to him as to his hearers."

Before we parted, the Doctor gave me some interesting reminiscences of his early days. He was greatly influenced in his inner life by his dear old schoolmaster and friend, Dr. Lant Carpenter, with whom he lived for two years. "It was very much during this period that my deeper religious sense arose. I read books from the most opposite theological camps, looking chiefly to their appeal to the inner life. Thus, on the one hand, Mrs. Hannah More's 'Practical Piety' and the works of Shepherd, of Frome,—an orthodox devotional writer,—deeply affected me; while I was not less influenced, on the other hand, by Dr. Priestley's 'Habitual Devotion.' It was while at Derby, where I was sent to train for a civil engineer, that I felt what old-fashioned people would speak of as 'a call' to the ministry. My father consented to sacrifice the large fee which had been paid for my apprenticeship to engineering, and I went at once to York to study for the ministry."

It was in the Derby period that Dr. Martineau met the lady who became his wife. She was the eldest daughter of the Unitarian minister of the town. "I cannot be quoted," he added, laughing, "as against long engagements. I was only seventeen when we came to an understanding with each other. It was at first hardly taken seriously at home, but we knew our minds. The engagement was formally recognized when I came of age, and all went well." A family of eight children resulted from that happy union, of whom two sons and four daughters survive.

Other topics came up in our interview of which I have not space here to speak. At its close I came away with the pleasant consciousness that I had been spending an hour with a sweet, high, and sunny nature, linked to one of the foremost of English intellects.

LEVERETT SALTONSTALL.

The death of this distinguished gentleman has called forth many tributes to the excellence of his character from the various organizations with which he was connected. As he was born and reared within the Unitarian fellowship, and dearly loved the faith which was his by inheritance as well as by conviction, it is fitting that these pages should contain some recognition of his worth.

As he came of an ancestral line going back to the earliest years of our national life, and bore a name to which others before him had lent distinction, so the virtues of his race lived strongly in him. The Puritans are generally thought to have been a cold and gloomy people; but, certainly, there was hot blood among them. And their descendants come honestly by some impulsive traits. Mr. Saltonstall was one of the warmest-hearted men of his generation,—quick and responsive to every touch of noble feeling, generous in his sympathies, and capable of passionate earnestness where duty and honor led the way.

Strong and robust of physical frame until his later years, he was as fine a specimen as one could easily find of that entire healthfulness, alike of body and of mind, which is the sign of a life kept in close touch with all that is natural and real. Early Unitarianism furnished many examples of this perfectly sound and healthful manhood,—"like a tree planted by rivers of water," to take the psalmist's words. Indeed, one could hardly describe this type of manliness better than to say that the qualities of the Psalms of David were its leading characteristics. It was,—happily, we may say that it still is,—in the best life of our time, a kind of manhood which may not always be very profound in its theological views, but which, at all events, lives so close to the great realities that its thoughts and sentiments are always as good and wholesome as a fresh west wind.

Such a one was Leverett Saltonstall. He never lacked moral courage, either in the face of men or in the presence of death; and he practised none of the arts by which a cheap popularity is to be gained. He was a man who secured almost as much respect from his opponents as from his friends,—quite as much, if these opponents came to know his true character, and did not themselves come within range of his scorn for all that was dishonorable and mean. As collector of the port of Boston, he was a tower of strength in the cause of civil service reform, and accomplished much to put that reform on a firm basis in his native State. But, if we could gather up and estimate all the influence that comes from such a life as his, no doubt we should discover that he did most in being what he was,—a noble, great-hearted, high-minded man; one who had no conceit of himself as an apostle of righteousness, but who yet preached honesty, integrity, and manly virtue wherever he went.

All God's pleasures are simple ones,—health, the rapture of a May morning, sunshine, the stream blue and green, kind words, benevolent acts, the glow of good humor.—F. W. Robertson.

THE BEST AND THE WORST.

BY REV. CHARLES R. WELD.

"There is no new thing under the sun."—ECCLES. I. 9.

"Behold, I make all things new."—REV. XXI. 5.

The utter contrast of these two sentences must strike all who read them, and give us a sense of the wisdom of the men who collected these books, and did not hesitate to include both in the Bible, though one directly contradicts the other; for one or the other underlies all religions, philosophies, the progress of races and men, and makes of earth a real heaven or hell,—nothing: all. How we hear the first daily in its modern version—"there is nothing new under the sun"—from the lips of old men bowed by the weight of years, young men having filled the round of worldly experience to satiety, successful business men, disappointed politicians, noble statesmen, whose lives have been devoted to their country! All use the words of Ecclesiastes to express their view of things; but, on the other hand, we are hourly confronted by evidences of the newness of things. Which, then, is true? The answer is of tremendous importance; for upon it depends the life or death, the happiness or misery, of man.

Contrast for a moment the two books, Ecclesiastes and Revelation,—the first representing its author in prosperity, having wealth, power, position, health, success; the other written by one in exile, adversity, poverty, disappointment, sorrow, and loneliness. Yet the former says "nothing"; the latter, "all." Solomon seems to epitomize the half of humanity; and in his book we hear the voice of earth, the satiety of the senses. Look for a moment at the two men. See Solomon, born into riches and splendor and power and wisdom, at the end of his days, when he had tasted all the world had to offer, pacing the porch of the temple, with no sense of the Unseen, and crying in despair, "Vanitas vanitatum,"—"All is vanity!" See this unknown John, sitting in exile on the shore of the Isle of Patmos, as he listens to the sighing of the Ægean Sea, looking forth on a wrecked world, where he sees Rome in flames and the bleeding bodies of the martyrs tortured for their faith; yet he exclaims, "Behold, I make all things new."

If we ask, "Which is literally true?" we must answer, "Solomon." For geology proves this, as well as astronomy. Orion and the Pleiades are the same now as when they met the gaze of Abraham and Job, the Pharaohs and the mighty Caesars. The mystery of birth and death are the same to-day they were in the beginning, though the steps leading up to the portal of death be worn almost away by the tread of millions that have crossed its threshold into eternity. Temptation and sin,—do we not find them on the earliest page of humanity's history as well as in our life to-day? Seed-time and harvest, summer and winter, pestilence and famine, success and failure,—are they not all evidences of the awful monotony of life and the seeming truth of Buddha's wheel? What is discovery itself but an uncovering of what has long lain hidden from the view of man, for there is nothing new? In work, in politics, in theology, the same theories and ideas and methods are repeated over and over again. Yet, if you feel right, you feel this view is false,—yea, false as hell itself.

John won't stand if taken literally. No man ever made an atom. Men may talk of themselves as self-made men or boast of the work of their brains; but it is a mere collecting and arranging, for man cannot create. We are but middlemen,—mere shifters of scenery, like children who pile up the sand on the shore into castles and temples and forts, which the incoming tide changes and destroys. We may shift and change, alter and patch, and turn over our lives; but we shall find that "of one blood are all nations of earth," and there is nothing new under the sun. Yet you can see with half an eye that there is a difference in men, in institutions, in nations. Some are attractive, some repellent: some remind us of heaven, some of hell. You can see it in Solomon and John. It appears in the fate of China and the Anglo-Saxon race. We feel it in the homes we enter. The difference is not in the four walls and roof. What, then, is it? It is the spirit. This gossamer, mysterious, invisible something which we cannot touch or buy is the basis of life. Every one feels it: none can define it. It stamps our minds and moulds our features. It makes heaven a ponderosity and a light, shining as the presence of God. A child four years old may possess it, and the wisest man may want it. This gossamer thread changes the roofless hut into a brighter home than the richest palace lacking it.

So with Christianity. What did it bring into the world? We must acknowledge that it altered no one thing. Poverty, sorrow, hunger, and thirst are as great to-day as before Jesus came. He lived and died, and no fact was changed. The world rolled on, and was wrecked. Men fought and died the same; but a new spirit was put into life, which made all things new, though it never changed them.

When I first visited the Luray Caves, it was my good fortune to come into a cavern where no human being had ever been; and, as the light of my candle fell on the mass of stalactites and stalagmites, a new world of beauty was revealed to us, though it had lain there in darkness the same for centuries, veiled from the eye of man. So Christ came, bearing in his hand the torch of a new spirit; and its light transfigured the world, lighting up the faces of old and young, and throwing a new glory over hills and wood,—ay, even the cross.

The world of art owes its existence to Christianity, for before Jesus came there was no background to human life. His life first gave it depth and tenderness and mystery, and showed that back of this confusion of earth lay the love of God; and men saw it, and everything was changed and made new. There have been other teachers, the great truths of Christianity had been uttered before; but there was something essentially different in Christ's person. Those houses and homes, the market-place, the lake, the synagogue, and the temple, were transformed as he entered. Men, women, and children sought him out to merely bask in his presence. When all lights were extinguished in the garden of Gethsemane, there was light in his face.

Now there is nothing new before us. These revelations in municipal affairs have occurred time and again. The services of the church are alike,—psalm and song and prayer; the sermons are alike. And yet how the Spirit can transform these empty forms into power, inspiration, and peace. We can save each other.

Before you are sorrow and joy, possibly poverty, certainly pain, surely death,—tremendous facts, awfully monotonous; and yet how life, by the Spirit, possesses simply endless variety! The soul is never repeated. The Spirit, by its mighty power, can transform your relation to each one of the monotonous certainties of human existence. "Behold, I make" the power of the eye. I make heaven or hell. Four men take clay from the same hole in the ground,—the one that a post may be planted, the other that the clay may be formed into art.

cles of domestic use; the third illustrates and decorates the same; and still another makes the clay eloquent as an eternal proof of the power of mind over matter. Yet it was the same clay, and the men looked much alike, and there was the awful monotony of toil in each case; but back of it was the mighty power of Spirit, making the first text a lie, showing that there is something new under the sun.—Baltimore American.

FOLK-FOODS IN MEXICO.

Most of the cultivated fruits of Mexico were introduced principally by the Franciscan monks, who established missions everywhere in the days immediately succeeding the conquest. They brought over peaches, apples, pears, plums, cherries, quinces, figs, dates, pomegranates, walnuts, olives, nectarines, apricots, paper-shelled walnuts, almonds, sugar-cane, coffee, Spanish grapes, oranges, and perhaps lemons and bananas, as well as horses, donkeys, cows, sheep, chickens, and goats, together with wheat, oats, and barley, and many vegetables. About 1581 the Jesuits entered upon missionary work in that country, and followed the rule established by the Franciscans. Both these bodies gave earnest attention to the study of native foods, and improved upon the cooking of the natives. Chocolate, which plays so important a part in our domestic economy to-day, was obtained from the Aztecs; and so were the tomato and the pineapple. The potato grows wild in the higher altitudes of Mexico, but has never attained, in the dietary of the people, the importance it merits. There is in existence a quaint volume entitled "A New Survey of the West Indies," by Thomas Gage, an English Dominican monk, who spent some fourteen years of his life in Guatemala and Mexico. He upbraids his brother monks for being addicted to the inordinate use of candied pineapple. The Carmelite nuns, who had convent schools for girls in nearly all towns of any size, seem to have been great cake and candy makers; and vestiges of their skill remain to our own day in the name of a Mexican candy much in favor, known as "carmencillo de leche." Perhaps our own toothsome caramels may perpetuate the experiments with chocolate of some gentle, discolored Caramel-ite, who now occupies a long-forgotten grave. . . .

The piñon and pecan, although indigenous to Mexico, may now be fairly classed among its cultivated foods. The pecan, which is said to be found in places from Wisconsin and Northern Virginia clear down to the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, is the best of all nuts, the almond not excepted. The Mexicans are very fond of a candy made from it with sugar caramel. This candy in appearance closely resembles our own ground-nut candy, which is also known to the Mexicans under the name of "dulce de cacahuete." The pecan-tree is one of the most beautiful of all that grow. It is tall, graceful, and umbrageous. Some of the most graceful are to be seen in the parks of San Antonio, Tex. One of the most interesting, historically considered, is still in full vigor in the old city of Monclova, in the Mexican State of Coahuila. The people there call it "el arbol del Padre" (the Priest's or the Father's tree), because, when the Spaniards had taken the patriot priest, Hidalgo, prisoner, and were carrying him off to Chihuahua to be executed, they passed through this old city with their prisoner, and remained here one day. Father Hidalgo wrapped himself in his cloak, and went to sleep under the branches of the pecan which records this incident in its name.

The fruit of the nopal, or tuna, is most agreeable to the taste, and might be mistaken by one ignorant of its true nature for a piece of preserved quince.

Not only is the fruit eaten: the large plate-shaped leaf is brought into use for both man and beast. Grated down into a coarse powder, after having been skinned, the meat of this leaf is added to soups to give a mucilaginous thickening. Travellers through the southern portions of Texas, and almost all parts of Mexico, can see in the earliest hours of the morning fantastic figures dancing about in the smoke and flames of fires kindled for the sole purpose of burning off the spines of the nopal, and letting draught oxen feed upon the leaves. Cattle, pigs, sheep, goats, and horses, running at large in the chaparral, do not wait for any such preparatory process, but take the plant as they find it. It is one of the sights of the Rio Grande to come suddenly upon a large, patriarchal white goat with beard and breast dyed a blood-red from the juice of the tuna, and nostrils filled with the thorns of the fruit and leaf. Indeed, so well known is this peculiarity of all domestic animals in that region, especially during seasons of great drouth, that butchers will not accept orders to supply beef tongues, saying frankly that the meat is so full of ligneous fibre that it would be impossible to carve it upon the table. . . .

Strawberries grow wild in the mountains, and are also carefully cultivated. The Mexican strawberry, as a rule, is of extremely delicious flavor; and growers have not fallen into our error of sacrificing taste and aroma to size and color.—Capt. J. G. Bourke in Journal of American Folk-lore.

Spirit of the Press.

The Boston Herald on Dr. Martineau:—

It was a happy thought on the part of the editor of the Christian Register to ask the friends of Dr. Martineau to give their impressions of the man and his work at his ninetieth birthday. Many of the persons invited to take a part in this symposium had known him personally, and speak from a familiar knowledge of the man; and it is plain from reading their tributes, which are at once an expression of friendship and indebtedness, that he has taken an uncommon hold of the strong men of this generation. The thinking men of this country have been indebted to him from the beginning of their serious studies; and, no matter what may be one's school of thought, he has been a beacon light that no one could ignore. Dr. Martineau is still in the full command of his faculties; and a letter written to Rev. Samuel May from London on the 11th of April refers to his age as pleasantly as if he were a younger man. It was a happy thought to bring the friends of Dr. Martineau together around his ninetieth birthday; and the pleasure which he will take in reading these tributes, all of which are hearty and honest, can be better imagined than described. It is seldom that a great writer and thinker has reached out to a wider circle of intellectual and spiritual influence; and in this country he has, perhaps, obtained a wider appreciation than among his own kith and kin.

The London Spectator, speaking of the probable effect on the English people of the pope's letter, says:—

What will be the result of the pope's letter on the English people? To far the greatest number, even of the best Christians among us, it will be equivalent to an assurance that the Roman Church persists, and must persist, in doctrines which have most profoundly puzzled and repelled us. To almost all of us, we hope, it will bring a cordial feeling that, after all, the pope is a good and a sincere and a very devout man, and no more the man of sin or anti-christ or the beast in Revelation than he is the direct mouthpiece of our Lord. It will, we think and hope, tend to produce a friendly and cordial relation between the Roman Catholic Church and the various English Protestant churches; but, as for tending to "the unity of the faith" in any other sense than that, we do not believe that it can have that effect at all. It will shake the passionate dread of the Roman Catholic which still exists in England; but it will tend to narrow the very great alienation of heart, much more than of mind, which still exists between us. And perhaps it may enable us to co-operate more heartily with the Catholics in all genuinely good work than for many centuries we have been able to co-operate. We think the letter must tend toward further extinguishing that really superstitious horror of the Catholic Church which still undoubtedly exists among us, though that horror has long been on the decline.

Literature.

BARTLETT'S SHAKSPEARE CONCORDANCE.*

Mr. John Bartlett has made his name and his work familiar in every library through the various editions of his "Familiar Quotations." The great labor he bestowed upon that compilation has saved thousands of hours to readers and writers who have the laudable habit of verifying their quotations. And now he has added indefinitely to that debt by this monumental work, which he tells us "has been prepared chiefly in the leisure taken from active duties, and from time to time has been delayed by other avocations." The Concordance was begun in 1876, and was prepared from the text of the Globe Edition of Shakspeare; but, as new readings have since been introduced into the texts of later issues, the manuscript has been revised and collated with the latest edition, 1891. Mr. Bartlett's work has thus the advantage of being founded on an approved text.

*A NEW AND COMPLETE CONCORDANCE OR VERBAL INDEX TO WORDS, PHRASES, AND PASSAGES IN THE DRAMATIC WORKS OF SHAKSPEARE. With a Supplementary Concordance to the Poems. By John Bartlett, A.M. London and New York: Macmillan & Co. $14.00.

In his "Shakspeare Phrase Book" Mr. Bartlett gave us an important and useful index of the phraseology of Shakspeare. That book, however, is but a little shallow compared with the magnificent full-rigged, three-decker achievement which he has now launched. We cannot forget the genuine affection and painstaking care which Mary Cowden Clarke put into her Shakspeare Concordance; but we must truly say that Mr. Bartlett has not only surpassed himself, but all other rivals and predecessors, in the comprehensiveness and fulness of his work. Mr. Gannett could hardly find a better example of the "blessedness of drudgery" than in this volume. In its preparation the author has spared no pains that industry and patient, accurate verification could confer.

The value of a book of this kind depends largely on the value of the text on which it is founded, and on the wisdom of its method and the accuracy of the work. In all these respects Mr. Bartlett's book will establish and hold its place as the greatest and best Shakspearean Concordance. The method adopted is that which will be most grateful to the user. It gives not merely the word sought, but so much of its setting that the reader has the word in the relation in which it is found. Thus, in most cases, he will be saved the necessity of looking at the text itself, because he has the full line or a pair of lines before him. To accomplish this has involved a great deal of extra labor, and has increased the size of the volume; but it is a feature which will be gratefully appreciated by those who use the book. Indeed, the fulness of its references constitute it a veritable volume of Shakspeare quotations, so that one may read column after column and page after page, and find them sparkling with glittering gems. We by no means suggest that; the best way to treat Shakspeare is to cut him up line by line, and distribute him word by word and phrase by phrase through a book of quotations. Nevertheless, how well the great dramatist could stand this form of treatment, which in this case is a tribute of affection! What golden nuggets of wisdom, what sparkling gems of thought, what fragrant suggestions, what striking pictures, are conveyed in a single sentence! And all this would be lost if, to save labor and room, Mr. Bartlett had cut off the quotation in the middle.

A comparison made on almost any page with the "Phrase Book" and with other concordances will show the greater completeness of this volume. Its absolute accuracy could only be verified, of course, by the comparison of many thousand references. But Mr. Bartlett's previous work in this direction, his painstaking diligence in proof-reading, and the valuable assistance of his wife, to whom the book is affectionately inscribed, are double assurances upon this point.

While the genius of Shakspeare shines most brilliantly in his plays taken in their integrity and unity of conception, yet it is easy to see how a student of the great master may find here material for a psychological study of Shakspeare suggested and promoted by the classification of words and ideas which are here marshalled. The student, for instance, who wishes to know what Shakspeare thought about "music" has before him a hundred and forty-four quotations,—eight under "musical" and twenty under "musician." Or, if he wishes to study the comparative frequency of words in Shakspeare's vocabulary, he will find nearly nineteen columns under the word "man," with about ninety to ninety-five quotations in a column, making over seven hundred references. And, though pronouns and conjunctions are not given with completeness, which would make the volume impracticable, there are select examples of these which show the students particular and interesting forms of usage. The volume is thus not only an indispensable companion to Shakspeare, but a valuable dictionary of the English language in Shakspearean times, and an important collation of historical and literary material.

AS OTHERS SAW HIM, A.D. 54. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—This "Retrospect" is unique among the various endeavors to set forth the true character of Jesus in a fictitious narrative. The nominal writer is Meshullam Ben Zadok, a scribe of the Jews at Alexandria, who is writing to Aglaophonos, physician of the Greeks at Corinth. The actual writer is a person well fitted for his task; for he is a scholar well acquainted with the early Christian literature, and he is at the same time one who knows how to put his thought into good literary form. He takes a novel line, in that he quotes a great many times from the sayings attributed to Jesus in the Apocryphal writings. It can be, however, that he imagines that we have in these an earlier tradition than that of the New Testament writings; and his doing this seems to be purely fanciful, except as he may seek in this way a fresher element to enhance the interest of his story. This opens with what the harmonists call "the first cleansing of the temple," when they would reconcile John's placing of that event at the beginning of Jesus' public ministry with the Synoptists' placing it at the end. With equal perversity the death of Jesus is placed, as in John, before the eating of the Passover, though it must be conceded that it is the judgment of Schürer and other able critics that the Fourth Gospel representation is more intrinsically likely than that of the Synoptics. Various chapters present the course of Jesus' life in an extremely sympathetic manner. In a chapter called "The Great Refusal" this is represented as his refusal to make himself the political leader of the Zealots. There is an epilogue which is at once a eulogium on Jesus and a criticism on his course. The criticism is that he reserved his gentleness for his immediate disciples and lashed the public generally with scorpions, and that he failed to interest himself in the hopes dearest to the Jewish heart. As for his teachings, they were much the same as those of the great Hillel. The book carries with it an impression of reality far and away superior to the representations of the popular theology.

ESSAYS ON SCANDINAVIAN LITERATURE. By Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—When Prof. Boyesen tells us in his preface that, having planned a history of Scandinavian literature twenty years ago, his studies soon carried him far beyond the scope of his original intention, it would seem that that intention must have been extremely modest. For, though the account of Ibsen was extended to a book of 317 pages, and we have here a volume of 288 pages, the two together do not seem extravagant for a history and criticism of the literature of Norway and Sweden and Denmark. More than one-third of the present volume is taken up with the account of Björnsterne Björnson, which is extremely sympathetic, but not without objections to some of Björnson's more daring specifications. Those for whom he writes will be apt to think that he passes too lightly over the tales, and dwells too much on the dramas. We are sorry that he cannot speak more warmly of the translation in the complete set of Björnson's tales that is now being published by Macmillan. Kielland, the next subject, is, like Björnson, a Norwegian, one of whose novels is built very much on the lines of Daudet's "L'Évangéliste." Prof. Boyesen thinks that Kielland has outdone Daudet. He may have done so, and yet not have done anything very good, seeing that "L'Évangéliste" is the poorest book that Daudet has published. Jonas Lie (pronounced Lee) is yet another Norwegian, a realist, whose stories have been translated already into half a dozen languages. Turning to Denmark, Hans Christian Andersen's works are warmly praised; but his character is not equally commended. For jealous egotism he has had few superiors. A brief chapter suffices for contemporary Danish literature; and chapters on the Swedes, Georg Brandes, and Esaias Tegner grandly bring up the rear.

THE BREATH OF GOD: A SKETCH HISTORICAL, CRITICAL, AND LOGICAL OF THE DOCTRINE. By Rev. Frank Hallam, author of the "Supreme Rite," etc. New York: Thomas Whittaker.—This book has a motto on the title-page, but not the one it should. The one it should have is:—

"Chip, chop, chain!
Give a thing, and take it back again."

For what it does is to undo, chapter by chapter, the traditional conception of the Bible, and then, so far as possible, rhetorically restore what has been critically destroyed, trying by the use of big, vague words to negative the impression made by the critical investigation. It is a sorry business; and, to make it worse, the form in which the book is cast is very bad. The Bible, to begin with, is called "King Liber"; and then we have a chapter on "His Courtiers," and another on "His Critics," and another on "His Blemishes," etc. There is much admirable matter in these chapters; but the natural effect of it is quite spoiled by the chapters called "His Divinity," "His Exaltation," and "His Power." In these two there is a good deal of truth; but it is so thickly overlaid with big, swelling words that it is hardly visible. Stated in the vernacular, the meaning of the book would be acceptable to the most radical Unitarian; but what it can do for the intellectual confusion of common, every-day people it does, and no mistake. The lamp is well trimmed, but it is hid under a measure that miserably obscures its light.

OFF LYNNPORT LIGHT. By Augusta Campbell Watson, author of "The Old Harbor Town," etc. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.—We have here an interesting story, both as to its personal developments and its setting in a mingled atmosphere of sea and shore. It would be easy to indicate the course of true love in the story, and of that not so true, and of some other things collateral and incidental. But to do so would be no advantage to those who have read the book; and it might deter others from reading it, seeing that there are those who do not like to know the course and outcome of a story in advance. Therefore, we content ourselves with saying that, while in no way remarkable, the book is one to which the reader of many novels, who does not expect too much from them, can safely go for a few hours' entertainment. The leading character is developed with much delicacy and beauty, and through sympathy with her sorrow and her triumph the reader's heart will be touched in the right way.

CIVIC CHRISTIANITY. By William Prall, S.T.D., Ph.D., Rector of St. John's Church, Detroit, Mich. New York: Thomas Whittaker, 2 & 3 Bible House.—Here is another straw to show which way the wind is blowing. Some of the chapter headings will make the direction still more clear. For example, "The Marks of the Messiah"; "Christ and the Multitudes"; "The Alienation of the Masses,"—i.e., from the churches; "The Prevention of Crime"; "Common Honesty"; "Good Citizenship"; "Good Government." There is little that is attractive in the literary form of these discourses, but their downright sincerity and earnestness must have prevented this fact from making any injurious impression. The more of this preaching, the better, even if it drives out of the churches those whose ideal gospel has about as little to do with religion as with politics.

CUSTOMS AND FASHIONS IN OLD NEW ENGLAND. By Alice Morse Earle. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.—Mrs. Earle's book was published a year or more ago, but it is not one of those whose value and interest are confined to a single season. In successive chapters she tells us of child-life in the early colonial days,—and we shiver even now with sympathy for the poor little Puritan babies,—of courtship and marriage customs, of homes in various aspects, of holidays, sports, and many other phases of life here in the seventeenth century. Many a reader will find his own ancestors serving as illustration; and, probably, nearly all will agree with the sentiment expressed on the title-page, "Let us thank God for having given us such ancestors; and let each successive generation thank him not less fervently for being one step further from them in the march of ages."

DAILY MESSAGES FROM THE KING BY HIS MESSENGERS TO HIS CHILDREN. Selected and arranged by S. R. Z. London: Marcus Ward & Co. $1.—This Year Book contains quotations from the Bible and from religious writers, both in prose and verse, carefully selected and arranged. No book seems to us quite equal to "Daily Strength for Daily Needs"; and yet this is full of simple, tender, helpful sayings, that may well influence and strengthen. There is no index of authors; but we note quotations from W. C. Gannett, Dr. Martineau, and Mrs. Utter. There is an introduction by Mrs. Sangster, who is venturesome enough to assert that not all of the "Messages" here are from those "who know the King," but who think God may use even these instruments for his praise.

CHILDREN'S SERVICES WITH HYMNS AND SONGS, WITH ETHICS FOR THE YOUNG. By W. L. Sheldon. Edited by Rev. A. W. Oxford. London: T. Fisher Unwin.—The third edition of this little book is improved by the addition of seven new services and a change of about seventy hymns, and by including the "Responsive Exercises" which Mr. Sheldon prepared for use in the Ethical Society of St. Louis, and which ought to be used as a catechism and committed to memory. We are glad to note here some of the services of "Unity Festival" and "Unity Services and Songs" which have proved themselves exceptionally fine for the use of Sunday-schools, whether considered from the literary, musical, or devotional point of view.

SECOND BOOK IN PHYSIOLOGY AND HYGIENE. By J. H. Kellogg, M.D. American Book Company.—This book is a very practical, very complete presentation of facts that ought to be studied and understood, not only by students, but by all who are interested in knowing how to keep themselves or others well, especially such chapters as those on "Nutrition," "Alcoholic Drinks and Tobacco," "Bathing," "Clothing," etc., ought to be familiar to every mother or to any one who has the charge of young children. Those portions of the work devoted to anatomy have been made as untechnical as possible.

VEXILLA REGIS. Compiled by L. B. S. Boston: Berkeley Updike. $1.25.—This book of religious selections takes its title from the first word of the old Passion-tide hymn, "Vexilla Regis prodeunt," best known, perhaps, by Dr. Neale's translation. The range of writers from which the compiler has drawn is very wide and inclusive, and the book deserves commendation. Dr. Donald says of it, "The best of the best is here,—acute, prescient, interpretative, illuminative." It is beautifully printed and bound, a good specimen of the Renaissance in book-making.

HOW THE REPUBLIC IS GOVERNED. By Noah Brooks. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents.—This little book gives in handy form and small space much useful information. The Constitution, the various departments of government, and many facts about public lands, pensions, patents, etc., are given clearly, but compactly; and an index increases the usefulness of the book.

Miscellaneous.

Macmillan & Co. have issued a "Marcella" in paper edition. Price 50 cents.

A "Laboratory Manual in Elementary Biology," designed for preparatory and high schools, has been prepared by Emanuel R. Boyer. It aims to give a knowledge of the leading characteristics of the chief branches of animals and plants. (D. C. Heath & Co.)

No. 13 of "Werner's Reading and Recitation Series," compiled by Francis P. Richardson, contains about sixty selections, humorous, pathetic, and dramatic. They are of varying merit, but all adapted to the purpose of the book; and few are already familiar. Edgar S. Werner, 108 East 16th Street, New York.

A recent publication in Heath's Modern Language Series is "Kleine Geschichten," by Richard von Volkmann, Baumbach, and Ertl, with notes and vocabulary prepared by Dr. Wilhelm Bernhardt. The four tales selected are very easy, and may be used either for beginners or for sight translation for older scholars.

WILLIAM C. GANNETT.

The House Beautiful.

Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. [In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents.]

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition on rich, tinted paper, silk stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as Related to the Inward Life. By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D., Author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. Cloth, red edges, 50 cents; full gilt, $1.00.

Contents: 1. A Wayside Prophet; 2. The Joy in Harvest; 3. Monuments of the Leaves; 4. The Mission of the Snowflake; 5. Down to the Lake.

The third volume in the cloth-bound series of "Life" books,—"A Child of Nature," by Rev. Dr. Marion D. Shutter, is already meeting large and favorable notice. The book is so handsome externally that many, seeing the 50-cent edition, at first suppose it to be the $1.00 edition. In its contents, the book, while entirely different from either of its predecessors in the series, is certain to meet with a no less cordial reception. "The graceful little volume," as the Boston Traveler calls it, has much of interest and much of meaning for all who shall read it, and, from cover to cover through its 111 pages, presents vividly, by tender and wise and picturesque object-teaching, "the message" of Mother Nature "that is ready for the human heart."

THE OLD TRUNDLE-BED.

Oh, the old trundle-bed where I slept when a boy!
What canopied king might not covet the joy,
The glory, and peace of that slumber of mine,
Like a long, gracious rest in the Bosom divine?
The quaint, homely couch, hidden close from the light,
But daintily drawn from its hiding at night,—
Oh, a nest of delight, from the foot to the head,
Was the queer little, dear little, old trundle-bed!
Oh, the old trundle-bed, where I, wondering, saw
The stars through the window, and listened with awe
To the sigh of the winds, as they tremblingly crept
Through the trees where the robins so restlessly slept;
Where I heard the low, murmurous chirp of the wren
And the katydid listlessly chirrup again,
Till my fancies grew faint, and were drowsily led Through the maze of the dreams of the old trundle-bed.
Oh, the old trundle-bed! Oh, the old trundle-bed!
With its plump, little pillow and old-fashioned spread,
Its snowy-white sheets, and the blankets above,
Smoothed down and tucked round with the touches of love;
The voice of my mother to lull me to sleep
With the old fairy stories my memories keep Still fresh as the lilies that bloom o'er the head
Once bowed o'er my own in the old trundle-bed!
—James Whitcomb Riley, in the Interior.

POLLY'S INTELLIGENCE OFFICE.

Polly was at the window, sewing, making a calico apron. The stitches were not very small, neither was the hem all of the same width; but the apron was serviceable. Polly had an anxious look,—“worried,” her grandma would have said. Every few moments she stopped sewing, and looked very earnestly out of the window, where there was nothing new for her to see,—only a barn, an orchard, and pleasant meadow bank beyond. The child was not thinking of the outlook, but of her own cares and responsibilities.

The day before Polly had been made president of a mission band. Sally Tucker had held that office, but, being discouraged, had resigned.

The band had voted to contribute a certain sum to support a little girl in India. The little girl was alive at last accounts, but the band had not sent a single penny to keep her alive.

Polly's father said, “It was a heavy contract for so slim a girl,” but was real good; for he became “an outside silent member,” and paid one dollar. Polly's mother “joined” and paid fifty cents. Grandma wouldn't put her name down, but gave forty cents.

All this was encouraging, but Polly wanted the “s'ciety” to earn money.

As she sewed and pondered ways and means, Mrs. Samson, their nearest neighbor, “slipped over” to “sit a spell.” Polly thought it queer that Mrs. Samson never went anywhere, but always “slipped” to places.

She began, as usual, to talk about her old aches and one or two new ones she had picked up, or, rather, that had picked her up.

Then she told how lonesome it was to live all “stark” alone, and her intention to find a likely family to take her house and board her,—a family who would be in early nights, and not “mallhack the wood-work.”

“Now, of an evening,” she added, “it is awful lonesome; and I'd like to slip into meeting, but I'm clean beat out doing my chores. There,” she said mournfully, “I must go. Peter Snow has come with my milk, and there is Thomas a-sitting on the window-sill a-crying.”

Thomas was a very black cat with large yellow eyes, who was indeed crying severely, if one could judge by the way he opened his mouth. “Why not stay to tea with us?” Polly's mother said kindly.

Mrs. Samson wished she could; but, “if Thomas was nothing but a cat, she set by him, 'cause he'd been poor Seleny's when a kitten. And he was particular about his meals. He always had a drink of milk soon as it came; and then, if she didn't look out, one of the Higgins tribe, like as not, would steal the milk, can and all, first thing she knew.”

Polly pitied Mrs. Samson, because it was lonely with only a cat for company. To be sure, Thomas was very handsome, and could sing; but he was like some folks: he liked to sing away from home.

Polly had often done errands for their neighbor, and was trusted about her house. So, although she didn't exactly want to, she offered to go over and see to the fire, Thomas, and the milk-can.

After some polite words, Mrs. Samson let Polly go; and she sat back in a comfortable chair with quite a smile on her face.

Polly found considerable to do in her neighbor's kitchen.

The floor needed sweeping, the table-cloth was on crooked. Then Thomas was to be noticed as well as fed.

When she left, really the kitchen had a much more tidy appearance; for Polly had a talent for “righting things.”

The next forenoon Mrs. Samson “slipped over” with a plate of “caraways” for Polly, as pay for her service. She sat quite a “spell,” telling what a handy child Polly was, how much she made her think of Seleny, and how easy she could “grub along” if she (Mrs. Samson) had her to “chore about.”

After their neighbor went home, Polly sat thinking.

“Mother,” she presently said, standing by the table where her mother was cutting out work, “do you believe Mrs. Samson would be willing to pay me money if I'd work for her?”

“I don't know, dear. You could ask her.”

“I've been thinking”—

“Well, dear, what about?”

“You know we must earn money for that little girl in India, and p'r'aps I could that way.”

“A good idea, Polly; but you must not expect great pay. You could go over and have a talk with Mrs. Samson.”

With some misgivings Polly ventures. Mrs. Samson is knitting, and Thomas is on his cushion in the sun. At once she plunges into the subject, telling all about the mission band and the little girl in India, and how they must take care of her, 'cause they'd promised.

When the whole was told, Mrs. Samson was pleased with the idea of having Polly to “chore” for her, and said it would be “agreeable.”

Before Polly went home, Mrs. Samson said she would like to hear more about the missionary business, and would like to see the papers about it. The pay was left to Polly to decide upon.

That night the little girl wrote in her best hand,—

“I will work for you for five cents purr hour.”

This document she showed her father.

He thought it reasonable, and asked if Thomas (the cat) “had any interest in the business.” A strange question, Polly thought; but papa was funny.

The apron we see Polly working on was to be worn “at service.”

The little girl did her best at Mrs. Samson's. She washed and wiped dishes, swept the kitchen floor, picked over raisins, and hung out a few things Mrs. Samson “dabbled out,” besides feeding the hens. She earned ten cents, and went home well pleased.

The next afternoon that Polly worked out a Mrs. Snow came in to Mrs. Samson's. She “ran in.” As Polly worked, the visitor watched her with interest, and in time heard about the band and their pledge to the little girl in India. Before she left, she asked Polly to come to her house and take care of her Sam Ellis,—a baby who was “so worrisome she couldn't set a stitch.” Mrs. Samson suggested that some other “bänder” take that job, because, “as a rule, presidents didn't work much, but directed and oversaw others.”

Polly and her mother talked the matter over, and Mrs. West advised the calling of an extra meeting to consider the question.

That night Polly wrote out a few simple rules for the conduct of members of the band who were detailed for service.

1. You must not be noisy, open drawers, or peek into closets.
2. Must not tell things you hear. (Mrs. West's suggestion.)
3. Must not ask for something to eat.

The members of the band heartily approved of going out to service, with one or two exceptions. Indeed, they were so anxious to work that five were eager to take care of worrisome Sam Ellis Snow.

The pastor of the church mentioned the matter very pleasantly at a prayer-meeting, and gave “Miss Polly West's” name as the one to whom application must be made if one wished such help.

So it came about that Polly kept an “Intelligence Office.”

While this was new, it worked well. But the children grew tired of being good—somewhat as older people do—and of working so hard for a little girl they never saw.

Polly, besides working for her neighbor, became nursery maid to Sam Ellis, the other children being tired of his “teething tantrums.” The older people also lost what little interest they had felt, which caused even stout-hearted Polly to become discouraged.

About this time Mrs. Samson decided to have a tea company.

Polly was engaged to assist, at eight cents an hour, in the preparation. The best parlor was opened, aired, and dusted. The room was so seldom used that Thomas availed himself of the opportunity of seeing it, and walked in.

He sat down on the best rug in front of the fireplace to watch proceedings. While Mrs. Samson laid the fire, she told Polly how long she was “a-drawing in that mat, and the cat in the centre was really Thomas's portrait,” and what a piece of work it was to have his ears mates. “One would lop; and, as to his eyes! Mercy on us! I'm a-fire!” she screamed, as she ran toward the door, her thin calico dress all in a blaze. “Polly! Thomas!” she cried in her fright.

In an instant Polly pulled up the rug, portrait and all,—Thomas rolling over on the hearth,—and wrapped it as well as she could about the terrified old lady.

“Lemme go, Poll West!” screamed Mrs. Samson; but Polly held it about her until the fire was out, then, with a moan of pain, fell to the floor.

“My dear little girl!” she heard, as if some one a great way off was talking to her; and, when she looked up, it was into her father's face. Her mother and Dr. Clarke were doing something to her hands.

Near by was Mrs. Samson, telling the neighbors how it all happened.

Little Polly's willing hands were sadly burned, but Mrs. Samson's life was saved.

Mrs. Samson was of the kind who could never do two things at once. In her desire to tell how “Thomas's portrait was drawn in her best rug,” she put a lighted match to her dress instead of to the shavings.

Only the day before Polly had read in her Youth's Companion a few simple rules for emergencies. Otherwise she would not have known what to do.

There were days and nights of suffering for Polly, but the band flourished.

The Sunday after the accident the minister talked in the evening to Polly's band. He urged them to be faithful in small things, saying: “Polly West was braver when she worked day after day for love of the little girl in India than when she saved the life of her friend and neighbor. The work required patience and faithfulness, the saving of this life called for courage.”

When Polly was well, Mrs. Samson had the band to tea, Thomas included. Then and there she joined, paying ten dollars. Others in the church sent money, so that it was a serious question the children had to decide.

“Shall we support one little girl five years, or five little girls one year?”—The Examiner.

A HEROINE INDEED.

A fifteen-year-old heroine, Lillian McMullen, sacrificed her own life to save two children in her charge, in crossing the ice of Peconic Bay, Long Island, a short time ago. Into a hole in the ice covered by snow she went down suddenly, and called to the little ones to “keep back,” with the big dog that accompanied them. Hurrying on instead, hoping to help her, the two little girls themselves plunged through the ragged ice into the water. By one almost superhuman effort after another, Lillian at last succeeded in raising the younger child, eight years old, on to ice firm enough for the dog to grasp its clothing and drag it on to safety.

Time after time, till her strength was exhausted, the young heroine made the same efforts for the older girl, the ice continually breaking away under the double weight. At length, when she could lift no longer, she said to the child: “I'll hold on fast. You climb up over me. Hurry up! I can't last much longer.” Effort after effort failed. “Make one more trial,” she said; and the ten-year-old girl managed to get her shoulders above water. The dog seized her and tugged. Lillian made one last effort to push the child up. It was successful. Then she made one final endeavor to save herself; but, chilled and worn out, her hands slipped from the ice edge. And she went down to come up no more.

There is mourning for the faithful orphan girl in the home of Superintendent George Gordon at North Haven, whose children she saved; and, beyond question, her memory will be revered as that of a saint by those two children and those to whom they are precious. But the splendor of the self-sacrifice, in awful suffering, in the presence of such a death, the resolution, the courage, the devotion, of Lillian McMullen, entitle her to have her name and the story of her deed told wherever the qualities of heroism and saintly nobility are held in honor.—*Scranton (Pa.) THE NILE.

There is a pretty legend, worth telling, of the cutting of the Khalig. Amr, the Muhammedan general, took Cairo in A.D. 640. Long before then there had been a heathen ceremony, and a virgin was yearly sacrificed to the god of the river. When the season came round, Amr was called upon, as usual, to sacrifice the girl. He sternly refused. That year the Nile flood was a failure. You can fancy how the indignant heathen population must have raged at the invader, and said, “We warned you what would happen if you didn't propitiate the river god.” Cannot we fancy, also, how Amr's wild Arab soldiers must have had their faith sorely tried, and how they must have felt puzzled as to whether in this strange new country, with all those demon-built temples and pyramids, obelisks and sphinxes, it might not be as well to make friends of the local gods? Could Allah really help them here? Again the Nile flood came round. This time, surely, Amr would sacrifice the girl and save the land. No, he would not. The people rose in rebellion. Amr stood firm. But he wrote to the Kalif Omar for orders,—Omar, whose name, you will remember, has come down in history as the destroyer of the Alexandrian library. Omar approved of his conduct, but sent him a paper to throw into the Nile. On the paper was written, “From Abd Allah Omar, Prince of the Faithful, to the Nile of Egypt. If thou flow of thine own accord, flow not; but, if it be Allah, the one, the mighty, who causeth thee to flow, then we implore him to make thee flow.” Amr threw the paper into the water, and the Nile rose forthwith exactly as it was wanted. Since that day no girl has been sacrificed; but a pillar of earth is yearly left to be washed away in the middle of the canal, called the bride or the girl.—Littell's Living Age.

THE EMPRESS OF GERMANY.

The Empress of Germany rises early and breakfasts with the emperor every morning at eight o'clock. At nine she is in the nursery, superintending the baby's toilet, arranging with the nurse for the walks or drives to be taken by the children, and always decides what clothes are to be worn by the young princes. At ten o'clock the empress receives her housekeeper, and attends to the luncheon and dinner menus, always including one or two favorite dishes of her husband's. A few moments every morning are spent in the linen room, and not a sheet or a duster is given out except under her direction. At 11 she goes riding with the emperor or walking with two of her boys. Luncheon comes at 1; and all the children, except the baby, are present at this meal, which is conducted without much ceremony. After luncheon the emperor and empress play with the children for an hour.

The empress receives from 3 until 5, and in this time considers charitable cases. There are sometimes as many as fifty guests invited to dinner, which is at six o'clock, and lasts an hour. One servant waits upon two persons, and every little detail of the service is closely watched by the empress. She goes every night with the emperor to see the children; and, if there is the slightest illness among them, she sits up all night, and sees that the doctor's directions are carried out. In the nursery she wears a soft white flannel wrapper and a large apron. Her early education was very simple; and, although she understands French and English, she does not care for foreign fashions or literature. Until her marriage she had not read a novel. Her bedroom and sitting-room are simply furnished in blue. A large allowance is made for her personal expenses, yet she makes with her own hands all the birthday gifts for her own and the emperor's numerous family.—Pall Mall Budget.

A BIRD-OALL.

Bird of the azure wing,
Bird of the silver note,
Come! for it is the spring,
And high the white clouds float.
Come, bluebird, come!

Bird of the crimson breast,
Robin,—we miss you well;
Robin, we love you best.
Come! for the cowpicks swell.
Come, robin, come!

Bird of the circling flight
'Gainst twilight's pearly skies,
Soft call the winds of night,
Lonely the water cries,—
Come, swallow, come!
—Sara M. Chatfield, in St. Nicholas.

BLUEBIRDS.

It has been stated that the number of bluebirds returning to New England this year is unusually small. In order to ascertain the cause of this great loss, a letter was sent to Mr. R. Ridgway, curator in the Department of Birds, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, asking what had become of the bluebirds. Mr. Ridgway is not only scientifically interested; but he has a warm humane regard for all bird-life. He has sent us the following letter, with a pathetic description of the sufferings and death of our beautiful songsters:—

It affords me pleasure to answer the questions concerning the destruction of bluebirds for the market in Washington and by the so-called "blizzard" of February last.

Regarding the killing of bluebirds for the market, I have no reason to believe the practice has been discontinued. As many as two or three hundred have been seen at one time in the game-stalls, though not publicly exposed. In fact, being carefully plucked, the species could not be identified except by a person very familiar with birds.

The past winter was one of wide-spread disaster to bird-life, particularly to those kinds whose food consisted in large part of insects and small fruits or berries. The insect-eating species were, of course, deprived of their food supply by the direct destruction of the latter. The berry-eaters, on the other hand, were deprived of their food by the heavy snow-fall which covered it. Such, at least, was the case with the bluebirds in this vicinity. The bluebird wintered about Washington in larger numbers than I ever knew it to before, no less than twenty-one individuals making their headquarters on my little half-acre in the suburbs,—doubtless because of the shelter afforded by an eight-roomed bird-house; also, on account of a supply of berries produced by the hedge of Japan honeysuckle which partly enclosed the place. Just before the "blizzard" of February 7 to 9 (inclusive) the supply of these berries was exhausted. February 10 I picked up from the snow in my yard seven dead bluebirds, which had evidently died of starvation, their stomachs being completely empty and their bodies greatly emaciated. Not a living bluebird has been either seen or heard by me in that section of the district since that time, though I have been told of a very few being seen by persons living farther from the city. During the latter part of February or early part of March, while I was absent in Florida, the English sparrows took possession of my bird-house, and, in order to make room for their nests, were obliged to remove the dead bluebirds which were inside. They actually dragged out nine, dropping them to the ground beneath. On April 2, observing that the sparrows were building in the box, and being sure there were no bluebirds about, I cut down the pole. Examining the box, I found two of the compartments occupied by sparrows' nests, and from three of the remainder extracted five more dead bluebirds, one hole containing three. Thus, in all, twenty-one bluebirds died from starvation on my place alone; and I have no doubt that the destruction of this species has been very great throughout the region affected by the great storm, or, at least, where the snowfall was so great as to cover the greater part of their food supply.

Farther South, where there was less snow and a greater abundance of berries, the bluebirds escaped. I found them very abundant in Florida, although swallows and other essentially insectivorous birds had died of starvation in great numbers. I am satisfied, however, that the bluebirds there observed are residents (they were evidently nesting or about to do so); and, consequently, we cannot hope to have our Northern stock replenished from that source. There are, however, undoubtedly, a few left throughout the Middle States; and, therefore, unless these few survivors perish before they have a chance to breed, we may reasonably expect an increase which will in due time restore the species to its normal numbers.

A BROTHER'S RESCUE.

A thrilling story of German heroism at sea, which goes far to offset some of the reports regarding the loss of the "Elbe," comes from Schleswig-Holstein. One stormy morning last week a fishing village was awakened by a gunshot off the coast. Hastening to the beach, the people saw a ship wrecked on a reef a mile away. The crew were in the rigging. A life-boat was run out; but Harro, the leader of the crew, was absent.

Eight men, however, rowed out to the wreck. The crew was got into the life-boat, with the exception of one, who was lashed high up on a mast. He was half frozen; and, as the storm was increasing and the life-boat overloaded, it was decided that he could not be taken off. When the life-boat returned to the shore, Harro had arrived. He asked whether every one had been saved, and was told that one remained.

"I will fetch him," said Harro. "Will you go with me?"

The men refused, saying that it was impossible.

"Then I will go alone," cried Harro, and sprang into the life-boat. At this moment his mother came running down, and begged him not to venture out, reminding him that both his father and his brother Uwe had been drowned. Uwe was his youngest brother; and, as he had not been heard from for years, he was supposed to be dead.

"For love of me," Harro's mother begged, "don't go!"

"But the man on the mast!" exclaimed Harro. "Are you sure he has no mother to mourn his death?"

Harro's mother said no more, and her son and four other men set out for the wreck, which was now quite under water. The waves were so furious that it was difficult to approach. At last the life-boat reached it, and Harro climbed the mast and fetched the half-frozen man down. He was laid in the bottom of the life-boat, and Harro bent over him and remained so until the boat was so near shore that his voice could be heard. Then he waved his cap, and shouted,—

"Tell my mother we have saved Uwe!"

A WATCHMAKER.

The late Aaron Dennison, who has been styled "the father of American watchmaking," was a man of an unusually sweet spirit. He was interested in his work not merely for its own sake, but for the benefits resulting to his fellow-man. Often he worked late into the night, so late that his loving wife would go and beg him to "wait until to-morrow." One night she said to him: "Are you not going to bed at all? What are you doing?" And he turned and slowly answered, "I am trying to make it possible for every poor man to have a watch,"—a result which he very nearly accomplished.—Independent.

HAGENBECK'S ANIMALS.

Herr Carl Hagenbeck, the animal collector and trainer of Hamburg, has had forty years' experience of wild beasts. Hagenbeck, Sr., was in the fish trade; and in 1848 he bought a lot of live seals which the fishermen had caught in the mouth of the Elbe. He took the seals to Berlin, and there exhibited them. Four years later a whaler brought from Spitzbergen a large polar bear, which Hagenbeck the elder bought for 350 thalers; and the animal was exhibited at 10 cents admission. An old striped hyena was added, together with other animals which different vessels brought in the course of the year; and out of this modest beginning arose the great establishment which at the present time possesses a larger, more varied, and more valuable collection of elephants, hippopotami, lions, tigers, panthers, jaguars, pumas, hyenas, wolves, camels, kangaroos, snakes, alligators, crocodiles, monkeys, ostriches, gazelles, llamas, etc., than that owned by any zoölogical society in the world. A vast range of buildings is used for the stabling of these animals; and a large circus is utilized for the training of the elephants, horses, and wild beasts. A gigantic cage in the open air is called the "Monkeys' Paradise," to which entrance is gained by a number of doors which the monkeys open and close themselves, passing from their warm quarters inside to the outer air as they please, even in the hardest frosts.—London Chronicle.

A TRUE OAT STORY.

A Wakefield family who reside in Magnolia during the summer, when they removed to Magnolia last June, took with them their pet cat; but pussy did not like the roar and dash of old ocean, but sighed for her home by the placid waters of "Lake Quannapowitt." She disappeared, and was not seen again all summer. The family returned to their Wakefield home about the middle of September. They had been at home about two weeks, when one morning the daughter of the house was in the basement and heard a cat mew; and, lo! at the window was her darling pet cat, that she had long mourned as dead! It could not be. Where did she come from? It must be a strange cat closely resembling "Peanuts" (so called because of her fondness for the article).

"Well," said the mother, "there is one sure test. 'Don,' the house dog, will know his old playmate." Don was called, and the recognition was mutual. They both seemed delighted to meet again. It was evident the cat had travelled all the way from Magnolia to Wakefield, through the woods of Magnolia, Manchester, Beverly, over Beverly bridge, Salem streets, Peabody, Lynnfield, found Wakefield,—how did she know it to be Wakefield?—and had gone up to her old home near the lake. I never saw a creature so delighted to find her young mistress and the other members of the family. What guided her over so many miles? Was it animal instinct?—Our Dumb Animals.

RECLAIMED FROM DEATH.

The Terror of Man Thwarted.

In the Grasp of that Dread Disease, Consumption.—Life Given Back.—Almost Miraculous.

Fortunately, perhaps, the Consumptive does not realize his own condition. His is a disease of continual waste until he meets a death that is in reality one of starvation.

It is now generally conceded that this disease is incurable,—that is, by any known medicine. Change of climate, or some life-infusing food that will give new flesh, blood, and strength, and induce the various organs of the body to assume their normal functions,—this is the only hope.

The only way to do this effectually is to give the patient Bovinine, that great raw food product, the greatest concentration of the life-giving elements of raw beef known to modern science. In this connection the results obtained by Dr. J. H. Head of Atlanta, Ga., in the treatment of a case of consumption, are interesting.

Dr. Head relates briefly how a man about thirty-five years of age came to him for treatment. He had lost forty pounds in weight in six months; he suffered with a bad cough and experienced severe night sweats; he was unable to do any work; most of his family had died of consumption, and on examination his right lung was found to be seriously affected, and as the doctor remarked, "He was in a good way to have an early funeral."

But note what happened. He was given Bovinine. In two weeks he had gained sever pounds, his appetite had returned, he was able to do a good day's work, and most of the distressing symptoms had vanished; and at the time of writing the doctor felt sure of a complete cure.

This is but one of many similar cases. Bovinine will give new life and strength, make new blood and flesh, stop waste, ward off disease, and turn the current of life's river again into its natural channel. Give it one trial while there is yet hope.

SCHOOL OF APPLIED ETHIOS.

The complete programme of the fourth summer session of the School of Applied Ethics, which has just been issued, offers an important and attractive list of subjects and lecturers. The session is to be held, as heretofore, at Plymouth, Mass., a town rich in historic associations, which, with its opportunities for sea-bathing and its close proximity to Boston, make it admirably adapted for such a summer gathering.

The session begins Monday, July 8, and continues five weeks. There will be four departments,—Economics, Ethics, Education, and History of Religions. The following are some of the subjects to be treated.

In the Department of Economics Prof. Clark of Amherst is to give five lectures on "The Relation of Economics and Politics"; Prof. Adams of the University of Michigan, a course on "The Relation of Government to Industry" and another on "Taxation: Its Political, Industrial, and Social Significance"; Prof. Jenks of Cornell is to make a "Comparative Study of Industrial Legislation"; Prof. Hadley of Yale considers "The Misunderstandings about Economic Terms"; and Prof. Gould, lecturer in Johns Hopkins University, and recently appointed Professor of Statistics in the University of Chicago, gives five lectures on "Industrial Labor in Europe and the United States."

In the Department of Ethics Prof. Felix Adler is to give a course of lectures on "The Ethical Aspect of Various Labor Problems," such as "Boycotts," "Strikes," "Arbitration," "Socialism in the Family," "Trades-unionism," etc.; Mr. Stimson, a prominent lawyer of Boston, gives a course on "The Effect of Modern Economic Development upon the Interpretation of the Law"; Mr. Sheldon of St. Louis lectures on "Methods of Social Reform"; and a course on "The Referendum in Europe and the United States" is announced.

In the Department of Education a week is to be devoted to various subjects relating to the education of women, and another week to the organization of education in its different aspects. Ten prominent educators are to give lectures in this department.

The Department of History of Religions will be devoted to a study of some religious tendencies of the day. "Tendencies of Thought in the Different Churches" will be presented by Prof. Nash of the Cambridge Episcopal Theological School, Rabbi David Philipson of Cincinnati, Dr. Henry Hartshorne of the Society of Friends of Philadelphia, Rev. S. M. Crothers (Unitarian) of Cambridge, Rev. H. L. Wayland, editor of the Examiner, and Dr. A. E. Dunning, editor of the Congregationalist, and others; "The Relation of Religion to Recent Psychology and Philosophy," by Prof. Ladd of Yale University; "Religion in Literature in Different Countries since 1850," by Prof. Lovett of the University of Chicago, Prof. Huff of the University of Vermont, and Profs. Francke and Baker of Harvard University; "The Problem of Church and State in France, Germany, Italy, England, and the United States," by Rev. Dr. Wayland, Prof. Emerton of the Harvard Divinity School, Prof. Cohn of Columbia College, and Prof. Marsh of Harvard.

A series of Sunday afternoon lectures by distinguished speakers will be one of the attractive features of the session.

The detailed programme may be had by any one upon application to the secretary of the school, S. Burns Weston, 1305 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

Education.

Over 40,000 women are attending the various colleges in America, yet it has been only twenty-five years since the first college in the land was opened to women. Oberlin College first allowed women.

The United States Department of Agriculture has established at the Tuskegee Institute, Tuskegee, Ala., a department for a scientific investigation of the composition and consumption of food among the Negroes in the Black Belt of the South.

The members of the Illinois legislature have been considering a bill looking to the pensioning of public school teachers in cities of 100,000 or more population. According to the provisions of the bill, female teachers who have taught twenty years and male teachers who have taught twenty-five years are to be retired on half-pay, provided it does not amount to more than $1,000. Like similar legislation in France, it is a self-pensioning measure. A certain per cent. of the salaries of the teachers is laid away, and this with what may be added to it from other sources constitutes a fund out of which the pensions are paid.—Popular Educator.

The School of Sociology, under the care of the Society for Education Extension of Hartford, Conn., has issued an announcement which states the reasons for its establishment, and gives the proposed curriculum, which is arranged to cover three years. No science is so imperative in its claims for study and solution as sociology, and the complexity of the subject calls for organized study. The school has four objects in view; namely, research, instruction, publication, and practical application. The courses as proposed are most carefully considered, and the degree of Bachelor of Sociology will be conferred at the completion of the three years' course. The school is open to men and women alike. For further information and for application blanks, address Chester D. Hartranft, president, or Alan C. Reiley, 625 Asylum Street, Hartford, Conn.

UNION, " "

The members of the Illinois legislature have been considering a bill looking to the pensioning of public school teachers in cities of 100,000 or more population. According to the provisions of the bill, female teachers who have taught twenty years and male teachers who have taught twenty-five years are to be retired on half-pay, provided it does not amount to more than $1,000. Like similar legislation in France, it is a self-pensioning measure. A certain per cent. of the salaries of the teachers is laid away, and this with what may be added to it from other sources constitutes a fund out of which the pensions are paid.—Popular Educator.

The School of Sociology, under the care of the Society for Education Extension of Hartford, Conn., has issued an announcement which states the reasons for its establishment, and gives the proposed curriculum, which is arranged to cover three years. No science is so imperative in its claims for study and solution as sociology, and the complexity of the subject calls for organized study. The school has four objects in view; namely, research, instruction, publication, and practical application. The courses as proposed are most carefully considered, and the degree of Bachelor of Sociology will be conferred at the completion of the three years' course. The school is open to men and women alike. For further information and for application blanks, address Chester D. Hartranft, president, or Alan C. Reiley, 625 Asylum Street, Hartford, Conn.

The Leading.

One of the leading and best known painters in this country says, "I cannot afford to use anything but Pure White Lead" (see list of brands). Every practical painter knows this. It is only those who haven't any reputation to lose who don't know it, or will use misleading brands of White Lead or unknown worthless mixtures. Although low-priced, they are not cheap. Pure White Lead is the cheapest, because it is the best.

If colors are required they are easily made by using the National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors. Pamphlet and color-card sent free.

Mozoomdar's BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortality, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 198 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

MRS. MARTHA HALE NASON.
Feb. 20, 1895.
BY M. H.
Dearest and best beloved, oft sorely tried;
Pet of three households,
Sharer of our grief;
Whose quick, light footstep, wandering far and wide
Through our still halls,
Brought brightness and relief.
Could not they wait, in heaven who miss thee so,
That they must call for thee
"From out the Hallelujahs sweet and low"?
It was thy prime;
No hint of coming bale
On thy long lashes or thy dusky hair;
No cause to dread the gulf we still bewail,
Though thou hast found a blessed harbor there.
The oriole's flame burns through thy hickory-trees;
The wild plum's blossom scents the softening breeze;
While thou art welcomed to Eternal Spring
And Life Divine,—"perfect through suffering."

Charities and Reforms.
ARMENIA.—Dr. Louise Russell Smith lectured before the College Club in this city May 6, on "A New Phase of the Eastern Question." She apologized in advance to those of her hearers who might have read Mr. F. D. Greene's "The Armenian Crisis in Turkey" for any sameness of incidents. She had lived for two years next door to Mr. Greene in Van, "the fairest city in Armenia, the pearl of Haïasdan"; and the same facts had come to their notice. The Turkish censors had cut the word "Armenia" out of the map in her copy of Xenophon's Anabasis, when she landed at Constantinople. In Van she had herself known forty families each of which was mourning a son dead from "prison poison." A Turk had been killed, no one knew by whom. Two hundred young Armenians were arrested on suspicion, and kept in prison without trial for eighteen months, at the end of which time a large proportion of them had died from the unhealthiness of the prison and the ill-treatment of their jailers. It was true that prisoners were often tortured. She had herself seen the marks where they had been flogged and iron nails driven into their scalps. The day after four young Armenians had been murdered, and their wives outraged by the sultan's Kurdish cavalry on the slopes of Mt. Varak, a courier was sent through the Armenian shops and bazaars to give notice that all letters sent from the city must be handed in at the post-office open. The government did its utmost to keep the facts from leaking out. The widow of one of the murdered men afterward came to the mission station, with her young son in her arms and her aged father accompanying her; and they told their story. The murderers, though positively identified by the women, were only imprisoned for a few weeks. Dr. Smith declared that the horrors were not exaggerated, and had been going on for about fifteen years, ever since the Berlin treaty. It was now a duel between the British government, determined that nothing should be done, and the British people, led by Bryce and Gladstone, determined to overcome this apathy. In this struggle American public opinion can be of great help.

Personals.
Rev. E. Winchester Donald, D.D., who succeeded Phillips Brooks as rector of Trinity Church, Boston, is to preach the commencement sermon at the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, Tuskegee, Ala., Sunday, May 26.
Special services were held in the Unitarian churches throughout London in commemoration of the ninetieth birthday of Dr. James Martineau, the eminent divine who, since the year 1859, has occupied the premier position in that denomination. Thanksgiving sermons were also delivered at a large number of dissenting places of worship, and references were made to the event at several of the labor churches in the north of England.
Robert Palfrey Utter, the son of Rev. David Utter of Salt Lake City, has been achieving distinction as the writer of the libretto of "The Prince of Cairo," an operetta recently performed with much success by scholars of the Cambridge High and Latin Schools. Although Mr. Utter is not yet out of his teens, he has already appeared as a contributor to the Youth's Companion, the New England Magazine, and other periodicals; and the character of all his literary work justifies faith in its future development.
Hon. George H. Heilbron, a prominent resident of Seattle, died suddenly of apoplexy on April 5, in his thirty-sixth year. He was born in Boston, entered Harvard College from the Roxbury Latin School, graduated in the class of 1883, and from the Law School three years later. In 1887 he went to Seattle, where he soon identified himself with all that concerned the best interests of the city, and where he has ever done much toward its development. He was editor-in-chief of the Post-Intelligencer and manager of the Guarantee Loan & Trust Company. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Alfred Martin of Tacoma and Rev. J. H. Acton in the First Unitarian Church of Seattle, in which he had been actively interested. Mr. Martin spoke tenderly and earnestly of Mr. Heilbron's life and character, dwelling upon his steadfastness of purpose and the devotion to an ideal that made his short life purer, larger, and deeper than that of many a man who rounds out his fourscore years and ten.

The following letter was received at the headquarters of the London District Unitarian Society from Dr. Martineau, in acknowledgment of a resolution of congratulation passed by that body with reference to the anniversary of his birth:—
"Dear Sir,—The gracious and affectionate terms of the resolution passed at the recent annual meeting of the London District Unitarian Society move me too profoundly for any adequate reply. In the retrospect of ninety years there is a pathetic mixture of gratitude for ample opportunities and humiliation for insignificant performances. The habitual pressure of the latter is the only cloud that overhangs my declining path. My friends—as if they caught sight of the shadow and understood it—try to assure me, as they gather around me at the close of my last decade, that the labor of so many seasons has not been all in vain. If to some few souls the meaning of life has indeed become clearer, its possibilities nobler, its sanctities deeper, its immortalities surer, through the simple report of my own experience, I thank the Father of Lights for thus joining me in love,—be it only to two or three brethren in spirit and children of his. With heartfelt gratitude for the words of sympathy and blessing so impressively conveyed to me, I remain, dear sir, yours very sincerely,
"JAMES MARTINEAU."
This letter, which was addressed to the secretary of the society, was read in many of the London churches.—London Chronicle.

5 GALLONS FOR 25¢
Not of the preparations of coloring matter and essential oils so often sold under the name of rootbeer, but of the purest, most delicious, health-giving beverage possible to produce. One gallon of Hires' is worth ten of the counterfeit kind. Suppose an imitation extract costs five cents less than the genuine Hires; the same amount of sugar and trouble is required; you save one cent a gallon, and—get an unhealthful imitation in the end. Ask for HIRE'S and get it.

There are really four things needed in every hall,—a mirror, a series of hooks for garments, a settle, and a rack for canes, umbrellas, etc.
Taking these four necessities as a basis, we have prepared over a hundred different combinations and changes. Of composite Hall Stands, like that represented in the above engraving, we have the largest assortment in this country.
The model here shown is very effective. The pillars and columns are carved upon the frame. The seat is deep; and with such broad arm-rests an unusual degree of comfort is attained.
The design provides for a large bevelled French plate mirror. There is a roomy chest for a robe, overshoes, etc. The umbrella stand is of polished brass with rustless base. The combination hooks are the latest pattern of the present year.
Remember that this is but one of over 100 styles.

THE UNITARIAN.
No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.
UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:
I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.
I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.
I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

FILES OF "THE UNITARIAN."
I wish to say to persons desiring to obtain back numbers of the Unitarian in order to complete their sets, that they will need to attend to the matter between now and the 10th of June, or it will be too late. The present publisher, Mr. Geo. H. Ellis, can furnish back numbers since January, 1891, the time when the publication office was removed to Boston. But for the five years previous to that time back numbers can be obtained only from me. Most of the numbers of that period I can furnish; but I shall dispose of all before June 10, after which time it will be impossible for me to give aid to any in completing their early files.

Pleasantries.

Overheard in the office. "Do you speak Norwegian, sir?" "I don't know: I never tried."

Landlord: "I'm afraid I'll have to raise your rent." Tenant: "I wish you would. I'm sure I can't raise it."—Truth.

Cholly Chumpleigh: "Yes, gloves are worn in bed at night to make the hands soft." Miss Coldeal: "Indeed! Do you wear nightcaps, Mr. Chumpleigh?"

A little boy of six and a little girl of eight were looking at the clouds one beautiful summer evening, watching their fantastic shapes, when the boy exclaimed, "O Mamie! I see a dog in the clouds!" "Well, Willie," replied his sister, "it must be a sky terrier."

There is a janitor in one of our colleges whom the boys are very fond of joking; and, when they said, "Sam, what are you going to do when the devil gets hold of you?" he said, "Well, I guess I will do just what I am doing now,—wait on the students." [Laughter.]

Five-year-old Freddy was showing the young minister about the place. His eyes frequently glanced up at the kind face, and then rested with a look of troubled inquiry on the pointed toes of the Piccadilly boots. Finally, he blurted out his anxiety in the question, "Ain't you got but one toe?"—Babyhood.

At one time Charles Dickens was invited to attend a Walter Scott party, at which each guest was expected to personate some character in Scott's novels. On the eventful evening Dickens appeared in ordinary dress, and defended himself by saying to his host: "Why, sir, I am a character you will find in every one of his books. I am 'the gentle reader.'"

Eminent but Bald-headed Citizen: "Well, sir, what can I do for you?" Visitor: "You can do me a great favor with no trouble to yourself. Will you kindly sign this certificate for my hair-restorer?" Eminent Citizen: "Hair-restorer! But, my dear sir, I have never used your hair-restorer!" Visitor: "Of course not! That is exactly what I wish you to certify."—Puck.

She was a gushing young girl. She had been perusing Byron's "Childe Harold"; and suddenly she asked her papa, who was reading the stock reports of the evening paper, and was deeply engrossed in worldly things, "Papa, what do you think of Byron's 'Childe Harold'?" "Oh, he's all right," responded the old man,—“as good as any of the rest of Byron's boys.”—Truth.

She was a small child on her way to an evening party, escorted by her father, and had all the scorn of the young person who had been promoted from the primary the year before. She considered that it was a mistake to ask the "primaries" to this party, which was, in fact, the school-house warming. She wondered how long they would stay. "Most of them will go home early, but one will stay late," she announced with great conviction. "Why?" "Because she is overdressed. A mother who overdresses her child will let her sit up late."—The Outlook.

NOT AN EVEN THING.

In one of my parishes, some years since, I had a vestryman, an excellent man and a warm friend. He has now departed this life, and so this story may be told as an illustration of his official devotion to the interests of his constituency. In my neighborhood lived a clerical brother, a splendid preacher, and very popular with all who knew him, with whom I often exchanged pulpits. His salary was $1,500 and a rectory, while mine was $2,000 with a similar provision for my shelter.

One very hot summer, not being in good health, and knowing that my people admired him very much, I exchanged quite frequently with him, so as to save preparing sermons.

One day I went into the large store of my vestryman to have a chat with him, which he opened as follows:—

"You have lately exchanged a good deal with Mr. —."

"Yes, sir," I replied. "He is a fine preacher, and every one in the parish admires him."

"I know that," said he. "I like him very much; but what is his salary?"

"Fifteen hundred dollars and a rectory."

"But what are we paying you?"

I told him.

"Well," he put in, "have you considered how much this parish loses by these exchanges?"

I told him I had not made that calculation.

"Nine dollars and sixty cents is the loss per Sunday," was the statement of this careful guardian of the financial interests of his parish.—From the "Editor's Drawer" in Harper's Magazine.

Editorial.

THE gardener who in the spring should waste his time in wordy controversies with his neighbors over the fence in regard to theories of horticulture or the labelling of seeds would miss his opportunity to plant and to foster. His controversy might literally be fruitless. There are religious controversies which are just as unprofitable and fruitless. The time to plant has come, and the time to cultivate. We have our own fields to look after. There is ploughing to be done and seed to be sown, if we are to ultimately gather fruit. Controversy can never take the place of work. The best way we can commend our cause, our principles, or our religion is to let them bring forth fruit after their kind.

THE difference between the Unitarian Catholic Church and the Roman Catholic Church is that the former represents a Christianity which is both earlier and later than the mediæval Christianity held by the latter. The Unitarian Catholic Church believes in the Christianity of the Golden Rule and the Sermon on the Mount. It goes back to a time when Christian churches were not under the domination of bishops or popes, when salvation by baptism was unknown, and when the autograph letters of the apostles were not regarded as infallible documents, when belief in the two great commandments of love to God and love to man were declared by Jesus to be the assurance of eternal life. If the Roman Catholic Church will go back far enough to accept this older form of Christianity, it will not only go backward, but it will go forward; for in this respect the oldest form of Christianity is the newest as well as the best.

WE have said more than once that the solution of the Negro question in the South would depend on two elements, the education of the Negro and the education of the white man. No white man in the South can help the Negro to rise without rising himself. We have recognized the earnestness with which some Southern white men are appealing for broader considerations of justice and liberty and humanity in the treatment of the colored people. One of the most earnest of these Southern men is Mr. John J. Dargan, who was born in South Carolina, and who is connected with the first families of that State. He entered the Confederate army as a boy of sixteen. Two members of his family were killed at Fort Wagner. He afterward took part with Wade Hampton and others in the suppression of the Negroes during the carpet-bag reign. His conversion was brought about first by reading James Freeman Clarke's anti-slavery reminiscences, and afterward the life of William Lloyd Garrison. He is now the editor and proprietor of the Freeman of Sumter, S.C., which he is publishing at a great sacrifice of labor, time, and money. On another page we give an abstract of an address delivered recently at Charleston, which is marked by courage, breadth, elevation, and nobleness. The sentiments of this address will find an echo in many hearts, both North and South, in white breasts and black ones.

It is not our custom, as a guardian of pure religion, to establish a court and try a man for heresy upon the evidence of a newspaper report. We do not, therefore, purpose to arraign Rev. Dr. Heber Newton of All Souls' Episcopal Church, New York, for his reported views on the resurrection of Jesus. Dr. Newton's offence, according to the newspapers, is in declaring that Jesus rose with a spiritual body instead of a physical one. Anybody who reads the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians will see that the apostle Paul also believed in the resurrection of a spiritual body. So that, if our Episcopalian friends are going to arraign Dr. Newton, they will have to arraign the apostle Paul also. But the apostle Paul never belonged to the Episcopal Church. He was a Congregationalist; and, therefore, the Episcopal Church has no authority over him. It can only regret that a man of Saint Paul's opportunities should have been betrayed into such spirituality, when he might have accepted the gross churchly materialism of a bodily resurrection. Will the Episcopalians pile up their fagots, and, after torturing Dr. Newton with thumb-screws and rack, publicly burn him? Probably not. This would only assure him a new resurrection with another spiritual body, capable of moving about without passing through doors or windows. The Episcopal Church needs Dr. Newton vastly more than he needs it. A man of great ability, undoubted courage, and honesty of conviction, and a prophet of social righteousness, he has done much to lead his own church out of literal and dogmatic bondage into spiritual interpretations of religion.

Two processes of education go on when a minister is settled over a church. One is the education of the people, the other the education of the pastor. The people learn something about their minister, and the minister learns something about his people. The people learn not only what he distinctly intends to teach them, but also what he is not always conscious of imparting. No minister can teach well or ill without imparting something of his own personality, and the degree to which he does this may make his teaching better or worse. This constant impartation of self in the best sense of the word, this putting of personality into his message, is that which gives individuality and personal power to his word and influence. A congregation will learn its minister's limitations, but it will also learn his resources and power to sustain himself in the position to which he is called. In a similar way the minister is constantly being educated about his people and his field. He learns their limitations as well as their resources, their power to expect, to absorb, and to sustain; and it is this process of mutual education which may result in a brief pastorate, or in one which is continued over a quarter or a half of a century in a relation which is rich, beautiful, and blessed, whether viewed from the pulpit or from the pew.

THE American missionaries have sometimes been accused of being indifferent to the Armenian question. But in the Advance of May 2 Rev. Joseph K. Greene, D.D., of Constantinople, for many years a missionary in Turkey, says: "Are the American missionaries in duty bound, in order not to incur the hostility of the Turkish authorities, to keep their mouths shut, not only in the presence of acts of ordinary misgovernment, but also in the presence of the massacre of thousands of the defenceless Christian subjects of the Porte? Is it a crime to protest to the civilized world against wholesale slaughter and outrage, and to desire that the Christian populations of Turkey may secure, not through revolution, but by the agency of the great powers of Europe, a fitting protection for life, honor, and property? Must an American cease to be a man? Must he smother all humane instincts, must he shut his eyes and stop his ears and plug up his mouth, as he passes by on the other side, in order to be a missionary? Is this the amount of discretion necessary, in order that he may secure through the American government the proper protection of his legitimate rights? The American missionaries have ever been scrupulously loyal to the Turkish government. They are so now, and they mean to be in the future; but they cannot admit that they are indiscreet and censurable if, in the presence of massacre, they utter the cry of horror, and on this point they confidently appeal to the American government and to the American people." It is to Frederick Davis Greene, a son of Dr. Greene, that we are indebted for the book on "The Armenian Crisis in Turkey," which gives us the best presentation of the Armenian question and a full report of the massacre.

THE emphasis in theology has often been laid on the sovereignty of God, but now we are learning more of the sovereignty of man. There is not the slightest danger that the sovereignty of God will be abdicated. The fundamental constitution of the universe will remain what it is, and the eternal laws will continue to fulfil the power, wisdom, and goodness of God. But it has been common, from the days of Homer down to the days of the Puritans, and from the Puritans to our own times, to place upon God the responsibility which ought to be assumed and fulfilled by man. The fatalist assumes that things are so because they must be so; and the optimist assumes that whatever is is right, and therefore cannot be made any better. But, without exceeding the sovereignty of God, without running counter to the everlasting laws, but simply by learning to apply and to fulfil them, man may enter into a field of sovereignty in which he becomes not a rival, but a coworker with God. This is becoming more and more evident in the structure of human society. The nature of man and the nature of his environment furnish fundamental conditions for human society, but to some extent both of these are capable of modification. We need an improved man and an improved environment, and we may have both. To assume that human society is fixed and unalterable is an assumption of ignorance, indifference, or fatalism. Poverty and distress are conditions which arise from undevelopment and ignorance on one side or from selfishness and oppression on the other. Slavery was defended again and again as a divine institution, as something which was ordained as a curse to the slave and as a blessing to his master. The abolition of slavery has meant the reconstruction of society wherever it has existed, and it has been found that God has been entirely willing that some better form of society should be substituted for that which was attributed either to his vengeance or to his goodness. Such an experience as this encourages us to believe that every other form of oppression which exists in human society to-day, whether it be intellectual, physical, political, social, or industrial, may eventually be removed by infusing more light, liberty, justice, love, into the social and political order.

THE BLOSSOMING OF OLD FAITHS.

Paul Bourget, in his book on America, "Outre Mer," has given the best portraits that have as yet been limned of those two remarkable men, Archbishop Ireland and Cardinal Gibbons. Not the physical features mainly, but the soul of these two leaders of the new Catholicism, stand revealed in his vivid sketches. We see the broadening and deepening of fresh life in the old faith that seemed hopelessly to have crystallized into formula, moss-grown ritual, and venerable ceremony. The hope of expansion in the hierarchy had almost died out of the world's expectation.

Some rabid Romanist-haters may see in these new tendencies only cunning and craft, the supple bending to new conditions to compass old ends, means to engraft the Jesuitical influence only the more firmly in our body politic. But generous minds will warm toward the type of manhood Bourget has described,—the saintly Gibbons, the sturdy and uncompromising Ireland, both the flowering of the American idea, both the representatives of ardent patriotism. By birth, breeding, and nurture they are rooted in the virgin soil of this new continent, and draw from it essential modifications of the old creed, not in the letter, but in the spirit, the living germ of faith that breaks old bonds asunder, and overleaps all hampering restrictions.

This putting forth of new aggressive shoots on the old Roman trunk is not the least remarkable sign of our times. A few centuries ago the martyr's fate would have overtaken rash prelates who loudly proclaimed the reconciliation of this ancient faith with modern science. It proves how completely the persecuting era has closed after lingering to the very threshold of our time. At last the new leaven has got into the old Roman dough; and the future of the Church, even on its speculative and doctrinal side, is problematic. The stationary ages have ended, and the Church hears the mysterious command: "Forward! March!" The most rabid hater of things papistical, who is still a true American, must feel a warming of the cockles of the heart toward men who have so generously espoused the national idea. Still, there are some who will inevitably fear that the unchanged policy of Rome may in time subtly quench their expansive ardor, and by its tortuous influence check progress and extinguish the light its forward sons have kindled with wood gathered from the sacred precincts.

Romanism permits a long tether; but its checks and hindrances, hidden and open, are potent, its power to subdue the genius of its exceptional men, working them into the general lump of subserviency, is a power possessed by no other order.

However, it would seem that modern thought, modern impulses, are too strong for the old Church. It can no longer remain stationary. It must move, it must grow, if it would live. Its saving graces must come to the front and take the lead, and put forth buds and leafage, like Aaron's staff. The American stamp of Catholicism will react wholesomely on the stagnant European Church, and has already reacted. Ireland and Gibbons have emphasized precious truths. They have felt more as men than as ecclesiastics. Their robes rise and fall over human hearts with feelings broader than their own connection. Whether conscious of it or not, they stand for free thought and the liberty of the spirit. The forward step they have taken in unison with science, with political reform, with the growing vital tendencies toward recognized brotherhood, is a remarkable illustration of the power of free institutions to slough off everything pernicious to its own well-being.

Spiritual emancipation in the Church itself is the earnest of averted danger. Our safety rests on the enlightenment of the Catholic masses. Not one or twenty secret societies, pledged to work against the spread of Catholicism, can safeguard our liberties. Safety alone is to be found in transforming the ten million Catholics in this country into American citizens, enthusiastic for the American idea. Tolerance is the last principle the Roman Church has been brought to accept. That which does not grow shall rot. The Church sees this truth at last. It is growing on American soil because it is adapting itself to its environment.

These two remarkable men have worked a great change in the lower orders of the clergy. Where there was but one liberal Catholic priest a few years ago, there are now many. The desire has come not to work wholly apart and isolated, but to strike hands with other brave workers of whatever name. They wish to join the march, to keep step with their neighbors, to be admitted to the privilege of service. This is a greater miracle than any recorded in the whole category of saints' lives and wonder-workers. Thus men of diverse names and creeds get down to the basis of humanity, and satisfy the secret longing for union on a new footing.

Generous hearts, call themselves what they may, no longer wish to live and work alone. Theoretically, they will believe what they must believe; but belief shall no longer be a dungeon cell, shall no longer prevent brothers from striking hands for service and fellowship. This is to-day the wish, the need, of the progressive Catholic. Without a liberal America could there ever have been a liberal or even a semi-liberal pope? The translation of the letter into the spirit of the faith has still a great task to perform. But, once open the church doors, let in the light, invite the air, and all must follow.

So in another old sect we see the same process going forward on different lines, but consistent with the genius of race and historical sequence. Dr. Gottheil's recent jubilee in New York shows conclusively how far Judaism has gone aside from its traditional ruts to seek new paths and larger opportunities. The sympathy it called forth from people of other denominations was one of the beautiful signs of the times. Dr. Gottheil has done for his church what Archbishop Ireland and the Baltimore cardinal have done for theirs. He has shown that because it is among the oldest of existing faiths it need not necessarily be the most backward, need not be a simulacrum of death in a living, growing world. From its ancient heart, thought by many to have gone all to dust and ashes, he has evoked living currents that prove the eternal youth of the human spirit. He has placed himself in the van of progress, has called to his friendship and favor the advanced minds of other faiths, has made of his fine scholarship not a bulwark of defence, but an open road for the truth and for human fellowship. The band of scholars, thinkers, spiritual teachers, who have come out of Israel in these late years, is an inspiring sight, fraught with the profound vitality of our common nature, and not to be regarded lightly, but to be looked upon as one of the pregnant signs of the times, an earnest of the great forward march of creeds that at some far-distant day are to flow in a universal faith. As the march goes on, the needless impedimenta, the things that hinder and clog and belittle, will be dropped, and the great essentials will loom larger and fairer on the human vision. This resistless forward movement, acquiring momentum as it advances, will outrun all shells and trammels, and advance with triumphant step toward the higher life for which all material things are but the stepping-stone, the lever.

Religious parcelling-out and isolation have failed through centuries to make the world much better. The time has come when a united uplift, a strong, determined effort of all devoted hearts and souls, is called for. The enthusiasm for humanity will make us lose sight of these little creedal divisions. We shall grasp the hand held out to us, whether it subscribe to our "ology" or not. We shall welcome all aid. We shall get hold at last of the right way of doing things, and leave each to accept such intellectual formularies, such statements of faith, as his mind yearns toward, to find that these things are not impenetrable divisions, but are like some of the tissues of the body through which the living blood flows with perfect freedom.

SHUTTING THE BOOKS.

The end of the school and college year is at hand. Another month will see most of the institutions of learning throughout the country silent and deserted. The buildings will fall into their vacation sleep, and the grass will venture up between bricks where to-day the ceaseless tramp of many feet keeps it in close subjection. The boys and girls, young men and women, teachers and masters, will scatter to the four winds, listening to no bell of recall till the September tocsin summons them from wood and hill and seashore to resume their work.

Only a month, but what a month! In too many schools it is the hardest bit of the year. It is unfortunate that the greatest mental strain should come at a time when physically teachers and pupils are least fitted to endure it. The nine months of brain activity has been exhausting, and the heat of June adds to the weariness of heads already tired. And this year the intensely hot weather began in early May. If this season were to be the usual fashion of nature, it would be necessary to adopt the method of some Southern schools, and have the scholastic year end in May and the literal "commencement" take place in June, the work that in Northern schools is done in September being done then.

It is not only the routine work that is trying, but the mental anxiety as to promotion and graduation adds immensely to the pressure. This is often unnecessary. As the head of a large institution remarked the other day, "The boys scare themselves: we don't scare them." And often faithful, painstaking, and industrious students suffer most from this self-torment. But they lessen their ability to do themselves full credit by this fear. Especially do they lose strength for the final contest if carelessness or negligence has undermined their general health during the year; for they easily fall victims to a morbid anxiety that sometimes ends in a complete breakdown at the critical moment.

Young men and women in college must be left largely to their own responsibility at this time. If they have not learned the wisdom of doing their best as the days go by, caring wisely for the body, including the brain, and making haste slowly in mental work, then, when the end of the year comes, they may have a bitter lesson before the middle of June, and find that experience is the hardest master they have yet known.

But, bad as it is for college men and women to be adding worry to work in the closing of the year, it is an even greater mistake for school boys and girls to study and fret themselves into a wan and sleepless condition. But at that age parents are at hand to look after and prevent this, if possible. Even more than at other seasons nutritious food should be insisted on, but simple and unstimulating. Recreation and exercise should be as regular as school attendance, and as long hours of unbroken sleep should be secured as possible. Above all, it should be deeply impressed on the young people that health is better than book-learning, and that the highest percentage of scholarship will poorly offset a broken-down nervous system. It may be rather late to begin inculcating such wholesome doctrine in May, when the children are looking forward to promotions in June. But, even though the good advice has been delayed till then, it may still find a lodgment in some sensible child, and save at least a few. And, though care has been exercised through the whole year by both parent and scholar, it is quite possible that an added injunction may not come amiss in keeping them faithful for one month more. There seems to be no way yet devised by which this extra strain can be avoided. It must therefore be recognized as, for the present, a necessary evil, and met accordingly.

THE LOST HEATHEN.

It is more than a dozen years since Prof. Park prophesied that "the missionary nerve would be cut" unless the salvation of the heathen from perdition in the world to come were made the chief motive of missionary work. It is not a decade since the American Board was convulsed with the great discussion concerning the fate of the heathen and their grandfathers, turning upon the question whether Rev. Robert A. Hume, who had given pagan grandfathers the benefit of merciful doubts, should be returned to his field of labor in India. Since the death of Dr. Shedd, whose famous sermon on "The Guilt of the Heathen" has become a classic in the literature of eschatology, we have wondered whether his voice would find any echo among those who have survived him. On turning to the Advance of May 2, the question is answered. The spirit of Dr. Shedd finds a medium in Rev. E. B. Webb, D.D., chairman of the Prudential Committee of the American Board, who writes on the "Foundation of the Missionary Spirit." Dr. Webb says:—

The unanimous and overwhelming testimony of the missionaries, as they came up to London and joined in that great missionary conference of 1888, was that the heathen are guilty, condemned, and sinking down in their sins to an inevitable and awful perdition. And, surely, this is the implication and the explication of Christ's sacrifice. Yea, more, this is the reason and motive that brought him here. "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost."

Paul said of the heathen, shutting their eyes to the witnesses for God's everlasting power and divinity, "without excuse," guilty, without excuse. Paul said: They exchange the truth of God for a lie; they abandon themselves to all sorts of lust, cunning, cruelty, and criminal abominations. They take pleasure in strife, deceit, malignity, and murder. They reverse the very constitutional instincts, impulses, and affections of human nature; and God gives them over to wallow and welter in the dwarfing and deadening consequences of their own sins.

It is the same from every quarter of the horizon: the heathen are lost! This is the mighty truth—so Gen. Booth says—that is moving the Salvation Army to encompass the world to-day,—a truth the rejection of which halts every foot of that army, from the highest general to the humblest private. What we want is not little dainty discussions about the pitiable condition of the poor heathen, nor a patronizing attitude toward Booth's army, now that its victories can no longer be denied: what we need is to believe anew, down in the depths of our souls, that the heathen are lost.

And now the other truth that we need to grasp anew and fix immutably in our hearts is this: the religion of Jesus Christ will save the heathen, and the religion of Jesus Christ alone will save them. Every other religion and all other religions leave men without God, without hope in the world. In the name of Jesus Christ, the crucified one, the risen one, is salvation, and in no other.

This language is so familiar to us that we might almost accuse Dr. Webb of plagiarizing from Dr. Shedd, did we not know that he is above any such charge, and that the resemblance we speak of relates not to words, but to ideas. The question may naturally be asked, If the heathen are in this lost condition, can the religions they have embraced do anything for them? To this question Dr. Webb gives a distinct negative:—

Not one of these religions has ever purified, elevated, or advanced a nation. Not a nation has been found in the last sixty years, nor in the last six thousand years, that has not been descending, however fully possessed by one of these religions. Brahma and Buddha and Confucius and Mohammed may each have taught some truth. Suppose they did. That forms no part of Christianity. The cattle in the stable where Christ was born, the sheep and the goats, the doves and the hawks, each had life; but had they therefore a relation to the babe in the manger?

The answer to this minor question depends somewhat upon whether we have any historic proof that Mary nursed her own child. If not, it is quite possible that the goats and the cattle had a distinct relation to the life and growth of Jesus. At least, after he was weaned, the supposition is that he used milk, like other children. And we cannot be sure that the cattle were not of pagan origin, and that they had been tested for theological tuberculosis. Is it not possible that Christianity was nursed somewhat in the same way? Or was Paul in error when he said that he was a debtor to the Greeks, and also to the barbarians; and was Peter infallibly wrong when he said that God is no respecter of persons, and in every nation he that worketh righteousness is accepted of him?

The zoological question whether Jesus had any relation to the animals who were in the stable when he was born is a matter which may be referred to the comparative anatomists. We suspect most of them would maintain that, physiologically, the relation was positive and genetic. As to the theological question, we refer Dr. Webb to Hatch's Gifford lectures on "The Greek Influence on Christianity," and to Prof. Toy's book on Christianity and Judaism. It may, indeed, be asked whether this very view of the destiny of the heathen which Dr. Webb holds is not of pagan origin, is not something that has been infused into Christianity. We do not attempt to decide this historic question, and we may seem to be doing injustice to our heathen friends to charge them with holding the terribly dismal view of human destiny which Dr. Webb has advanced. Nevertheless, we can imagine some heathen recognizing kinship, and saying, "Your God is our devil; and, if you charge us with devil-worship, have you not fallen into the same idolatry?" A distinguished Japanese who was in this country a few years ago said, "Do not send us any more bells: we have enough of our own." Dr. Webb, however, refuses to grant to the heathen any quarter outside of Christianity, and says, "To tolerate the idea that there is salvation for the heathen except in the religion of Jesus Christ is treason against the kingdom of heaven on earth."

We honor the American Board for the educational, civilizing, Christianizing work it has done all over the world; and we sincerely regret that its receipts have fallen off in the last three years some $117,000 a year. We should rejoice to see the debt removed, and its hard-working, self-sacrificing missionaries adequately supported at their posts; but we ask, Will such appeals as that of Dr. Webb replenish a depleted treasury? Undoubtedly, if our orthodox brethren believed in this doctrine as sincerely as Dr. Webb, it would have that result. But, as a matter of fact, whatever their theory is on this matter, the great majority of orthodox people are not possessed with the idea that the heathen will be forever lost without Christianity. This motive has been so long urged upon them as the only adequate motive for missionary work, and they have been so long scourged with such appeals, that, when the pressure of this exhortation is relaxed, their generosity is contracted. If Dr. Webb is right, then the American Board ought to have millions every year for its work; and a small sacrifice on the part of every orthodox believer would annually secure it. But this doctrine is not practically accepted; and the question arises whether men like Dr. Webb are not doing a distinct injury to the missionary cause, and helping to deplete its treasury, by presenting a motive which is no longer adequate because it is no longer accepted as true. We venture to say that the more liberal churches in the orthodox body, if they had perfect confidence in the administration of the Board, would give, and perhaps do give, proportionately, quite as much for the educational, humanizing, Christianizing work of the Board, which constitutes the great crown of its achievement, as for the boring of theological hells in heathen lands and the propagation of the Calvinistic scheme of pessimism. The vast sums given by Peabody and Slater for education in the South, the money raised for Hampton, Tuskegee, and a score of other colleges and schools, show that such ignorance, vice, and degradation as Dr. Webb describes constitute alone a sufficient motive for generosity, when properly presented. In the last twenty-five years many millions of dollars have been contributed for the cause of education alone, absolutely distinct from any idea of salvation from a future hell. It has been given for schools, colleges, and public libraries. The endowment of Chicago University, of Clark University in Massachusetts, the recent gift of President Low of Columbia of a million dollars to his university and the legacies which yearly pour into Harvard College, are notable examples. The fact that a thousand dollars is given for education to every one that is given for saving the heathen from future perdition shows that the educational motive is not only more worthy, but more powerful.

Musings.

I HAD an opportunity last week to get a glimpse of Brown University, not only of buildings and grounds, which under the rapidly unfolding spring were beautiful enough, but of teachers and students. A kind invitation from Prof. Wilson gave me an opportunity in the morning to address the class in sociology on the subject of "Penology"; and another gracious invitation from Prof. Mannatt gave me an opportunity to meet the Classical Club, with numerous additions from the outside world, in the beautiful Sayles' Hall in a lecture on "Ithaca, Troy, and the Homeric Isles." I was impressed on this visit by the way in which Brown has expanded, not territorially, for it could not stretch a great deal without spilling over the borders of Rhode Island; but I mean in breadth and scope of studies, in organization, equipment, in purpose, opportunity, and determination. With an electric dynamo for a president, who is capable of furnishing power as well as light, and radiating influence in all directions, with the proper amount of insulation, such a result was to be expected. President Andrews, like President Eliot and President Harper, is a good illustration of the power of personality in education. I was much interested to see what Brown is doing in sociology. To meet sixty young men, re-enforced by half a dozen young women, who are earnestly addressing themselves to such subjects as criminology, pauperism, and every phase of scientific philanthropy, is an indication not only that the university is adjusting itself to the life of to-day, but that this opportunity is welcomed and accepted, and that it means a fresh accession of power to the ranks of those who are trying to solve these problems. Yet this new interest in problems of life to-day is not gained by narrowing or clipping the traditional course of classical study. On the contrary, this department is invigorated, animated, and extended; and one may feel in Brown the new impulse in classical archaeology which is felt in all other universities where the fashion has been adopted of taking professors out of their libraries, and sending them to Greece for a Sabbatical year, to delve with the spade as well as the pen. Schliemann little knew how many souls his own radiant enthusiasm would enkindle. Large as were the results of his life, in summing them up, I should place the emphasis not upon his discoveries so much as upon the stimulus he gave to classical archaeology in all its relations. I must not leave Brown without making the most profound bow to the women's college. I should not dare to undertake to define the exact relation which this college sustains to the rest of the university. It would be perilous. Somebody would correct me. But I saw young ladies in the class-rooms with young men, and in the library, and also attending lectures from the university professors in their own little building, so that I am inclined to believe that every course of study is open to them except membership in the base-ball nine. When the young ladies graduate, they receive a degree signed by the president and faculty the same as any other student. What is needed is better accommodation. I have already made out a check for a million dollars for Brown, and am only waiting to get somebody who has the money to sign it.

BUT I have been pursuing my education not only at Brown, but at Harvard; and for three successive Wednesdays I have had the pleasure of hearing Prof. John Williams White lecture on Aristophanes, and give a translation of the Birds, with stereopticon illustrations. Frere has shown us what can be done in the way of putting Aristophanes into English, and one might hesitate to venture upon the same path. But Prof. White has blazed his own path through the thicket, and made it so alluring and fascinating that it is a delight to follow him. We find in it a complete revelation of the spirit of Aristophanes. Prof. White has achieved the difficult task of making his rendering thoroughly modern in spirit without doing violence to the text and the situation. The translator of Aristophanes needs to add to the endowment of the scholar the endowment of the literary humorist. Some of the Germans have failed to understand Aristophanes because they have insisted on making him a didactic sermonizer. We wonder what terrible work some of them would make if they attempted to write a commentary on Mark Twain. Just think of the pages of learned disquisition which an erudite German commentator might make upon the phrase with which Scottie puzzled the parson in "Roughing It," when he spoke of not "shaking his mother"! Imagine the seismic learning which might be put into an attempt to connect this phrase with the worship of Poseidon, "the Earth-shaker," then showing perhaps how naturally it was related to the worship of the earth as the mother of which the earthquake was simply a form of cosmological hysterics! Aristophanes cannot stand this treatment. It is only by transmigration of soul that the spirit of the dramatist or comedian can pass over into the translator. In Prof. White's rendering we had not dry bones of exegesis or philology, but the veritable Aristophanes addressing an appreciative audience in the modern Athens of the New World. I went away convinced that Aristophanes could write his play just as well in English as in Greek, and that perhaps he did.

Brebities.

Unity and the Minister, a Calcutta paper, says of the money raised in this country to sustain Mr. Mozoomdar in his work, "We are thankful to our American brethren for having relieved our apostolic brother from his long-felt want."

About five hundred soda-water venders in New York went to the city hall the other day to see the mayor in regard to their licenses. It is needless to say that the column was sparkling and effervescent, and that all flavors were represented.

On another page will be found the programme of the National Conference of Charities and Correction, which holds its session in New Haven, Conn., May 24-30. Many interesting papers are promised, and there should be a large attendance.

The Boston Transcript says: "The acceptance of the pulpit of King's Chapel by Rev. Howard N. Brown of Brookline confirms and deepens the satisfaction which was felt at the time a call was extended to him. The dignity and power of King's Chapel will certainly be sustained under his ministry, and he will bring to it a mature mind attuned to the thought of the age and consecrated to the best ideals of church work."

The "Greek National Calendar for 1895," prepared by Konstantin P. Skopos, and published in Athens by Konstantinides, contains a portrait and sketch of Michael Anagnos, written by Mr. Ph. Paraskeviades of Athens. The noble work which Mr. Anagnos has done in the education of the blind, as well as the remarkable contribution of his father-in-law, Dr. Howe, are gratefully recognized. The Greeks may well be proud of Mr. Anagnos; and the best way Americans can show their gratitude is by giving him an earnest and adequate support in his work.

Every young couple beginning to plan for a home of their own ought to read together "The House Beautiful," by William C. Gannett, recently published in pamphlet form by James H. West. It costs fifteen cents, but its value is only to be estimated in terms of the spirit. Older people may well read it, too; and, though it will doubtless make them ache with the thought of unfulfilled ideals and slighted opportunities, yet that kind of ache ought not to be unwelcome.

The Interior, commenting on the pope's encyclical addressed to the English people, says: "His irenic encyclical breathes good will and kindly feeling for the race for whom numerous of his predecessors had only stern malediction. It is a grateful contrast to see, instead of a scowling pontiff ransacking the Vatican armory for thunderbolts to hurl at the pestilent heretics, an aged but gentle shepherd piping peaceful and alluring tunes to win back the straying sheep who for the last three centuries have been feeding in alien pastures. The good old man in all the gentleness of his kindly heart professes love and admiration for the English people. There is no need to question his sincerity."

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I see that the lesson to Sunday-school teachers at Channing Hall on May 25 is on "The Resurrection of Jesus," and that this is the subject on the Sunday following in the Sunday-schools. May I call attention to the sermon on the Resurrection by Dr. Furness, which we now fortunately possess in the shape of a Christian Register tract, so that it is easily attainable by all? This explanation of the facts accompanying the Resurrection is so interesting that it would be a pity for our younger teachers and older scholars to lose this opportunity. To the older Unitarians this explanation is familiar from Dr. Furness's former books. To some of us it seems the most interesting and remarkable piece of New Testament criticism that we have ever known,—entirely unique, illuminating the history as nothing else has ever done. L. F. C.

SOUTHERN REPRESENTATION.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Permit me to call the attention of the readers of your paper to the report of the Nominating Committee of the American Unitarian Association. The Southern States contain nearly one-third of the population of the United States.

With conditions peculiar to themselves, with theological, industrial, and social problems essentially their own, so uninfluenced by immigration that only two per cent. of its population are foreign-born, of all parts of the republic, they ought to be represented in the directorship of an organization which aims to be American. So far as I know, they have never been so represented. Vice-presidencies may be complimentary; but they are certainly not in any practical sense in the organization of the American Unitarian Association representative. The South ought also to have its own special Committee on Ministerial Fellowship. Such alone is competent to judge of a religious situation which has no analogy elsewhere in the United States.

A MATTER OF BUSINESS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I understand that there is to be time allowed at the morning meeting of the Unitarian Association, Tuesday, May 28, for open discussion of subjects relating to our work. I therefore venture to give notice of the following vote, which I should like to submit to your readers, with the hope of getting suggestions about it, and at least of preparing the minds of delegates for its consideration. Does it not commend itself as a perfectly fair proposition? If this is not so, I am quite willing to be shown why not, and even to save the time of the Association by withdrawing it from further discussion. CHARLES F. DOLE.

The vote, subject to improvement, is as follows:—

"Whereas the free system of sittings in church is best suited to efficient missionary work,

"Voted, That the board of directors are requested to take such action, with due reference to special conditions and the time required for change of method, as to make the free system the rule for all churches which have the benefit of the missionary money of the Association."

THE RELIGION OF WHITTIER'S POETRY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

There has of late been considerable discussion concerning the religious views of Whittier. The Outlook has claimed him as an evangelical or orthodox Christian, the ground of the claim being certain theological statements made by the poet. It is noteworthy, however, that Dr. Lyman Abbott did not in his sermon make a single citation from Whittier's poetry. To many it seems more important to consider the general tone and tendency of the poems rather than the nature of one or two detached theological statements. It is a suggestive fact that the sermons of Unitarian preachers on Whittier, as reported in the papers, have been largely made up of quotations from his poetry. If the poetry is orthodox, how comes it that the orthodox do not cite it, while the liberals do? Whittier's poetry has also furnished many hymns for public worship. Who uses these hymns? A comparison of a number of hymn-books gives the following significant result.

Among orthodox hymnals, the Episcopal, containing 679 hymns, has none of Whittier's; the Andover "Hymns of the Faith," with 655 hymns, has 1 of Whittier's; the Methodist Episcopal hymnal has 1,117, of which 2 are by Whittier; the "Baptist Praise Book" (ed. 1871) has 1,311, of which 2 are Whittier's; Dr. Robinson's "Spiritual Songs" (edition of 1878), with 1,086, has 3 by Whittier; and Dr. Abbott's new "Plymouth Hymnal," containing 638 hymns, has 6 of Whittier's.

Turning to Unitarian hymnals, we find that Mr. Foote's "Hymns of the Church Universal," with 650 hymns, has 9 by Whittier; the English "Essex Hall Hymnal," containing 512 hymns, has 9 by Whittier; Mrs. T. C. Williams's hymnal has 382, of which 11 are Whittier's; the American Unitarian Association book (revised edition), with 882, has 16 by Whittier; and "Unity Hymns and Chorals," containing 253, has 21 by Whittier.

Six orthodox hymnals, containing 5,486 hymns, have but 14 by Whittier; while five Unitarian hymnals, containing only 2,679 hymns, have 66 by Whittier. Whereas, in the evangelical books, Whittier's hymns are used but once in 391 times, the Unitarian books use them once in every 40 hymns. In a word, the Unitarian books use Whittier's hymns nearly ten times as frequently as do the orthodox books. And it would seem that the more "radical" the Unitarianism, the more frequently does it turn to Whittier's poetry for means of expression.

Whatever may be said, then, about detached statements or remarks made by Whittier, the use made of his poetry as hymns by different types of Christianity confirms the impression derived from reading the poetry,—that it is, in its general spirit and tendency, distinctly and emphatically "liberal," and not "evangelical." Others may, if they will, claim that the formal creed of Whittier is orthodox; but it is pretty evident that the poetry of Whittier is liberal. They may have the formal creed; but the poetry with its sweet and simple faith is ours. We use it frequently and naturally; for it expresses our broad, simple gospel of spiritual religion, which assures men that "The white wings of the Holy Ghost Stoop, unseen, o'er the heads of all."

THE FAIR COUNTRY.*

BY JULIA DODSON SHEPPARD.

Pilgrims and sojourners here we are:
Weary and worn, we journey far,
Defeat and death our common lot.
What keeps us from despair, if not

The soul of things? that country fair
Whose border-land is everywhere,
Whose rhythm, surging soft and low,
Can comfort even earthly woe,

Whose music soars aloft, and sings,
And lifts us on immortal wings,
Above life's drudgery and care.
O song divine! O country fair!

PICTURES FOR HOSPITALITY.

BY JAMES LEONARD CORNING, SR.

II.

What is known as hospitality in conventional usage has not seldom strange incongruities. I remember once sitting down to a generous meal in a neighbor's house on a winter day, with the mercury at so low a figure that the hostess found it needful to wrap herself in a blanket shawl and the host to wear his overcoat. This rather ludicrous set of incongruities was to be credited to a parsimony in the matter of fuel which certainly was not admirable; and all the fine dishes were spoiled, and the hospitality rendered more or less of a masquerade.

An experience kindred to this I often encounter in houses which, in much of their equipment and provision for the entertainment of guests, are hospices of the first order. The incongruities are of various kinds, and almost every home has more or less of them. But those which I am thinking of now have to do with the pictorial equipment of a house to the end of making guests welcome within its walls. Probably it has occurred to few people how egregiously, albeit without evil intent, the laws of hospitality are set at defiance in this relation. In the pictorial equipment of a home it is certainly true that the noble end of making a hospice, consistent in all its belongings, is not considered, as it ought to be, as something having to do with personal consecration. But, even with this condition assured, there is a widely prevalent and lamentable ignorance of what is necessary to the end sought in the pictorial equipment of a home.

And just here is the place to say that the furnishing of a house with pictures is a work only to be done with the greatest deliberation. It is the one thing, in the making of a home and a hospice, which cannot be hurried without great risk.

During a sojourn in Italy some years ago I fell in with one of the money-princes of America, who within the limits of a few weeks expended $70,000 for about a carload of paintings for his magnificent mansion over the sea. In such an insane venture one could hardly help getting some prizes; but, also, one could hardly help making some huge blunders. Some of that carload of pictures were, doubtless, more or less hospitable; but other some were, doubtless, far enough from deserving such a designation.

Without attempting to classify all the paintings which might help to make a hospice of a home, I will specify only a few which, it seems to me, should have a prominent place. A noble historical painting in a house is a veritable benediction, provided it is wisely chosen, with a distinct purpose of beneficent ministry. I know a house in New York City which contains such a painting; and, though the architecture and furniture are exceptionally grand and elegant, it is probable that in the coming years that house will be better known as the conservatory of that single painting than from any other circumstance.

I was once invited by the proprietor of one of the most magnificent mansions in America to look at a great historical painting by a great German master. Upon asking for an explanation of the work, I found, to my surprise, that nobody in the house could tell me anything about it. By the merest accident, it happened that I had seen in Europe the original of which this was a replica, and had carefully written in my note-book a description of it in its minutest details. The theme belonged to a rather obscure corner of Roman history, with which not one person in a thousand is familiar, and about as few care much about it. And so I got a vote of thanks for copying out of my note-book the explanation of this painted dream of Nebuchadnezzar, and leaving it with the proprietor for use in the enlightenment of future visitors.

This incident suggests an indispensable condition of hospitality in this department of art. An historical painting, to be really hospitable, should have a theme familiar and popular. Otherwise it is a foreign dialect; and, however it may appeal to the low instincts of self-admiration, it has no word of welcome in it, except such as requires a dictionary for its interpretation.

The classes of subordinate rank into which painting divides itself are familiar to all. By common consent the animal kingdom, and what is called "still-life," in both the animal and vegetable worlds, are invoked for material with which to adorn the walls of the dining-room. There is certainly a measure of hospitality in these, provided always that the examples are wisely chosen. But there is a great world of genre, which, if ignored in this particular relation, will leave serious incongruities in the one room of the house which is supposed, above all others, to give a welcome to every guest. A painting like Defregger's "Tischgebet" on the wall of a dining-room is in perfect harmony with the purpose of the room, and is, moreover, an eloquent sermon on gratitude to the Giver of all good. I could mention many others of kindred character which, for real hospitality in a dining-room, are far more deserving of places of honor on the walls than most animal and still-life pieces ever can be. But my readers will easily recall examples out of a populous constituency.

To the high and noble ends of a hospice it need not be said that well-painted landscapes are eminently fitting. Yet here the factor of personal association ought not to be forgotten. As a rule, in hanging landscapes on the walls of my house, I would try to kindle pleasant memories, not only in the members of the household, but in the invited guests. If you can help your guests to live over again the pleasantest experiences of their lives by reviving the scenes of nature which have enchanted them in other days, you will add a large factor to the welcome of your home.

Concerning pictures which are hospitable, I have reserved the department of genre for my final word, because, as I think, it is the most important of all for the beneficent ministry of which I am speaking. I do not quite know, and have never found anybody who was able to tell me, how the word "genre" came into use to the end of individualizing a particular domain of art. But this is of no great account, if we only understand that the word stands for a great and populous world of art, whose mission is to hold a mirror before our human life in all its phases, and show us in kaleidoscopic variety and manifoldness what sort of creatures we are and upon what a checker-board Fate is pushing and pulling us about. You perceive, do you not, that the real master in this domain of art is like a great pianist, such as Rubinstein, or a great violinist, such as Paganini, and can sweep all the chords of human feeling, from the highest reaches of ecstasy to the lowest abysses of woe. Our American art has not yet taken this department seriously in hand, albeit the materials are practically inexhaustible. But we shall some day have an American genre, with great native masters for its interpreters.

You may depend upon it that we have now come upon the most effective help to hospitality in art. And yet this one factor is sadly left out in the art of our American homes,—partly, no doubt, for the reason that it is not of home production, but for the present must be mostly imported from abroad. I went into a magnificent mansion in a great American city not long ago, and among the many paintings hanging on the walls of every room there was not a single genre.

But the new suburban house stands waiting yonder in its nest of forest and meadow. Its walls are still vacant; and we will hope that the high ends of hospitality will, in this instance, be intelligently considered.

THE CLIMATE FOR INVALIDS.

BY ENOCH KNIGHT.

My attention has been called to an editorial in a recent issue of the Boston Sunday Herald in regard to the Invalid Aid Society (consumptives), also to the article of Dr. Nichols in the March Review of Reviews. Still another recent article in a leading weekly treats practically of the same subject by setting forth what the Department of Agriculture is about to undertake, nothing less than an elaborate series of observations as to climatic effects upon health. There is small doubt this will lead to a permanent climatic bureau. It is very curious how these things go, appearing in single minds and associated efforts at the same time in various and distant portions of the country. More than forty years ago Lowell, in "My Garden Acquaintances," gossiping about the weather, said in a whimsical conceit, perhaps, "Who dares say we may not, in the future, by a simultaneous observation of the weather-vane and the mercury at different points, be able to predict the coming storm, and provide against it ere the blow is delivered?" (I do not pretend to quote the exact words, as I have not the book at hand.) In less than twenty years the present Weather Bureau was well under way, upon the basis herein hinted at.

Probably the first thing that enlisted consumptives in the ever-swelling ranks of climate-hunters was a War Department report of comparatively recent date, which set forth that Fort Kent in Maine and Fort Snelling in Minnesota were the most healthful army posts as to pulmonary complaints. This sent many patients into the pine woods of Northern Maine, and still more into Minnesota. But it soon came to be understood that no climate is a specific for the disease, and that the place where pure, dry air can be had the year through, with immunity from storms and cold, that drive one too much indoors, is the best and the only place, really, to expect help from. When it was found that patients could not stand it to be housed in a stifling heat several months a year, as the terribly harsh Northern and Eastern winters made necessary, they turned for a season to Colorado. At length it began to be understood that high altitudes did not necessarily mean dryness, and that only patients in early stages of the disease were benefited by being made to pant for breath, thereby expanding the lungs. Then began a scattering, mainly to the Southern and the Pacific States.

I propose—since it has happened to me to be compelled to make wide inquiries and observations, and to write not a few private and public letters on the subject—to submit herewith some special considerations in behalf of Southern California. My interest in this is greatly enhanced at finding so many excellent persons connected with the enterprise whom I have met here, and whom I knew at home, being myself a New Englander. It is assuring to learn from the sources above mentioned that "climatic conditions are not yet well enough understood to make it wise to fix upon a single location" where consumptives can be sent. Southern Kansas is mentioned, and also New Mexico, as having claims to be desirable points at which a "Home" could be founded. It is not pleasant to assail another's claim; but can it be that any regularly storm-swept region of country, with tremendous ranges of temperature, ought to be seriously considered in such a connection? And, if one were to go among the ranches of New Mexico and see, as one must see, the prevalence of catarrh actually developed by the terrible winds, the blinding alkali dust, and the almost lightning changes of temperature, he would at least be prepared to act conservatively, if not to leave that region entirely out of account. There are beautiful regions of country and seasons of perfect weather "east of the mountains"; but there is no all-the-year and out-of-doors weather equal to that which comprises the rim of the Colorado desert and the region westward to the sea, as it is respectively opened by the San Geronio Pass, with Los Angeles as the base and centre. It is here that one can find equability and dryness, with almost complete immunity from what may be called "rough" weather. It is true that at some points in the mountains the daily changes are great. It sometimes seems as if each day the summer goes out with the sun and winter comes with the stars; but one knows to a minute when the cold falls, and can provide against it as easily as one can keep clear of a railway train that is on schedule time. It is true, also, that near the ocean there are morning fogs in the spring and early summer, which, while perhaps not really unhealthful, are disagreeable and disappointing, because so many picturesque prevaricators have ignored or denied their existence; but there is no spot of earth where a consumptive can have so much sunshine and warmth as he can have here by making his winter sojourn along the rim of desert at the base of the San Bernardino and San Jacinto Mountains, and from Indio south and west, taking in what is known as Palm Valley. It is a low level, where the lungs are filled without effort; and it is absolute desert dryness. The rainfall averages about three inches for the whole year; and the sunshine is as faithful as is the unvarying west wind, which, week after week and month after month, brings over mesa and mountains the sweet breath of the great ocean. Here one can bask, if not actually bake, in the sun the winter long, subject to the few days of rain and the occasional storm of sand that is stirred up by the rush of wind through some mountain pass.

As to accommodations for sojourners, they are as yet meagre. At Indio is a good depot hotel; and some new and pretty cottages have been lately built, everything being well conducted. Trees are widely planted, water abundant; and there are no discomforts except the noise of trains. One may find about the same state of things further east, at Yuma; but the preference is plainly in favor of keeping nearer the desert's edge to the south-west of Indio, in the niches in the canyons along the eastern base of the San Jacinto Mountains, leaving the railroad at Palm Springs Station. Here is where desert warmth and rich farm and fruit lands meet. Palm Valley, with its little settlement of "Palm Springs," is strikingly beautiful in location and in detail. Many hundreds of acres are under cultivation, and many hundreds more are equally available. It is costly to get supplies in and products out, although the post-office is only six miles from the railway; and thus, naturally, the region is little known to the outside world. Here Dr. Murray, a Scotch physician, found health many years ago, and has established a little health resort, where he cares for a few winter sojourners. One feature of the valley is the famous grove of more than two thousand giant palms, from eighty to a hundred feet high, the seeds of which are sold the country over. Water comes plunging down from the snows five thousand feet up the mountains, and needs no ice. I know nothing like this combination for winter warmth and peacefulness, nor wonder that some gentlemen who are about making some farm improvements further up the valley have named it "Garden of Eden"; and they are not Californians, either!

Now, this sheltered edge of the desert is the true winter home of any victim of phthisis. If he can find a place to sleep and wholesome food to eat, there is nothing like the life he can lead here for absolute rest and immunity from storm or disturbing change of any sort. If he can also do a little prospecting or other moving about, with some semblance of employment or plans for the future, all the better. But this is the winter home of the person who has weak lungs and wants to keep them filled with pure, dry air without effort; for he can practically live out of doors in the blessed sun every day.

As to the summer, when he would have to move to escape the heat after June for three or four months, there is comfort anywhere in Southern California, where the ocean winds have play. In fact, the summer is, by all odds, the best part of the year here. Except in some of the valleys, which are heated ovens in August and September, there is no such thing as oppressive heat, such heat as is known on the other side of the continent. For six months or more the winds blow steadily from the west, to supply the desert needs, making it cool even there at night. From the Sierra Madre Mountains to the sea the summer is bright and wholesome, an almost unbroken procession of golden days, with blessed sleep at night, if only one can get blankets enough.

One more consideration. This is a serious matter, and there is nothing to be preferred above the truth. Do not, I beg, establish great "Homes" anywhere, even if and when the climate most curative for phthisis be admitted to have been found. A "Home" is a delusion and a disaster from the first. This very coast has had a cordon of sanitariums extending throughout its whole course of settlement; but all have been unprofitable, and most of them have gone the way of all such mistakes everywhere. Real invalids will not go where many others are sure to be found. This is especially true of consumptives. They must have something in surroundings to help on their natural hope, that springs eternal. Under the restraints of municipal laws, and the necessary discipline of the hospital established from public necessity, patients consent to be massed; but the aversion of the average consumptive to enter the invalid class, and consent to consort with others, is founded in the highest wisdom as well as instinct. Money, advice, and friendly helps of all sorts are needed by hundreds of poor creatures whose lungs might heal in the dry, out-of-doors weather of which I have spoken; but do not make the mistake of founding a vast, dismal, and isolated institution, which would make moving about impossible and individual freedom a mockery.

People with merely fancied ailments or real ones, if they be fashionable and of the kind that do not kill, will gather in herds, and sometimes seem even to find a sort of distinction and delight in it all; but it is simply because they do not take sickness seriously. Many of the great pleasure resorts are illustrations of this. One of the liveliest gatherings I ever looked upon was one year after the close of the regular summer season in the White Mountains, when not less than two hundred distinguished citizens of New England put their heads together at the Twin Mountain House, under the stimulus of hay fever and half-fare, and actually celebrated two days, sometimes with a fervor little short of ecstasy. But they who have been compelled to confess to chronic invalidism, and to face and fight death with daily fear of failing strength, have a different business on hand, and cannot bear the ordeal of constant contact with a hundred other shapes and phases of kindred suffering.

A long residence in Southern California, and faithful talks with medical men who could not be suspected of sinister or whimsical views on such a theme, and much personal observation, lead me to urge the above considerations upon all who are seriously interested in finding the best conditions for consumptive patients. There are those who will declare that there is no need to go over into the desert in the winter, that the belt of country this side of the mountains which I have described is good enough. But there are disagreeable days, and not a few trying changes in weather, from December to April, that must be considered. These, too, are aggravated by the discomfort that comes of so many poorly built houses and inadequate means of warming them. A few years will change this latter objection, but nothing can ever make the rainy season in or about Los Angeles equal the desert for health or comfort. It is incomparably better than the winter anywhere in the East any time of year, as most people admit who have honestly tried both; but the objectionable features of the winter can and ought to be avoided by everybody who needs and can avail himself of the best there is to be had.

Given the general climatic conditions of the region around Los Angeles, with the western edge of the Colorado Desert for winter outing, and no other point on the continent can be seriously compared with it for healthfulness and comfort.

THE DERVISH.*

BY RAFFI (MELIK HAGOPIAN).

[Translated from the Araxes, an illustrated Armenian magazine devoted to literature and fine arts, by A. B. S.]

The dervishes play a great rôle in the intellectual life of Persia. They are also called "fakir," "kalandar," which means poor. The dervish can easily be recognized by his customs. He is a man with long hair, which is either tied into a bunch with black strings or worn flowing. On his head he wears a red cap on which is embroidered some talismanic verse. A long white shirt comes down to his bare feet, bound about his loins with a broad girdle with talismanic verses upon it. He has a lion or tiger skin upon his shoulders, and hangs on his naked arms his "kashguil," a cup made of a coconut shell. He has in his hand a big club of the cotton-tree, and by his side hangs his "nafir" (horn). In every city of Persia one meets such men, sometimes wholly naked except a short garment which hangs from the loins. These are the dervishes.

*The root of the word "dervish" is "devr," which means to wander.

The dervish is friendly to everybody. When he meets you, he carries his right hand to his forehead, and salutes you, saying, "Ay-voollah" or "Yah hoo-hak."

He passes through the covered market-places, singing either from Hafiz or from Massnevi, or the miracles of Amir-el-Momni. He is a poet: he sings love-songs. His voice echoes with sweet melodies from the arches of the dome of the bazaar. The shop-keepers love their singer, and each one puts into his "kashguil" a piece of copper coin. The dervish, after finishing his "devran" (tour), comes out of the bazaar, and takes from the money which he has collected as much as he needs for the day's living, and divides the rest among those who are poorer than himself. In the evening he is again poor, and has not a single piece of coin.

The dervish has no home, nor any place, nor any country: he has nothing. His home is the whole world; his family, humanity. He travels from country to country, singing; and everywhere the table of God is open before him. These half-naked wanderers find a hearty welcome in the homes of the richest "Hajis" or in the palaces of the great "Khans." Every man is anxious to hear his wisdom, and so gives him a place upon his carpet. But the dervish is not ambitious. He does not love the gorgeous palaces: he visits the cottages of the poor; he passes his nights on the streets, in half-ruined buildings. He sleeps wherever the night falls upon him.

The dervish is a communist. A few days before the festivals of Nev-rouz (New-day) he sets up his poor tent opposite the palace of the rich. He demands of him some part of the wealth which, as he believes, the rich man has confiscated from the property of the community. The rich man has no right to expel him from his door, unless he fulfils his demand. In passing by these tents of the dervishes, men think of Diogenes and the tub in which he sat.

Some of the dervishes are artists, and live by their labor. There are among them physicians, sculptors, apothecaries, painters, and engravers. A copy of their ornamental writing costs a good deal. Some of them have devoted themselves to finding the philosophic stone of the dark ages. They melt and burn sulphur, mercury, and other minerals with the desire of making gold.

In the cities of Persia special places have been built which are called "Tekyé." A "Tekyé" is a building in the form of an amphitheatre, with a square in the centre, and small rooms round about it in which the dervishes reside. I once entered in Shiraz one of those rooms, as I was told that the head of the dervishes was residing there. It was winter. As soon as the door of the room was opened, a strong and disagreeable odor greeted me. This odor was occasioned by the frequent smoking of "hasheesh," opium, and other intoxicating drugs. I asked them to leave the door open for a little fresh air.

"The guest's honor must always be revered," said one of the dervishes, and left the door open, although it was very cold.

They were four in number. The master sat upon the skin of a tiger: others on the skins of lions, panthers, and different wild beasts. One of them offered a skin to me, and I sat on it.

Each one of these dervishes belonged to a different nationality and to a different race. The head was a Persian. He was of middle age, tall and thin, and burned by the sun in his long journeys. His dark face, black and fiery eyes, at once expressed genius and inspired awe.

One of them was an Ethiopian, a young man, naked with the exception of white drawers. He was lying down in a corner in deep sleep. His black complexion in the darkness of the room was not noticeable. Only once in a while the white of his eyes and his white teeth shone in the darkness, when his face took an extraordinary shape with occasional laughter. Intoxicated by the opium, he was in the realm of beautiful and attractive dreams.

Another was an Afghan, a short fellow with black, luxuriant hair, gloomy visage, and small bright eyes.

The fourth was a Hindu, with long soft hair and glossy, copper-colored face.

A mangal, an Oriental heating apparatus like a vase, made of iron, bronze, or clay, stood in the centre of the room, with a charcoal fire in it; and they sat around it.

"How did it happen to my lord to come to the abode of the poor?" asked the master of me.

"I am also a dervish," I answered, "and travelling from land to land. It was pleasant for me to come and learn about the condition of my brethren."

"Ay-voollah," exclaimed the master, "then we are brethren." After placing his hand in mine, he carried it first to his mouth and then to his forehead.

"Of what nationality are you?" he asked of me.

"Armenian," I answered.

"To what religion do you belong?"

"The Christian."

The last words caused the lips of the master to curve with satiric laughter, and he replied,—

"You said you were a dervish, but the dervishes do not belong to any nation or religion."

I felt my mistake in my words, and answered,—

"We are that kind of dervishes."

"The founder of the religion of Christians, Messiah, was a perfect dervish. He belonged to the Ahl-i-Moohabbet (the people of love). He hated riches; he was a friend of the poor and wiped the tears of the afflicted."

"Yes, he preached love, and took upon him the heavy burden of the sinner," said I. "But his successors, your caliphs, did not become the real and worthy followers of their master. They loved the world and its glories, and sacrificed holiness to their passions."

The Ethiopian dervish, who was lying in the corner, interrupted our conversation with a song, which he suddenly began to sing in his sleep.

"Last night our brother was much affected by the hasheesh," said the master. "He is yet charmed with beautiful dreams."

The Hindu at this time took out of his little bag a long piece of opium, chopped it into smaller pieces, and put them into his palm, then put it in his mouth, and swallowed all at once. I was surprised. A single piece of the opium was enough to poison and kill the healthiest man; but he ate it like candy, without showing any sign of dislike.

The master lighted his small narguileh, the bottle of which was made of a calabash, put upon it a little henbane, and began to smoke. The others likewise began to smoke and eat opium, and after a few minutes the small room was again full of suffocating smoke. The intoxicating power of the opium and hasheesh began to exert its influence. By and by the dervishes became more lively and cheerful. They offered to let me smoke from their narguileh and ghaylan; but I declined, saying, "I am not used to it," and lighted a cigarette.

Our conversation continued long. I noticed that these dervishes belonged to a sect which is called Ahl-i-Hakikat, which means followers of truth. They do not accept any truth unless it is manifested by the supernatural power. In order to reach the truth, they have to pass through the following two degrees: first, love, upon which they put the foundation of their morality; second, the tarikah, ceremonial forms, whereby a man kills in himself by austerities and numerous tortures the bodily passions, and purifies and cleanses himself and enters into the ways of the spirit. Then he reaches the truth.

Many of the dervishes belong to different sects, as Tahri, Babi, Sophi, Ourafa, etc. . . . There are also many swindlers among them who are engaged in sorcery, enchantment, and divination. The Mollas (Mohammedan priests or scholars) do not love the dervishes, and consider them infidels, as they do not perform the laws of shariat. But the higher class of people, the nobility, respect and revere them, and like to hear their wisdom.

The dervishes, the wandering missionaries of wisdom, might be useful in introducing and spreading new ideas into Persia, although they have no definite direction now, and each one has his own ways, opinions, and beliefs. Yet they have the liberty of free thinking.

THE JEWEL OF TRUTH.

One of the most notable of Russian Jews is Jaakoff Prelooker, founder of the new Israel movement. Former head-master of the government school, Odessa, he came into contact, as every reformer does in Russia, with the government, the priesthood, and the press censorship; and he had to tread the well-worn path of the exile. Mr. Prelooker has made himself known as a popular lecturer on Russian subjects and the status of women in various parts of England and Scotland.

In a recent pamphlet he has worked out a religious allegory prettily and effectively. The idea is the loss of the jewel of truth through sheer excess of anxiety to preserve it. An old man left to his children a priceless diamond, with the assurance that so long as they possessed it they would be happy. They put the diamond in a case. The next generation added a second case, the next a third, and so on, until the covering, case upon case, grew to the size of a house; and the latest generations worshipped the case, but knew nothing about the diamond. When One came charged with enlightening his brethren as to the treasure concealed in the great box, he was laden with indignities and crucified. Addressed primarily to Russian Jews, the allegory has its lesson for the people of every religion.—Sunday School Chronicle.

OUR SOUTHERN WORK.

THE BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

Among the comparatively small number of Unitarians who realize that we have a slowly, but steadily growing Southern Conference is the National Alliance of Unitarian Women. Fortunately for the difficult work in the vast reach of country called the South, the Alliance has, from the start, been the active and most effective friend of the Southern work conducted by those patient, able, far-seeing, devoted superintendents, Rev. and Mrs. George Leonard Chaney. Not to recognize the importance of Mrs. Chaney's part in her husband's work would be most unjust and unappreciative; for it is easy to see that, by her many fine spiritual, intellectual, and social gifts, she is able to follow up and save to the cause much effort which would otherwise be wasted.

Among the other persons who are in the open secret of the slow but substantial progress of our Southern work are those who take time and pains to attend our national and local conferences and the annual meetings of the American Unitarian Association. Add to these those who, unable to attend these meetings, faithfully support and read the Unitarian, the Christian Register, the Southern Unitarian, and you have a total of perhaps several thousand of our Unitarian people who have minds and hearts alive to the great future everywhere awaiting the wise planting of liberal religious ideas in inexpensive yet attractive chapels in the larger cities and towns of America.

For a careful, compact, and masterly summing-up of the present Southern situation, read Mr. Chaney's picturesque, statistical, prophetic report read at the last National Conference. For the very latest word as to the progress of the work, be sure to read the secretary's official report of the annual meeting held last week in Baltimore, in the June number of the Southern Unitarian.

You don't take in that attractive little paper? Then please enclose $1 to the paper, P.O. Box 643, Atlanta, Ga., asking that one copy of the paper may be sent regularly to your neighbor, and a second to yourself. The subscription price is only 50 cents; but one thousand new subscribers are needed immediately, to put the paper on a modest business basis.

Our Southern cause is most fortunate in numbering among its few churches some of the most commodious and attractive in the country. Among these are the churches in Baltimore, Washington, Charleston, Cincinnati, Louisville, and St. Louis.

However distasteful to the free, robust, open-eyed New England Unitarian the unwholesome, somewhat too ecclesiastical flavor in the religious atmosphere of the Baltimore pulpit, it is generally admitted that few of our churches anywhere have a better material plant for the effective conduct of all sorts of religious and educational work than the First Independent Church of Baltimore. Although not numerically strong, the church has a few wealthy and very generous members, who loyally support all its varied enterprises. Within two years the society has raised, beyond the sum required for the usual running expenses, nearly $20,000 for the very successful and beautiful renovation of its interior. Mr. Weld is not only a very eloquent and effective preacher, but also a positive and pronounced ecclesiastic of Presbyterian antecedents, a most successful and untiring drill-master and extractor of work from both willing and reluctant parishioners. When he conducts the church drill, everybody and everything jumps; i. e., all the women. The men are generally excused from other than routine duty, he himself serving as president of his trustees, superintendent of his Sunday-school, president of the guild, the Christian Union, and the Post-office Mission. He also conducts a confirmation class, and with the help of an assistant minister attends to the various other pastoral and ministerial functions of the church.

It would be difficult to match the company of accomplished, devoted, and lovely women who serve constantly and most effectively at his innumerable church tables.

It is easy both to exaggerate and to underestimate the readiness of the more educated Southern mind for advanced thought. We suspect modern-thought tendencies have penetrated deeper than as yet appears; and it is very clear that progressive thought and sentiment in the South need not only to be wisely met and ministered to, but also to be hopefully led and generously fed. To send only the more conservative, pietistic type of Unitarian preacher to the Southern field would be a pitiable and gigantic mistake. The South already needs our later as well as our earlier prophets; and we trust that, in addition to these strong men already in the field, some of our pronounced but conservative advanced thinkers and preachers—men who know how to handle their mental furniture skilfully, and with a clear purpose in view—may soon feel a call to the steady, hard work and ill-paid service of our new Southern pastorates. If such men cannot as yet be established as Southern pastors, they can at least participate occasionally in missionary visits to some leading Southern cities, when money can be provided to cover the very considerable item of travelling expenses.

As Rev. C. J. K. Jones—our bright, versatile, and able Louisville preacher—remarked, the South needs our ablest, most devoted ministers,—men of staying powers, who can give much and live happily on little. Among the veterans now in the field, all able men, are Messrs Shippen, Thayer, Snyder, Jones, and Weld. Messrs. Whitman, Pierce, Free, Cole, Clare, and Seaton are all faithful and efficient workers among the younger men.

The newly elected president of the conference, Frank N. Hartwell of Louisville, is a business man of fine spirit and excellent address. Few of our older conferences can boast of a more ready or winsome chairman.

From Mr. Chaney's admirable and prophetic plan of Southern work, already referred to, we quote the following main points of the work as laid out by his far-seeing mind:—

"Ten new churches to be planted during the remaining six years of the nineteenth century, one or more in every Southern State; six local conferences to be established, all embraced in one Southern Conference; the Southern Unitarian, now poorly supported, to be improved, enlarged, placed, if possible, on a paying basis.

"To man these ten new churches, money enough must be raised to put ten strong ministers in ten leading Southern cities. The right men are ready to go. The selected cities waiting for them are Knoxville, Charleston, W. Va., Nashville, Galveston, Houston, Dallas, Fort Worth, Vicksburg, Birmingham, Jacksonville. In each of these cities are people who will pay their share, if we of the North and East will only begin churches there. Man those cities and keep them manned six years, and they will recruit enough from the growing States in which they stand to give our work of church extension in the South in the coming time the advantage of local sympathy and support.

A clear, judicious, well-considered plan, needing only the necessary money from those who have or can earn it for its speedy fulfilment,—why not lend a hand to such a noble purpose, so wisely planned, to be executed by such an able, plucky, persistent, untiring inspirer and superintendent?

Wanted immediately, one thousand believers in Bishop Chaney's good work and great opportunity for the successful planting of rational, ethical, spiritual religion in the New South. Checks and money-orders may be addressed this week to Rev. George L. Chaney, Richmond, Va. This appeal is made by a friend of the Southern cause without Mr. Chaney's knowledge. It is safe to say, however, that no money sent to him will be wasted or returned in kind.

A NEW YORK UNITARIAN.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

REV. J. P. SHEAFE has accepted the cordial invitation extended to him by the church in Harvard, Mass. He was the first and only candidate.

THE Berry Street Conference will meet in the vestry of Arlington Street Church on Wednesday, May 29, at ten o'clock A.M. The address will be given by Rev. Charles G. Ames of Boston.

REV. HOWARD N. BROWN has resigned his pulpit of the Unitarian church in Brookline, Mass., to accept the call to King's Chapel, Boston.

THE annual meeting and dinner of the Meadville Theological School Alumni Association will be held Wednesday, May 29, at 2 P.M., at the United States Hotel.

THE annual meeting of the National Guild Alliance will be held in Channing Hall, 25 Beacon Street, on Wednesday, May 29, at 3 o'clock P.M. President Rev. B. R. Bulkeley will preside, and other interesting speakers will be heard in the interest of guild work. Music will be furnished by the Guild Quartettes from Keene, N.H., and Concord, Mass. The delegate meeting for annual business will precede the mass-meeting in Room 10, 25 Beacon Street, at 2 o'clock P.M. A large attendance is desired. Laura B. Martine, Secretary.

OUT-OF-DOOR PREACHING.—Next Sunday afternoon, weather permitting, there will be a service of singing and preaching on Boston Common, conducted by Rev. Edward Everett Hale and Rev. Albert Walkley. The speakers' platform will be a little south-west from the band-stand, under the shadow of the elms. The music will be led by a cornet, and the people will sing from printed slips. This is to be the first of a series of six services to be held on Sundays at the same place and hour, under joint arrangements of the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches and the Boston Association of Ministers.

ON May 1 the Society for Promoting Theological Education held its annual meeting at the Unitarian Building, and chose the following directors: George W. Briggs, Arthur T. Lyman, George S. Hale, John H. Morison, Henry G. Denny, Edward J. Young, James De Normandie, Howard N. Brown, and William H. Lyon. May 13 the board was organized by the election of Edward J. Young as president, William H. Lyon as secretary, and Henry G. Denny as treasurer, forming the executive committee. The usual provision was made for assistance to students of the Harvard Divinity School, and for the benefit of the library of the school.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Dr. William Everett will preach May 19. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

Ministers' Monday Club: May 20, 10.30 A.M. Rev. John M. Marsters will preside. Rev. William R. Alger will give the essay, on "Historic Sketch of the Evolution and Practice of Prayer."

Arlington Street Church: The vesper services at Arlington Street Church have closed for the summer season, to be resumed in the fall. The church will be closed after June 2, to enable Messrs. Hutchins of Boston to begin work on the new electric organ, which will be placed there during the summer. The new organ will combine all the latest improvements, and will be of great power and sweetness. Dr. Herford will preach to his old parish on Sunday, October 20, and will receive a most cordial welcome. The present pastor, Rev. J. Cuckson, will spend his vacation at Tower Hill, Wayland, preaching occasionally, and answering the calls made upon him by his parishioners.

BALTIMORE, MD.—The First Independent Christ's Church (Unitarian) publishes a small pamphlet directory, giving the names and addresses of all the church officials, including the ushers, teachers, and members of all committees.

BROOKFIELD, MASS.—The second annual reunion and conference of the First Unitarian Church was held May 9. Two hundred and fifty people sat down at supper together. The main object of the meeting was to discuss the affairs of the church and to consider plans for the future. A report of especial interest came from the organ committee. A new organ has been put in, which, with the necessary alterations in the church, cost $2,334.16, raised by subscription. The pastor, Rev. W. L. Walsh, reported one hundred and thirty-five families in the parish, gave an account of work done, congratulated the parish on its prosperity, and thanked his friends for $100 that day received as a gift. The meeting closed with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne," after which thirty-one signed the church roll of membership. A young people's society was organized May 13. Its objects are: to interest our young people; to beautify our church; to encourage sociability and a closer fellowship; to carry our church to those who cannot come to it; to increase the working interest, so that our church shall pay larger dividends on the money invested in it.

HAVERHILL, MASS.—The First Parish finds itself at the close of the year free from debt, and with much cause for hope in the year to come. The last monthly tea-party was in charge of the gentlemen, who made a success of every feature, culinary, financial, and social. Reports were read from the different organizations connected with the parish,—Ladies' Circle, Women's Alliance, All Together Club (or Guild), Young People's Entertainment Society, Outing Club (boys), Twilight Club (young misses), Sunday-school, and Little Helpers. Gain in membership, balance in the treasury, and more interest was the general report. The society is a unit to co-operate with the new pastor, Rev. F. A. Gilmore, settled last fall, who has already taken very high rank among the ministerial workers of the city. The coming year promises abundant success to this old parish, which will next October celebrate its two hundred and fiftieth birthday.

HOPEDALE, MASS.—The parish here, of which Rev. Lewis G. Wilson is pastor, held a reunion and supper on May 2, with nearly one hundred and fifty present.

HOULTON, ME.—The Unitarian society at Houlton sends a cordial invitation to the Unitarians of Maine to attend the conference to be held in Houlton on the 25th, 26th, and 27th of June next. Further notice later.

HUMBOLDT, IA.—The parish supper of Unity Church, held May 7, was attended by over three hundred people; and much enthusiasm was expressed. Reports were read from the Sunday-school, Unity Club, the Ladies' Society. The church report showed that Rev. T. P. Byrnes, the pastor, has delivered during the year ninety-six sermons and lectures, organized two liberal societies in other towns, and done missionary work in fourteen different places in the State. The year has been one of general good results, and has added to the health and growth of the church. Mr. Byrnes has recently resigned the pastorate here which he has held for the past five years; and at the supper an earnest tribute of grateful affection for him and his wife and a sincere expression of sorrow for their leaving was read and heartily adopted.

HYDE PARK, MASS.—At a meeting of the Unitarian church of this place held Monday, May 6, Rev. A. G. Pettengill of Yarmouth, Me., received a unanimous call. The Unitarians in Maine have for some time recognized in Mr. Pettengill one of the ablest and most promising preachers of their State. They will be sorry to lose him, and Hyde Park will feel fortunate to secure him.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—With this month the Society for Ethical Culture completes the tenth year of its existence. The closing Sunday of the lecture season, May 12, was a celebration of the occasion. Mr. Weston, who laid the foundations of the society, and labored so faithfully in its early years, spoke on "The Progress of Ten Years"; and Mr. Salter gave an "Outlook on the Future."

THE Pacific Unitarian Conference held its eleventh session May 1, 2, and 3. The conference sermon was preached by Rev. Horatio Stebbins; and the leading papers were: "Our Attitude toward the Bible," by Rev. George H. Rice of Stockton; "Unitarian Missionary Methods on the Pacific Coast," by Rev. U. G. B. Pierce; "Sunday-school Methods," by Miss Anne B. Campbell of San Francisco; "Recent Social Economic Movements," by Rev. E. P. Payne, which was followed by a lively discussion; and "The Reform of our Funeral Customs," by Mr. E. O. Smith of San José. The session of the Women's Unitarian Conference of the Pacific Coast was chiefly important because of their decision to join the Pacific Conference, and not maintain longer a separate organization. A correspondent writes of the three days' meetings, "It was one of the best conferences I have ever attended in all my life."

MICHIGAN CONFERENCE.—A conference designed to represent all the Unitarian, Universalist, and Independent churches of Michigan is to be held with the Unitarian church in Ann Arbor, May 27-29. It is earnestly desired that every liberal society of the State be represented by its minister and a lay delegation. Besides speakers from various parts of the State, several clergymen of eminence from Chicago, Toledo, and Cleveland are to be present. Some of the subjects to be discussed are: "The Kind of Religion the World needs," "The Salvation of Society," "Cultivation of the Spiritual Life," "Women's Work in the Churches," "Young People's Societies and Work," "The Best Religious Literature," "How to bridge the Chasm between the Rich and the Poor." Prof. James A. Craig and Prof. V. C. Vaughan of the University of Michigan will give addresses before the conference on "Assyriology and the Bible" and "Sanitation and Public Health." It is believed that the conference promises to be one of the largest and best held in the State for years. A cordial invitation is extended to all sympathizers with the liberal Christian faith, whether connected with churches or not.

MISSOURI VALLEY CONFERENCE.—The spring meeting of the Missouri Valley Unitarian Conference was held with the society in Carthage, Mo., April 30 and May 1. The programme of the conference is as follows: Opening sermon on the evening of April 30, by Rev. T. B. Forbush of Chicago. The session of Wednesday morning was devoted to the transaction of business, and to reports from the various churches and the Post-office Mission work. The afternoon session was opened with a sermon by Rev. C. G. Howland of Lawrence on "Common-sense in Religion." Rev. C. H. Rogers of Oklahoma City spoke on "The Unitarian Mission Field." Rev. B. A. Van Sluyters of Carthage read a paper on "The Work of Liberal Religion among the Young." The discussion of the last paper was opened by Rev. A. W. Gould of Chicago. He was followed by Prof. White of Carthage, Rev. C. H. Rogers, and Rev. A. Wyman of Topeka. The evening was devoted to a platform meeting. Rev. W. S. Vail of Wichita spoke on "The Needs of the Unitarian Church"; Rev. W. G. Todd, superintendent of the Kansas Institution for the Education of the Blind, on "The Value of the Unitarian Church to the Individual and to the Community"; Rev. T. B. Forbush, on "The Duty of Standing for and Standing by it."

The sessions of the conference were fairly well attended. All the papers and speeches were good. The reports from the churches were different in tone from the reports at the fall meeting of the conference last November. Then the prevailing note was one of discouragement: now it is one of hope. Then it looked as if several of the churches that had been in the past the most prosperous of any within the conference might have to be closed in the immediate future, owing to the financial stress. But at present nearly every church is in a markedly better condition financially than six months ago. The prospect for establishing new churches has perhaps never been better during the existence of the conference. But the future of these new movements and the continued existence of the older societies depend largely on whether the crops are a success or failure. Should there be another year of crop failure, the new movements will most likely have to be abandoned, and many of the older churches suspended.

While all the societies have made a record of self-sacrifice and devotion by no means unworthy, the work accomplished by the church at St. Joseph, Mo., is especially worthy of commendation. Mr. Forbush reports that since the first of last September the church, besides raising as much to support preaching as in the two previous years, has in addition paid $800 and upwards on a standing indebtedness. No one who is not thoroughly conversant with the conditions now prevalent in the Central West can realize how much of hard work and generous self-sacrifice this means.

THE PRAYER OF LIFE.

BY SARAH E. BURTON.

I dare not lift mine eyes
Unto the Holy One
If the least service love requires
Of me remains undone.

I cannot plead for help
To bear the heavy load
If I a kindred aid refuse
Along the stony road.

Nor can I pray, "Forgive,"
If in my heart I find
Resentment for the pain and wrong
I suffer from my kind.

That which I would receive
I must to others give,
And in their growing welfare learn
How sweet it is to live.

Then to the Holy One
Lift only grateful eyes
That this, his worship, makes the heart
A heavenly paradise.

RELIGION.

BY REV. G. B. EAGER, D.D.

There is growing up a fresh interpretation of religion which is one of the formative forces of modern life. It is still recognized, if possible more clearly than ever, as the basis of morality, and as indispensable for the regulation of conduct and the building up of character; but men have come to see that ecclesiasticism is not of the essence of religion, nor is sacerdotalism, nor dogmatism, nor intellectual Orthodoxy, nor even ritual observance. Religion is not a matter of rules and forms, but of spirit and truth; not a matter of doctrines and symbols merely, but of habits of mind toward men and toward God. This change of thought, beyond question, has been greatly facilitated by the rediscovery, in these later days, of the teaching of Jesus concerning the kingdom of God, and the relation which that kingdom bears to Christian societies or churches. It has been like a new revelation to many minds to see the wide areas in the sayings of Christ filled by the phrases "kingdom of Christ," "kingdom of heaven"; while his utterances concerning the "church" and the "churches" are undiscoverable,—to find that the burden of his teaching was not about "churches" or the "church," but about the rule of the Father in and over the life of man, the benign sway of heavenly dispositions, of meekness and gentleness, of humility and self-sacrifice, of righteousness and love. So new light shines on the life of man and of the churches; and in it the "secular" is seen to be not in "things," but in souls, in low aims and selfish motives and unworthy ideals. And the disunion of Christians is held to be a discredit, and a well-nigh world-wide craving for the reunion of Christendom is manifest. The kingdom is seen and felt to be more than any church or denomination of Christians, and Christianity to be more than any of its forms or symbols. . . .

An effort has been persistently made to secure a constitutional amendment making the religious use of the Bible and the teaching of the distinctive truths of Christianity obligatory in the public schools. "Let the devotional exercises be reduced to a minimum, if necessary,—to the reading of the Bible, the recital of the Lord's Prayer, and the singing of a hymn," men are found contending; "and let just the elementary truths of religion be taught,—truths so simple and broad that none can reasonably object to them, and that is all that we ask." Good men, able ministers of the gospel, even Baptists of high standing, are found visiting committee-rooms and halls of legislation, urged on by a zeal which is not according to knowledge, seemingly utterly oblivious of the truth that lies at the foundation of our government, that it is not the function of the State to conduct worship or to teach religion.

The principle is as really violated by a little worship as by the most elaborate, by the most elementary religious teaching as by the most developed theological instruction. Any such legislative enactment as is asked for would virtually give over the whole contention. It would be the beginning of a tendency, a first step backward toward the abandoned alliance of the past, the entrance of the camel's nose into the tent of our national life; and who then could secure us against the ultimate coming in of the whole dreaded body of religious legislation?

There is a sense, indeed, in which it is in vain to talk of drawing a line between the religious and the secular; for no such line really exists. Religion is the spirit in which all secular life should be carried on. Even the teaching and training of our public schools should be vitalized with the essential spirit of Christianity. It is the right and duty of the State to prepare its citizens for citizenship, and this certainly involves moral training inspired by the spirit of reverence and law. Even a Huxley contends that our boys and girls are to be prepared not only for the discharge of domestic duties, but for duties as members of a social and political organization of great complexity; and to this end it is needful "that their affections should be trained, so as to love with all their hearts that conduct which tends to the attainment of the highest good for themselves and their fellow-men, and to hate with all their heart that opposite course of action which is fraught with evil." But this is far from granting the right of that worst form of paternalism,—the paternalism of government that usurps the place of the home and the church in the religious training of the young. It does not require that we yield the point that the State, as such, has no religious function.

A SOUTHERN EDITOR ON THE NEGRO QUESTION.

Mr. John J. Dargan, the editor and proprietor of the Freeman, published at Sumter, S.C., is a Southern man who with tongue and pen is devoting himself with self-sacrificing earnestness to the cause of justice for the Negro. Years ago he stood on the other side of this question, but to-day the Negroes could not have a more earnest champion of their rights than he. Two weeks ago he addressed the Preachers' Union of Charleston, a body of colored clergymen. In an account of the meeting in his paper, the Freeman of May 3, he says:—

The visit of the editor of the Freeman to Charleston last week was on several accounts one of unusual interest and significance.

He went at the invitation of the "Preachers' Union" of that city, a body of colored clergymen, to address the citizens, white and colored, of Charleston on the present political crisis in South Carolina.

He found that body ("Union") of colored men as well behaved, as thoughtful of his feelings and preferences, and guarded in every word and act that might give him pain or his people offence, as it was possible for them to be. The meeting was managed perfectly in every detail. The vast crowd, in which there were possibly thirty whites and more than three thousand Negroes, behaved in the most orderly manner from start to finish. The mayor had sent a squad of about fifteen policemen to the ground, and their conduct was strikingly good. They were there to preserve order, evidently, and with evident purpose to do only what they were sent to do.

The visit and the scenes of the occasion have served to strengthen the hope that the Negroes of the South can be brought to a high state of civilization in a very short time, and the thought will stimulate effort to aid them in every possible way. When we reflect that, without the help of their former owners to any large extent, and in many instances—especially in political fields—encountering bitter and scornful opposition from those who should be and will in time become their closest friends and most willing helpers; when we see what wonders they have done for themselves within the first thirty years of freedom, as evidenced by that meeting—we can in imagination see the enormous strides upward that the next thirty years of greater freedom will bring for them and for their white fellow-citizens and neighbors.

Then follows a report of his address, of which we make an abstract:—

Mr. Chairman and Fellow-citizens,—I come to you to-day in answer to an invitation of the Preachers' Union of Charleston, composed of colored men, to speak to you. They ask me to call them Negroes. I am not ashamed to come. I come with pride and pleasure. It would be a source of pleasure, it would be a source of special pride to me, if I had been the originator of the idea of advising and discussing important questions with the colored people. But I am not. In 1876 I ran on the Hampton ticket, and by instruction attended their meetings, organized, advised, and led them when they desired it. Whatever mistakes were made during that campaign, this certainly was no mistake. Candor compels us to admit that the irregularities of 1878, and the broken promises to the colored people, were grave mistakes, and should be matters of the deepest regret to us all. They called for advice when they were first enfranchised from their old masters; but in the bitterness of the hour we failed to respond, and they turned naturally to what we called "carpet-baggers" and "scalawags." Who can blame them, left as they were in their ignorance and helplessness, without counsellors and without guides? Now those people have cordially and courteously invited my counsel at the present momentous crisis in the affairs of their State and mine; and I can say with all truth, my colored friends, that I would have answered to your call to be here to-day, though I had to walk here in order to do it. Now, I have nothing to conceal. I want light, that I may find the right. If what I speak be not true, bring the man who can refute me; for I shall take highest pleasure in giving him audience here.

Now, white men that are here, let me ask that we look back upon our past record in regard to the Negro; and, if there are errors in it, let us bring them into light, renounce them, and do right in the future. In the first place, how came the Negroes here? Did they come of their own accord? No. Vast seas divided us, with which their ancestors were unacquainted. For the presence here to-day of this great host of black people in front of me we white people are wholly responsible. Torn from their homes in the wilderness of Africa, we brought them here to clear our forests and work our fields. Most unwillingly did they come. God gave us power to bring them, and we used it. What an enormous responsibility this places upon our shoulders in reference to their presence in America. If I were a missionary to Africa, and came home and reported such a scene as this is before me to-day, of black faces eager for words of advice and instruction, and I should tell how I gave encouragement to them, to make them believe that they could become civilized and Christianized, how my dear people would gather around me, shake my hand, and say fervently: God bless you, brother! You are doing a great work for humanity. Go on, go on! What a great man, what a good man, they would be ready to pronounce me! But, because I talk to Africans in South Carolina, brought here by our hands, for our benefit, I meet frowns and scowls and unkind words. Negroes in Africa must be Christianized and elevated, but Negroes in South Carolina must be brutalized and repressed.

But do not think I am vexed with you for this inconsistent conduct, for I have been guilty of it myself only too often; but gradually it has been given to me to discover that it was a mean, unworthy business that I was engaged in. God forgive me for having done it, and forgive those who now do it. Now all listen, especially the white men.

The South was not peculiar in holding slaves; nor has slavery been a curse, but rather a blessing, in its ultimate effects upon the Negroes. In days gone by all the strong nations of the earth have held slaves, so the fault of the South lay simply in holding on to the institution after civilization had entirely outgrown it and all other enlightened nations had abandoned it. In ancient days it was the sword or captivity in slavery; and it was a movement upward when captivity and slavery took the place of putting to the sword indiscriminately men, women, and children captured in war. Just as you can clearly see imprisonment, even for life, is regarded as a less penalty than capital punishment. Our awful mistake lay in not seeing that man's humanity to man had passed far above our level, and that our attempts to obstruct the upward march of the most progressive States in the world would result in our utter overthrow and destruction. Humane voices cried aloud to us from every quarter: "The days of chattel slavery are over among Christian people everywhere. Turn those black men loose in America!" Oh, why did not some one in old Charleston catch that imperative call for liberty, and echo the cry throughout this region? As I have read of those days when Wilberforce and Clarkson of England and Garrison and Phillips in America were using their persuasive voices to make us see the light of the new day that was dawning, and hear the warning that we must be up and moving, or we would be trampled into the earth by the marching hosts of liberty, I had promised God, if ever another emergency occurred in regard to this same Negro question, which has not dawned at any State's bidding, that, if no one else arose, I would arise to tell my people of the evils that must overtake them unless they treat their African fellow-citizens as fellow-Christians. That emergency is now on the State, and I am here to speak without regard to consequences. I say we cannot hold the Negro down without disasters upon ourselves. When you undertook it in the past, and swore by the Eternal they should remain in slavery, you only got ten times more property destroyed than the Negroes were worth; and one million men, from disease and wounds in battle, went to their graves in the war that followed. But did that save slavery? No: it, too, went into its grave. Now, white men, listen to the voice of history. See the Confederate soldier,—how grandly he defied the world to touch the precious institution that grew on his soil! and hear his words ringing in defiance through all lands, "Give me liberty or give me death!" England and France looked on with deep interest and admiration, saying, "This is all very fine," and that they would recognize the splendid young republic if it would only give liberty when it got liberty. Let the Confederate soldier get off of the man underneath him, if he would have our recognition. Then a voice came from Nazareth, over two thousand years of time, telling us, "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you." If you would get liberty, you must give liberty; but, save the open ears of Robert E. Lee, all were deaf to warnings, and shouted again with increased defiance, "Liberty or death!" God answered our prayer, and gave us death. I was a Confederate soldier, though only sixteen years of age; but I must speak the truth, and invite its blessings.

Color, race, and the accident of place do not make superiority or inferiority. Christians surely do not need to be taught this with the divine command ever before their eyes, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." What gospel? The gospel of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Why, my friends, I am a white man; but, if I had nothing else than that to claim superiority upon, as another has said, I would blush until I became a red man.

The eyes of the world are on South Carolina to-day. We are here trying to make distinctions on account of race, color, and previous conditions of servitude; and Christians, deeply saddened everywhere, are pitying us, and saying, "Then close your Bibles, and quit ringing your church bells." Now don't say that religion and politics won't mix. That they have not mixed has caused politics to be so largely the devil's work. Everything good in politics has its foundation in true religion. There is no sound public policy but that of right and justice. The Constitution of the United States is, in the main, a righteous instrument; and, when we fight it, we fight embodied Christian doctrine,—especially the amendments making no distinctions on account of race or servitude. White men, read history, and reflect that others besides Negroes have been slaves and despised for their lowly estate. Did not the Normans once hold down the Anglo-Saxons, fasten collars about their necks, and call them dogs? Superiority is not founded on the color of your skin, but on your moral and intellectual qualities and physical refinements. The question is not, Is he a white man, but is he a good man? But you say this means social equality. It does mean equality of opportunity for every man in every line of life, whatever may be the color of his skin. But it gives no man the right, the power, to compel me to associate with him or to enter my home. This is a privilege each man voluntarily grants to every man he pleases, and withholds from any he pleases. In social matters every man is a law unto himself under all free and equal institutions.

Now, you ask, Are you not proud of being an Anglo-Saxon? I reply, Of course I am,—proud of that race because it has lifted itself from slavery to civilization, has grown from great weakness to great strength; and I thrill with delight and highest pride when I read of its achievements in war and its material acquirements, and of its glorious heroes, who led great armies to victory. But that which makes me prouder still is the sentiment that is truest Anglo-Saxon sentiment and the crowning glory of that great race, as expressed by England's late laureate:—

"How'er it be, it seems to me,
'Tis only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood."

Let such sentiments as this be the guiding stars of your life, if you would be worthy Anglo-Saxons, and remember that kind hearts are more than white skins and simple faith than Saxon blood. When we have laid this truth to heart, we shall be truly great. When we remind a helpless people, recently out of slavery which we imposed, of their inferiority, and flaunt our alleged superiority in their faces constantly, we discredit and disgrace the noble traits of the Anglo-Saxon.

I stand to-day in what is known as the cradle of secession, and feel it to be a bounden duty to truth and justice to pay tribute here to the memory of William Lloyd Garrison, whose "magical hand touched the auction blocks of this city, and they became school-houses." Should not this alone excite our liveliest and most lasting gratitude to him? More than all other men did he do and dare for the liberation and elevation of the whole people of Charleston. For by the abolition of slavery the slaveholder was as much liberated as the slave. Under the slave system all the energy and talents of the slaveholder were exercised in holding the slave down. I feel so grateful to him myself for getting me off of the Negro, and showing me there was nobler and better work to do than the work of oppression. Had it not been for Garrison and his self-sacrificing band of abolitionists contending for the cause of justice and freedom, Charleston might have been still holding the Negroes down to-day in slavery. Now, I stand here, stretching my hands to my former slaves, saying, Let me help you up; and Charleston should do likewise.

It is a tremendously costly work, this holding people down; for neither the man held down nor the man holding him down can accomplish anything in this world. That is why the South had nothing before the war but the Negro and the art of keeping him down. The very arms with which we fought the North had to be gotten from the North. Where do your powerful steam-engines on land and sea come from to-day? From the land of freedom. Your household furniture, your plantation tools, your very clothing? Your books in your school-rooms, the Bibles in your churches, the songs that you sing, and the wires over which you talk? From the free North, not the enslaved South. And this awful destitution is the just penalty we have paid for the privilege of holding the Negro down; and yet that wretched News and Courier, claiming to be the leading paper of South Carolina, is still crying out that we must give up conscience and freedom of thought and speech and all else that makes a great and good people, in order that we may continue to hold the Negro down. Away with such silly talk and unworthy suggestions!

But we are losing more than money by our semi-savage policy toward the Negro and his Northern friends. For we are destroying our own capacities for free thought and manly utterance,—not only keeping out manhood, but driving out what little is born within our borders. Many a young man says to me in secret, "You are right, Dargan; and there is no answering you." Yet it would scare one of their little hearts out of them to speak such sentiments above a whisper. They are afraid somebody will frown at them, and tell them they are going in with the "Niggers." I would like to see old Charleston try to frown me down, try to quell my free thought or frighten me into silence! But I am not angry with the poor, silly creatures here, because I used to be just such a fool myself. So let Charleston look and stare as I pass by, and I will continue to pass by on my work in spite of her opposition. I can in the path of duty face the world, the flesh, the devil, the News and Courier, and everything else. Yet the approval of my people is as sweet to me as "the honey in the honeycomb." Some "regulator" folks, as you have heard, have been telling me to stop my "incendiary speeches," or they would hang me. Well, let them hang. He that takes my manhood takes that which alone can make my life of value. Besides, they who take my life to-day must soon leave "their mirth and their employments, and come and make their bed with me" beneath the sod. And, besides, my death may be worth more than my life to the cause to which I am devoted. I challenge any and every man to come into the broad light and compare his views with mine; and, if mine be wrong, let them be rejected. God is the source of light. The devil makes use of darkness for all his vile deeds.

Now, all of us have been free long enough to learn to behave ourselves and do justice by all, black and white, slaveholder, and non-slaveholder. We must forget that, though the non-slaveholders numbered forty-four thousand and the slaveholders only seventeen thousand, yet not a non-slaveholder was in the secession convention; and we must forget that a whole lot of black men once belonged as chattels to a few white men, and, forgiving, if not forgetting, those dark days, try to rise into a true Democracy, having a constitution and laws made by all, for all, with equality to all and special privileges to none, and have the happiest possible solution of the most difficult problem any State has ever yet been called on to solve. We can only get such a government by universal suffrage.

Attempt to disfranchise blacks and not whites, and we perjure ourselves and get Uncle Sam on our backs: to attempt to disfranchise whites—at least twenty thousand under any educational qualification and a greater number of blacks—is to put a volcano in operation beneath our feet that will ultimately belch forth fire and lead. So I favor universal suffrage and equal and exact justice to all persons of all races.

In conclusion, let me say: Seek truth, do justice, enthrone equality. Remember our common Father God is not deceived, and only right wins in the long run. Remember that "the superior man is the man who helps his fellow-men, the superior man is the useful man, the superior man is the kind man, the man who lifts up his down-trodden brothers; and, the greater load of human sorrow and human want you can get in your arms, the higher you can climb the great hill of fame. The superior man is the man who loves his fellow-men. Let me say right here, the superior men, the grand men, are brothers the world over. No matter what their complexion,—continents may divide them,—yet they embrace each other. Centuries may separate; yet they are hand in hand, and all the good and all the grand and all the superior men, shoulder to shoulder, heart to heart, are fighting the great battle for the progress of mankind." Remember that "error on a throne is on its sure way to defeat, and truth in darkest dungeon is on the certain road to victory."

UNITARIANISM IN JAPAN.

A letter from Rev. Clay MacCauley, descriptive of Unitarianism, has been published in translated form in the Shukyo, the Unitarian magazine, and has aroused considerable interest among people who are interested in Christianity in Japan. By request of some of the students it has been reprinted in the Japan Mail of March 22. After stating the main principles of Unitarianism as free thought in investigation, the supremacy of reason, and moral character as the test of men, Mr. MacCauley speaks of the Saratoga declarations of last year, and continues:—

Unitarianism, as the word is understood in religion, has therefore become a world-wide movement, even although its birth and growth have taken place in Christendom and as part of Christianity.

Now, you can see that, when Unitarianism is carried outside of what is called Christendom, or Europe and America, and is brought into a non-Christian country like Japan, its relations to the religious and to the general life of such a country are, above everything else, those which arise from its fundamental principles and methods; that is, from its threefold standard spoken of at the beginning of my letter. The personal faith, or definite creed, of any Unitarian representative or teacher is therefore a secondary matter, and is not to be considered authoritative in the counsel or aid he may give to those who may wish to associate themselves together for Unitarian faith and work.

So, then, Unitarianism in being brought to Japan must not be thought of as hostile to any form of religion in Japan, as such. If, for example, a Buddhist is a free and impartial investigator of religious problems, if he is sincerely willing to submit his faith to the authority of philosophy and science, and if he puts character or moral excellence before everything else as the test of manhood, then he and any true Unitarian can be intellectual friends, even though they differ very widely in other special conclusions. And, if any Buddhist is sincerely desiring to help to make men better and happier by bringing them under the law of justice and love, then such Buddhist can work hand in hand as a religious brother with any true Unitarian.

In a word, then, I am bold enough to claim that, among the religious movements in the world, the freest, most progressive, most tolerant, most inclusive of all is Unitarianism. It is marked by method rather than dogma. It is as varied as nature or the human mind is varied. It is as united as the hunger for truth or the need of moral excellence can unite men. Every Unitarian has his own faith, and this faith is usually very strong and clear. I have my own definite creed on all the problems of theology and ethics. All Unitarians are pretty well agreed in their disbelief in so-called Roman Catholic and orthodox Protestant creeds concerning the Trinity, the Deity of Christ, the Bible, salvation, and human destiny, even though they differ in the emphasis they put on their denials of various parts of these creeds. All Unitarians believe in a universal spiritual endeavor on the part of mankind, in the worth of religion under all its forms in all nations, in a growing manifestation of the faith which underlies all historical expressions of faith, in the duty and the privilege of the disciples of all forms of religion to rise to a common level on which by enlightened reason they may find at last an intellectual as well as moral basis of harmony and co-operation. I hold that this sublime conviction was justified by Christ himself. You may hold that it was justified by the Buddha himself. Each of us can cherish his conviction without any break in sympathy. It involves no antagonism. Jesus and Sakya, I believe, would have found no reason for separation from each other. They would have gone hand in hand to feed the hungry, to comfort the sorrowing, and to fill mankind with love and peace. It is foolishness, it is even a crime against the human soul, for the followers of Jesus and Sakya to separate from each other as enemies, or even as strangers.

Unitarianism has not come to Japan to destroy, but to fulfil. I am not here to reproduce in Japan the Unitarian Church of America, except in its spirit. Unitarianism is here to set men free, or, rather, to help the free minds of Japan to set all minds free in spirit, and to hasten the coming in the world, as far as may be, of the sublime empire of love and righteousness which will at last make of humanity a true brotherhood under the care of the infinite and eternal God, our Father.

Spiritual Life.

Painful diseases are not always fatal diseases. The most dangerous diseases often undermine the system in deadly silence. So an evil which causes heartache is not always as vicious as a sin which undermines the fibre and the stamina of the soul in death-like silence.—New Church Messenger.

Jesus, alas! is as little understood in doctrine as followed in example. For he has hitherto been like a beautiful figure set to point out a certain way, and people at large have been so entranced with worshipping the figure that they have neglected to follow the direction it indicates.—Julia Ward Howe.

Think not when heavy tasks are laid upon you that it is a misfortune, but rather high honor that you are thus singled out to lead or to teach. Be not discouraged, though you see no results. The trend of the ages is behind you, and time but an illusion of human consciousness.—Letters from an Unknown Friend.

The link between the senses and the soul must always remain a missing link. No science or philosophy has discovered it, and never will: theories have only given evidence of human folly. In this terra incognita the voice of faith shall sing its remote song, the Spirit of God shall span the abyss of mystery, and unite sense with soul from shore to shore.—Mozoomdar.

The meek, the disinterested, the unselfish, those who think little of themselves and much of others; who think of the public good, and not of their own; who rejoice in good done, not by themselves, but by others, by those whom they dislike as well as by those whom they love,—these shall gain far more than they lose: they shall "inherit the earth" and its fulness.—Dean Stanley.

"If it is the great crises of peril that, as they are passing, train a people's character, so is it their reflection in literature that, ages after they are gone, still spreads and perpetuates the ennobling influence. The inspiration that descends on us from the past, and makes us heirs of accumulated thought and enriched affections, from whom, mainly, does it come? Is it from the uniformly happy and the untempted good, from those who have most realized the lot for which our sentient and intellectual instincts cry aloud? No, but from the central figures of the great tragedies of our humanity,—from the conquerors of desolating monsters; from the creators of law and tapers of the people; from love beyond death, that carried its plaintive music to the shades; from the avengers of wrong; from the martyrs of right; from the missionaries of mercy; from the pass of Thermopylae; from the Milvian bridge; from the fires of Smithfield; from the waters of Solway; from the Cross of Calvary. A world without a contingency or an agony could have no hero and no saint, and enable no son of man to discover that he was a son of God."—James Martineau.

Literature.

"THE ESSENTIAL MAN."*

The object of this little book is to answer "briefly and concisely" the question, "What witness to the continued existence of man after death is found on the basis of reason alone?" This aim is of immense importance to us all; and one may say of it, in the most literal sense, that it is fundamental to religious work. Revelation, tradition, and even, in some measure, experience itself must find henceforth some strong and clear ground of reason to stand upon, if either or all of them is to keep alive a faith in immortality. And, though some people have cherished the dream of a religion which is content to leave that faith unsettled and uncertain, it may be said that such a dream has slight chance of fulfilment within any future which we can now foresee. Not alone are the rewards of Heaven needful to spur moral endeavor, but the apparent futility of human existence, if we see the whole of it on earth, must tend to discourage the best and highest exertions of the common mind. Meantime, most thinking people are of a temper not to be persuaded of what remains unreasonable in their sight, though one rose from the dead to give them assurance. They will sooner doubt the evidence of their senses than they will set aside the verdict of their reason.

Mr. Cressey's book, therefore, aims to strengthen us at a vital point, where, to say the least, the modern world is none too strong. If a severe critic might find in it features something short of perfection, it is none the less to be heartily commended to all thoughtful minds. The candor of its argument, which studiously avoids even the appearance of special pleading, the sobriety of its statements, and the absence of technical metaphysical terms, all commend it to the average reader as a valuable piece of counsel on the most immediately vital of all our problems.

As an introduction to the argument here presented, we have the statements that any reasonable inference as to the destiny of man must be drawn from all ascertainable facts, not from a limited class of facts alone, and that rational belief is not required to amount to demonstration, since we often reach practical certainty far short of absolute proof. The second chapter deals with the nature of man. It sets forth clearly the reasons for believing that the real man is mind, or spirit, and that mind

SUITE OF 1790.

The chance to secure such an old-fashioned Suite as this may recur to you two or three times in the future. But can you afford to wait and take the chances?

Never have we seen a more attractive bit of 18th Century history than this antique suite, with its great sweeping curves at head and foot, and its curious box frame with winged carved feet.

Another important consideration is the wood, which is old, richly veined Honduras Mahogany, with a wonderful wealth of serpentine grainings. It takes a very high finish.

cannot be expressed in terms of matter. The next step shows us that in self-consciousness mind has the quality of persistence, is something more than a series of conscious states, and involves the existence of a continuous personal spirit. Being then asked to assume that man lives in a moral universe, because that is the sole hypothesis left to us after we have seen that the universe cannot be reasonably pronounced either unmoral or immoral, it is made plain that, if we are to think of the matter at all, we can only say that the world is right and reasonable when man's inherent desire for continued existence is granted fulfillment in our thought. This main argument is stated tersely, but with enough of amplitude and illustration to carry its force home to any mind which will exert a moderate amount of thought. To this is added a fine chapter on "Personal Belief," in which the grounds of certainty and the value of the faith are further discussed. The book concludes with some discriminating remarks on the subject of conditional immortality and a brief summary of its conclusions.

The people into whose hands this book will naturally come are, perhaps, free from one temptation to adopt a theory of conditional immortality which besets some others. That is to say, they have no everlasting hell to get rid of, or to screen from an indignant moral sense. But certain analogies drawn from nature may have more influence than we commonly think in drawing the modern mind toward that theory; and, if Mr. Cressey's book falls short in anything, perhaps it is in not pointing out more emphatically, not only the needlessness, but the peril of this tendency.

It was indeed a wise remark that Abraham Lincoln made, "All or none"; for the impossibility of drawing a line between the saved and the lost, and the humility of the saintly mind, put the whole hope in jeopardy for every man, when "conditional immortality" is granted standing room as a reasonable theory. The most that can be said of it is that it is not wholly unreasonable. There is no positive demand for it, as for the thought of future life itself. It is a kind of dog that is best left to its slumbers, as a certain type of modern Orthodoxy is sure to find to its cost. Mr. Cressey sees this clearly, and might have said so in more vigorous terms than he has chosen to employ. But we do not expect everything all at once, and his book as we have it is a weighty contribution to the best religious literature of the day.

H. N. B.

THE LIFE OF SAMUEL J. TILDEN.*

Mr. Bigelow had the advantage of an acquaintance with Mr. Tilden extending from the beginning of his professional career until his death; and, consequently, he has been able to speak of many things here touched upon with direct personal knowledge. Moreover, he was evidently admitted to Mr. Tilden's closest confidence, and was the object of his warm regard. In 1885 he published two volumes of his political writings; and these hark back to those in many places, and cannot be fully understood without reference to them. In small particulars our previous acquaintance with Mr. Bigelow's literary methods does not permit us to place implicit confidence in him; but, if mistakes are here, they are not such as we are able to correct, except in a few instances. Evidently, the date of the incorporation of the Tilden Trust, on page 361, vol. ii., should be 1887, not 1877. In another place the verbs "lay" and "lie" are badly mixed; and the mistake is thrice repeated. Here and there we have a construction that is astonishingly clumsy or absurd for a writer of Mr. Bigelow's experience.

Graver faults than these are the exaggerated emphasis on certain parts, the slurring of some others, and the extremely doubtful taste of such a chapter as that on "The Trials and Temptations of a Bachelor Millionaire." Twenty-two pages are devoted to this dreadful stuff, as much as is given to the whole period from 1848—when Tilden was an anti-slavery Democrat, voting for Van Buren and Adams—until 1860, when, presumably, he voted for Douglas, though on this point Mr. Bigelow is obscure, contenting himself with the announcement, "Mr. Tilden did not support the Republican candidate." Gladly would we know something of the process by which he slipped back from his high ground in 1848 to support Pierce in 1852 and Buchanan in 1856; but, politically, the whole decade (1850-60) is passed over in absolute silence. Another breach of taste is the exposure of Mr. Tilden's physical condition, with every ghastly particular, a few years before his death; and another, the silly lucubrations on his celibate life on pages 372-375. "Had he been elected to the Presidency in 1876," we are told, "Mr. Tilden would probably have contracted a matrimonial alliance—more, however, for the better discharge of the duties of his office than to fill any void in his own scheme of life." That is not prettily said; but it is significant of a lack of delicate high-mindedness which was characteristic of Mr. Tilden, notwithstanding his remarkable abilities and, up to a certain limit, his great moral force.

Mr. Tilden was to the political manner born, his father being an ardent politician, in close touch with the Democratic politicians of his time. Always sickly, he had no proper childhood; and never in these pages do we get the impression of a normal, wholesome personality. Evidently a great lawyer, we are told but little of his methods and successes at the bar. The most honorable chapter in the book is that which records the battle of the State Democratic organization, led by Mr. Tilden, against the Tweed ring. This won him golden opinions, even from Republicans, the most of whom found reason to withdraw them when he became a candidate for the governorship of the State in 1874 and in 1876 for the Presidency of the nation. The measure which one takes of Horatio Seymour, in his letter to Tilden advising him how to work up his case against Gen. Dix, his opponent for the governorship, is not that of a giant, nor even that of a full-sized man.

Mr. Bigelow's account of Mr. Tilden's candidacy in 1876, and of the troubles growing out of it, covers nearly 200 pages in his second volume. It will confirm many persons in their opinion that Tilden was nefariously robbed of the great office to which he had been elected, and it will convince many others who have been doubtful all along. Nevertheless, the statement is ex parte, and not such as we expect from Mr. Rhodes when he arrives at this point in his valuable history. It is clear that Tilden never accepted the electoral commission as a sound expedient, and that he believed himself to have been betrayed in the house of his friends. The gravest charges are brought against the Hayes administration in regard to the income-tax and cipher-despatches persecution of Tilden, devised in order to break down his character and spoil him as a candidate in 1880. It is evident that he was physically disqualified as early as 1878, while still his desire of an election was very great. If he had received the nomination in 1880, for which he angled in a dubious letter, it is doubtful if he would have put the crown aside. What he wanted was to have his wrongs redressed. One would like to hear from Mr. Cleveland as to his unkept promises to Tilden,—that he should choose his cabinet. Mr. Bigelow's tone concerning Mr. Cleveland is distinctly unfriendly; but what he has written will not, perhaps, be considered final by Mr. Cleveland's friends. Some allowance should certainly be made for the fact that Mr. Bigelow was nominated as Secretary of State by Mr. Tilden, and Mr. Cleveland did not see fit to give his assent. Daniel Manning was undoubtedly Mr. Tilden's choice for the Treasury, and it is probable that much of his apparent ability in office should be credited to his sponsor. The voice was Jacob's, but the hands were the hands of Esau. That Mr. Cleveland did not relish this "kitchen cabinet" arrangement is well known, and the fact does him no discredit.

Mr. Tilden was such an omnivorous reader that his attempt to give the body of his fortune for the founding of a library was the most natural thing in the world. The courts, disregarding his clear purpose, set his will aside. But, while the litigation proceeded, the fortune increased from five to seven millions; and, by compounding with one of the heirs, two millions were saved for the library. United with the Lenox and Astor funds, these will make some eight millions for such a library as ought to satisfy the most exigent demands.

And, now, who will take these volumes and the two volumes of "Writings and Speeches" and make a good book for the "American Statesmen" series? The author of the Martin Van Buren volume in that series would do it con amore, and extremely well.

DEGENERATION. By Max Nordau. Translated from the second edition of the German work. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—Max Nordau's work has received a good deal of attention, perhaps much more than it deserves. It is a literary curiosity, just as is "The Anatomy of Melancholy," and might very well be put on the shelf beside Burton. It is not likely to have any more practical influence. It contains an enormous mass of facts, an immense amount of egotism, and some wholesome truth. The author has made such a complete exposition of his own mentality that it will be perfectly easy for the degenerates whom he describes to turn and say to him, Et tu quoque! Nordau undertakes the work of investigating the prevalent tendencies of fashion in art and literature, and of proving that they have their source in the degeneracy of their authors. He dedicates his book to Prof. Lombroso of Turin, who has written a good deal upon criminology, but whose conclusions in regard to the existence of a distinct criminal type are by no means established or accepted. But he has apparently derived his main inspiration from Morel, a Frenchman, who has written on the physical, intellectual, and moral causes of degeneracy. With this suggestion to start with, Nordau goes off on a search for illustrations; and, with Quixotic lance, he attacks anything and everything that happens to lie in his path. It is a thrust at philosophy here, at music there, at Schopenhauer, Wagner, or Ibsen, or at Walt Whitman. "The degenerate and insane are the predestined disciples of Schopenhauer and Hartmann, and need only to acquire a knowledge of Buddhism to become converts to it." Nordau begins with an attempt to be scientific, but the facts he has to deal with will not permit of scientific classification. He is turning over a kaleidoscope. The medley of forms and figures he introduces is not always interesting: the pathology of morbidity seldom is. That we have many cranks in this age no one can deny; and some of them have a curious pre-eminence, and secure a strange following. But this was just as true immediately after the advent of Christianity. The multitude of curious sects which came into existence must be reckoned among the thousand curiosities in the development of religious emotion, and one who reads a few plays of Aristophanes may easily conclude that the comedian could find abundant material for his shafts without drawing too much on his imagination. They were fond of new things at Athens, as in Paris or in Boston; and some of the phases of Gnostic speculation might well furnish material for Nordau's chatter. The psychology of mysticism fills a large place in his book, but his analysis is literary rather than scientific. He has included in it various forms of delirium, intellectual and artistic. Wagner is minutely dissected; and Ibsen is cut into yet smaller bits, and resolved into a witch's stew. It is amusing reading to observe his treatment of Zola. Though pessimism is a target for his shafts, Nordau himself has fallen a prey to it. His book is bilious, and his criticisms often acute and amusing. But, as for philosophy, art, or science, we might as well find them in a rag-bag of prejudices as in Nordau's work.

LANDON'S PIANOFORTE METHOD. Easily graded for beginners by Charles W. Landon. Philadelphia: Theodore Presser, 1708 Chestnut Street. $1.50.—The proof of an instruction book, like the proof of a pudding, is in the eating; and, after nearly a year's trial of Mr. Landon's work, we are prepared to commend it as a pleasing, intelligent introduction to pianoforte study. The author has evidently had a large experience in teaching children, and has compiled his book on the supposition that it is better to furnish a fair amount of sugar-plums than too much vinegar or dried beef. The selections are therefore pleasing and melodious. Names have been affixed to each piece, some of which are suggestions of their German origin. Other names are purely fanciful, and supposed to indicate the character of the piece. The addition of words in various exercises encourages the pupil to correct phrasing. It is by no means assumed that this book is for self-instruction: the presence of a teacher is supposed from the beginning. Nevertheless, the author is a good preacher; and directions and exhortations to the pupil accompany each piece. And the injunction, "Go slowly, avoid mistakes," is repeated again and again, though none too often. The hints to the teacher are in accordance with modern methods of teaching a child to think and to feel as well as to execute. With such a method intelligently applied from the beginning, there will be less mechanical playing on the pianoforte, which, of all musical instruments, suffers most in this direction,—as if it were a musical typewriter, and the only task of the pupil were to spell out the letters of a given piece with a certain amount of percussion. In the matter of grading the exercises there is room for difference with the author. But this depends much upon the individual peculiarities of the pupil, and no two teachers would grade a book in precisely the same way. The same firm also issue a reed organ method by the same author, which is constructed on the same intelligent principles, with the necessary changes in method and choice of pieces to adapt it to the instrument.

THE MAKING OF A NATION. By Francis A. Walker, President of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Charles Scribner's Sons.—In the stress of life at the present time, the pressure of business, and the multifarious things that absorb attention, few have time or opportunity to study history, even the history of our own country, in any exhaustive manner. Still, most persons desire to know something of the history of our own nation. Gen. Walker, in a moderate-sized volume, entitled "The Making of a Nation," gives an admirably clear and lucid account of the condition of the country at the close of the Revolutionary War; of the circumstances which led to the calling of the convention of 1787; of the work of that convention, which resulted in the framing of the Constitution; of the struggle for the adoption of the Constitution, and the administrations of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and Madison, during which the country really and in fact became a nation. The adoption of a written constitution is a step, but only a step, toward the making of a nation. A great deal more is necessary before the desired result is obtained. History is full of examples showing the numerous instances of constitutions that proved utter failures, and where the condition of the peoples concerned was worse than before. But, owing to the wisdom of the men who filled the offices under the Constitution and administered the government, and the good sense of the people, all obstacles (and they were many) were surmounted and all difficulties overcome; and the United States became a great nation, and its people have enjoyed a degree of prosperity almost unparalleled. Just how all this was accomplished Gen. Walker narrates in a manner which makes his book not only instructive, but in the highest degree interesting.

A KERAMIC STUDY. By Mrs. Flora E. Haines, Bangor, Me. Price 75 cents.—This tidy little volume is a careful and interesting description of the making of six decorated plates in Brownfield's Guild Pottery in England, and not the least interesting part of the book is the account of the formation of this guild. One follows the minute and exact process of the manufacture of these plates with all the more pleasure from knowing about the men at the head of the guild-potteries. Of the six plates one was decorated with the "May-flower," arbutus. It would have made a good illustration for the book, or even better it might have been to have had the six plates set up in a row in colors. Still, one almost sees them as he reads, so definite is the information about them. Let not the casual tourist think he can imitate Mrs. Haines's experience. In the first place, she had her winning personality to recommend her. In the next place, it took twenty-eight days of patient watching and waiting to see the process completed.

THE STORY OF SONNY SAHIB. By Sara Jeannette Duncan (Mrs. Everard Cotes). New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.—Mrs. Cotes has proved her ability to write for children as well as for grown people in this beautiful story, which appeared in a few numbers of the Youth's Companion. It is the story of a little English boy, saved from the massacre at Cawnpore, and brought up by Tooni, the Hindoo ayah, far from any part of India known to the English. The circumstances that happened before his final restoration to his father, his strange life among a strange people, his English pluck and honesty in the face of danger, are all told with a sympathetic and perfect naturalness that make the book an exceptionally good one for children.

RHETORIC: ITS THEORY AND PRACTICE. By Austin Phelps, D.D., and Henry Allyn Frink, Ph.D. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—Dr. Frink has adapted the lectures of Prof. Phelps to the requirements of a text-book. These lectures have long held high rank among standard works on the characteristics and use of our language, and may still be had in their original form for reference and general reading; but this text-book will extend their usefulness. It aims directly to give the power of presenting a thought effectively, to show that thought is the basis of style and the source of power, and to emphasize the true relation of the writer to the reader or the speaker to the hearer.

BUSINESS FORMS, CUSTOMS, AND ACCOUNTS. By Seymour Eaton, Drexel Institute, Philadelphia.—This book is prepared for schools and colleges, but not for any special class of school, since the author believes that a knowledge of business is necessary in every calling, and should have a place in every curriculum. It teaches the principles of double-entry book-keeping. The work is planned throughout by an arrangement of lesson-notes, exercises, and questions, to encourage original effort. The exercises are practical, and the questions suggestive.

STORIES OF OLD GREECE. By Emma M. Frith. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co. 30 cents.—These stories are retold in short, simple form, with the idea of doing for the little beginner what the study of literature does for older people. There is no lack of these re-presentations of Greek myths; but the others with which we are acquainted are all for older children, or are more extended in the narration. These ought to be a real help, especially, perhaps, for the mother of little children or for the teacher.

Miscellaneous.

Messrs. Charles H. Kerr & Co., Chicago, publish "Cash vs. Coin," an answer to "Coin's Financial School," by Edward Wisner. 65 cents. It is an answer to the soft money delusion.

"Choice Reading" gives favorite chapters from favorite books included in Ginn & Co.'s select libraries. Francillon's "Gods and Heroes," Franklin's "Autobiography," Grimms' "Fairy Tales," and other popular books are here represented.

Number 69 of the "Riverside Literature Series" presents four chapters from Hawthorne's "Mosses from an Old Manse," one of which is the introduction which describes the Manse itself. "Drowne's Wooden Image," "The Old Apple-dealer," and "Feather-top" are the tales selected.

"The Historical Biography of George Washington," by Horace E. Scudder, appears as a double number in the "Riverside Literature Series," published by Houghton Mifflin & Co. This was written about ten years ago, and this new form will serve to extend its undoubted usefulness and deserved popularity.

Messrs. Louis C. Ross & Co., 3 West Street, Boston, publish a collection of responses especially adapted for quartette or chorus choirs, by J. L. Gilbert, organist and director of the First Universalist Church, Charlestown, Mass. The volume was prepared some years ago, and has met a long felt want in church music.

The American Book Company have issued among their "Literature Primers" "American Literature," by Mildred Cabell Watkins. It is an attempt to make the story of American literature intelligible to American readers. It is told in a simple and familiar style, and will help to lead students to a first-hand acquaintance with American authors.

Messrs. D. C. Heath & Co. publish in their modern language series "La Débâcle," par Emile Zola," abridged from the one hundred and eighty-second edition, and annotated by Benjamin W. Wells, Ph.D., Professor of Modern Languages in the University of the South. This is the most popular work of the French novelist. By omitting episodes and detailed descriptions, Mr. Wells has brought it within the limits of class reading.

Ginn & Co. publish a little book of information about "School Libraries," setting forth their object, scope, advantages, and success, and adding lists of the books and prices. For instance, for $4.75 one may buy School Library No. 2, which includes ten old-time classics of permanent worth, like "Robinson Crusoe," Plutarch's "Lives," and "Tales from Shakspeare." For a dollar more he may have ten books by the best English writers. For $14.50 may be had eighteen substantial volumes which belong in every reference library; and so on.

The Magazines.

The New England Magazine opens with an interesting article by C. Howard Walker, beautifully illustrated from photographs by N. W. Elwell. Other illustrated articles are: "Thomas Ball, the Sculptor," by William Ordway Partridge, and "Blue Mountain Forest Park," by T. J. Walker. The stories are by Anne Richardson Talbot, May Kelsey Champion, Eva L. Ogden, David Lowry. Thomas R. Slicer writes of "Shakspeare's Fools," William Gregory describes "A Scotchman's Journey in New England," and there are other articles of interest.

In the Arena for May may be found an interesting contribution to the discussion of the Armenian problems. It is written by Robert Stein, himself a German, and is entitled "Armenia must have a European Governor," and is provided with a map and fifteen photogravure illustrations. It is certainly the duty of every thinking person to inform himself on this question, and the magazine ought to have a large sale. Other articles of importance are: "The Upas Tree of Injustice," one of B. O. Flower's series of "Wellsprings and Feeders of Immorality," most painful in its revelations; "The State and Dwellings for the Poor," by Rev. F. B. Vrooman; and "Should War be abolished?" by E. P. Powell.

Literary Notes.

Rev. Frederick D. Greene, the author of the "Armenian Crisis in Turkey," has received the following letter from Mr. Gladstone:—

"Dear Sir,—I am glad to hear that your work is about to be published, as I believe it will materially assist in rousing public attention to the recent outrages in Armenia, which almost pass description, and have inflicted indelible disgrace on the sultan of Turkey, and on his officers and soldiers concerned in perpetrating, in denying, and in shielding them. I remain, dear sir, "Your very faithful servant," "W. E. GLADSTONE. "Hawarden Castle, Chester."

A popular but authoritative book on birds has been needed for so long that a warm welcome awaits the "Handbook of Birds of Eastern North America," by Frank M. Chapman, of the American Museum of Ornithology. This book, which is most profusely illustrated with pictures from nature, contains keys to the species and descriptions of the plumage, nests, etc., of all birds found east of the Mississippi, and most of those in the extreme West. The author has remembered the special requirements of amateurs and beginners; and the problem of identification, either in the field or study, is reduced to its simplest form. D. Appleton & Co., the publishers, will issue a pocket as well as a library edition.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as Related to the Inward Life. By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D., Author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. Cloth, red edges, 50 cents; full gilt, $1.00.

Contents: 1. A Wayside Prophet; 2. The Joy in Harvest; 3. Monuments of the Leaves; 4. The Mission of the Snowflake; 5. Down to the Lake.

The third volume in the cloth-bound series of "Life" books,—"A Child of Nature," by Rev. Dr. Marion D. Shutter,—is already meeting large and favorable notice. The book is so handsome externally that many, seeing the 50-cent edition, at first suppose it to be the $1.00 edition. In its contents, the book, while entirely different from either of its predecessors in the series, is certain to meet with a no less cordial reception. "The graceful little volume," as the Boston Traveler calls it, has much of interest and much of meaning for all who shall read it, and, from cover to cover through its 111 pages, presents vividly, by tender and wise and picturesque object-teaching, "the message" of Mother Nature "that is ready for the human heart."

A PARABLE.

BY HENRIETTA R. ELIOT.

[Free translation of motto to "Taste Song" in Froebel's "Mother Play."]

As each new life is given to the world,
The senses, like a door that swings two ways,
Stand ever 'twixt its inner, waiting self
And that environment with which its lot Awhile is cast.

"A door that swings two ways."
Inward at first it turns, while Nature speaks
To greet her guest, and bid him to her feast,
And tell him of all things in her domain,—
The good or ill of each, and how to use;
Then outward, to set free an answering thought.
And so swift messages fly back and forth
Without surcease, until, behold! she who
As gracious host received a timid guest
Owns in that guest her rightful lord,
And gladly serves him, asking no reward.

This parable, dear mother, is for you,
Whom God has made his steward for your child.
All nature is a unit in itself,
Yet but a part of a far greater whole.
Little by little, you can teach your child
To know her ways, and live in harmony
With her, and then, in turn, help him through her
To find those verities within himself
Of which all outward things are but the type.
So, when he passes from your sheltering care,
To walk the ways of men, his soul shall be Knit to all things that are, and still most free.
And of him shall be writ at last this word,
At peace with nature, with himself and God.

FOR THE HONOR OF THE OLD SCHOOL.

The junior foot-ball team of the Hillside School had challenged the Brookdale team, and their challenge had been accepted.

"You audacious young beggars!" cried the captain of the school team, when, with glowing cheeks and eyes sparkling with excitement, they rushed into his presence, waving the note of acceptance,—"you audacious young beggars! Do you know that you have taken out a contract of David and Goliath proportions? but mind you, now that you've committed yourselves, don't you dare—do you understand?—don't you dare, for the honor of the old school, to let them beat you. The odds are all against you; but for all that," running his eyes quickly over the group of sturdy young figures before him, and speaking slowly,—"for all that I shouldn't be surprised if you could do it. And you've simply got to do it; and remember this: if I catch a man of you so much as thinking that there is a chance of failure, out he goes! Yes, I'll coach you myself; and now be off with you!" With an inward chuckle of delight at the "pluck of the youngsters," he waved them away. And they went, cheering madly; for, as the little captain said, "I hadn't a thought of doing more than scoring, and to think that Howland thinks that we can beat them!" Then every hat went into the air, and the team joined hands in a wild dance of delight, and ended by pledging themselves, man by man, that each would do all that lay within his power to forward the success of the game, "for the honor of the old school."

But among them all there was not a heart which beat with deeper delight, more loyal pride, than that of Jack Barrington.

"For the honor of the old school." How the words thrilled him! how he drew up to its full height his well-knit little figure, adding a mental to the spoken vow that he, for one, would leave no stone unturned,—would strain every nerve to do what he could to insure success!

There was but one person who heard of the "great game"—as it soon came to be called—with anything but pleasure; and that one was Joe Norton. He had been among the candidates for position on the team, and had resented Jack being chosen above him, declaring that he played every bit as good a game, and that the selection was a matter of favoritism. There is little doubt, had his first statement been correct,—which it was not,—that, all things being even, Jack would have received the appointment, for Joe's character was not such among his companions as to make him a favorite. And one who is in the habit of taking mean advantages—who is not above "cheating" at games if the opportunity occurs—is not to be trusted on a foot-ball field.

But Joe, as I have said, resented the decision, and, with the meanness worthy such as he, visited it (in his own mind) upon the innocent Jack, going so far as to vow that he would "get even with him yet." So the news that the team was to meet the famous Brookdales, and that the school captain predicted success for them, was bitter indeed. But he said nothing; and as the days went by, and the training and coaching progressed in a most satisfactory manner, adding but fuel to Joe's vindictive feelings, his resentment toward the unconscious Jack grew daily stronger. And at last his opportunity came.

Late one lovely October afternoon he had climbed far up into a great pine-tree on the grounds to examine a nest which he had discovered there. Before he had been there many minutes, he saw, crossing the playground, Howland, the captain of the school team, and a classmate of his. They came straight for the pine, and seated themselves on a bench at its foot; and in one moment Joe decided that he would not get down, as he had first intended, for, behold! they were in the midst of a conversation concerning the coming match.

"Yes," Howland was saying, "I think that they have an excellent chance. I'm really proud of the youngsters. I never saw better grit or more thorough, conscientious work. There's but one weak spot in the team, and that's not very serious; but, were it not for little Barrington, I would say that it was a sure thing, though the other team outweighs them, and is in fine trim."

No wonder that Joe "pricked up his ears," as he himself would have expressed it; no wonder that he leaned down in the fast-gathering dusk to drink in every word.

"Barrington? Oh, yes, I know,—the fellow who holds up his head and looks you square in the eyes when he speaks to you. I've heard more than one nice thing about him. He's weak, you say? That's too bad; but how did it happen that he got on the team?"

*"Hobson's choice when it was made up; and now, when I might do better, I haven't the heart. He's the out and out finest little chap I ever came across, the soul of honor, and such an eager, enthusiastic young one I never saw. In fact, it is his anxiety to do well that is the trouble. His work is splendid; but at times he gets flustered, and loses his head when it is very important that he shouldn't. There's a new fellow who came after the team was made up, and who has been playing against them in the practice games. His general play isn't a bit better than Barrington's; but he has what little Jack lacks, a steady head, any provocation to the contrary. He's one of those chaps, you know, who wouldn't be, or rather wouldn't act, surprised if a gun went off behind his ear. If he had Barrington's place, I should say that it was a sure thing. But, as it is, I'm not afraid much. At any rate, I shall not say a word to him. It may be unprofessional, but I'm blest if I could do it. His heart is just bound up in the team, and he shan't be disappointed. If there was any material difference or if he lost his head often, I should be obliged to make the change; but as it is"—* And with a little shrug of his shoulders he rose to his feet, as his companion said:—

"I think that you're exactly right. No doubt, when the time comes, he will come up to the scratch." And they walked away together, and entered the school-house.

When they were well out of sight, Joe got down, somewhat cramped by the strain to keep from moving, and made straight for the library, where he had reason to think that he should find Jack, and where he did come upon him, alone in the great room, seated close to the window, with the last rays of the setting sun falling on his book.

"Hallo, Barrington!" he said carelessly, as he sauntered across the room: "it seems to me you're getting very fond of your book, pegging away out of study hours."

Jack looked up in surprise, for it was not Joe's way to be particularly friendly, but answered pleasantly, all unconscious that he was falling into the trap set for his feet, "Yes: you see I try to get in all the odd moments that I can; for the practice takes so much time, and the folks at home count on my keeping up with these," nodding toward his books.

An unpleasant smile curled the corners of Joe's mouth.

"You think a lot of being on the team, don't you?"

"Yes, indeed! Why, I'd rather be on it, in this game,—even if we only score,—than to be the President of the United States." His eyes sparkled, and the color came into his cheeks as he tossed back the mop of bright brown hair which would come tumbling down into his eyes.

"Humph!" said Joe, dryly; but he did not look down into those great honest eyes which glanced so straight up into his face. "Humph! it's rather a pity that Howland doesn't seem to feel so anxious about keeping you as you are to stay in."

"What!" cried poor Jack: "what's that you say?" The bright color was gone now, and the brown eyes had a startled, anguished expression.

"I didn't say it," laughed Joe: "it was Howland. I heard him say to-day that but for you victory would be sure. He said that Dana would be the one for your place, he doesn't lose his head as you do. But you needn't look so scared. He isn't going to turn you out. He's afraid that you would cry if you were disappointed." And, with a laugh of satisfaction at the success of his work, he turned on his heel, and left the room.

And Jack?

Down upon the folded arms went the tumbled brown head. What did it all mean? Not want him,—Howland not want him! A sound like the surging of water was in his head. His temples were throbbing, he could not think, could not collect himself. Dana should be in his place! Oh, he must think! he must know what it all meant! But not there: he could not run the risk of being questioned!

Seizing his hat, which lay beside him on a chair, he hurried out into the grounds. The boys were standing about in groups; but he passed them all quickly by, walking straight ahead, out of the gate, and down the road. He never knew exactly how he got there, but presently he found himself entering the little church, the door of which stood invitingly open. It might have been from force of habit, for he often went over to listen when the choir was practising; but, be that as it may, it suited his purpose well now, for it was empty and dark, save for a dim light at the organ. And, flinging himself down at full length on the cushion of one of the pews near the door, his face again buried in his folded arms, he set himself to meet and answer his question. Never for a moment did it occur to him to doubt Joe's word. Something told him that the boy was for once telling the truth, in so far as having repeated what he had really heard. But was it true? Was it a fact that Dana would do better work than he? As calmly and quietly as he could, he sent his mind back over the past. Yes, though he had not realized it before, he could see that it was true. He could recall more than one instance when he had not made the most of an opportunity because he could not decide on the instant what would be the best thing to do; and then he seemed to see Dana, always cool, calm, and collected. "He is better, I can see that he is; but, oh, I cannot give it up, I cannot! Howland has not asked it of me. None of the others would dream of such a thing!"

But what about that promise made to the boys, reiterated so solemnly to himself,—that promise of which Howland knew nothing? Would playing on the team himself be doing "all within his power to forward the success of the game?" He knew that it would not,—knew that only by giving up his place to Dana, would he be keeping the spirit of his vow.

But give it up! give up that position which, as he had truly said, he would rather have than any in the world! No, never! No one would ever know that he even suspected that his place could be better filled. "No one but yourself—and one other."

That night before he slept he had decided on his course, and on the morning of the game the following note was placed in the school captain's hands:—

Dear Howland,—Please give Dana my place on the team to-day. He'll do better in it than I could; and we must win! You've always been so kind to me that perhaps you will think of asking me to keep it. Please don't, for I've quite made up my mind. Would you mind asking the fellows not to say anything to me about the change?

Faithfully yours,
JACK BARRINGTON.

"Read that, will you!" cried Howland, striding across the passage to his friend's room. "Of course, you see that some one overheard our conversation the other day, and has repeated it to him,—the scoundrel! But I must let him have his way now. Poor little beggar! doesn't want the fellows to say anything to him about it! I suppose he knows that that would be more than he could stand. And to think of his offering to be substitute!" And then he turned hastily away, and went back to his own room.

Of course, they won: I should not have had the heart to tell the story but for that; and of course, when they were alone again together, the whole school went wild over the successful team, even the doctor and the tutors coming out to add their word, and cheer after cheer sounded through the crisp November air. But finally there was a little pause, and then a strange thing happened. Howland had jumped up on a bench, and, holding up his hand for silence, spoke.

"This has been a great day," he said, "and I most heartily congratulate the team upon its splendid success. But I feel that, before we separate, it is only right that I should tell you of a circumstance in connection with it. Many of you have asked, all of you have wondered, why, almost at the last moment, a certain change was made in the team. I will now state that it was at the urgent request of that member himself, who, while thoroughly appreciating the honor of being on it to-day, still insisted upon resigning in favor of one who, he was convinced, would more perfectly insure the victory which you have achieved. It was a great victory against fearful odds:

it for granted that you want to get the best results in painting, you will have to use Pure White Lead to obtain them. There are many mixtures branded "White Lead," "Pure White Lead," etc., which contain little, if any, White Lead, but are principally barytes, which is of little value, if not worthless. To be sure, accept only a genuine brand (see list).

If you want any shade of color, tint the White Lead with National Lead Co.'s tinting colors, prepared expressly for this purpose. A feature of these colors is the ease with which they are used and the exactness with which the desired shade is obtained. For particulars send for pamphlet, free.

it will not soon be forgotten; but I think that the doctor will bear me out," turning to where that gentleman stood, "in saying that, great though it was, this act of which I have just told you redounds even more to the honor of the old school."

While he was speaking, his eyes had passed quickly over the upturned faces, and there was a strange, enlightened expression in his own, as, stepping down, he went straight to Jack, who was standing with bowed head and eyes blinded by sudden tears, and, catching the trembling hands in both his, held them in a warm grasp till the doctor came up, and took them from him with a beaming face.

There was no cheering; but silently, one by one, the boys came and grasped the hand which all felt it an honor to hold, till, feeling that he could stand no more, Jack broke suddenly from them, and with a bound disappeared through the great door. Then, indeed, the cheers broke out, and more than "three times three" were given for "Little Barrington,—an honor to the old school!"

It was noticed by more than one that, as he passed through them on his way to the house, Howland stopped before Joe Norton, and for a moment looked him full in the face, then turned and walked away, and from that time on never saw him when they met.—By Annie L. Hannah, in the Churchman.

DEAD BIRDS.

It was an Easter Sunday, bright and calm;
And life, not death, was the glad theme that day.
The air was full of spring's delicious balm,
The maple-buds were dropping on the way,
And one sweet leaf with flush of crimson on it
Fell on the dead birds of a woman's bonnet.

What say the bells at these good Easter times?
They tell of vanquished death and risen life.
Hush, then, O bells, your inconsistent chimes:
You and the dull old world are hard at strife;
For, surely, where the crimson leaf fell on it
I saw dead birds upon a woman's bonnet.

—Selected.

JOHN LIKED FUN.

John was tricky. Those who thought him a "beauty," smart and obedient, knew that he was mischievous and full of his "jokes."

John certainly did have a love of fun in his "make-up" which made him a jolly companion for four boys, who in turn did like to "plague the poor old chap," the family horse.

John was black-coated, strong and intelligent. His tricks were not vicious ones. He never kicked, balked, nor ran away, being sober and well-conducted when driven or ridden by the senior members of the family.

He had a fondness for his master, who petted him a great deal. The women could drive him. He brought them home in just the same condition they started out. It was only with the boys of the family that John ventured to "joke."

There were four of them, Ernest, Walter, Henry, and Albert, bright young fellows, who delighted to tickle John's nose with a fragrant-smelling apple, snatching it away when he prepared to enjoy it.

John was a pig in his love for mellow, ripe apples. The boys thought it fun to tease him a little, and make him anxious to get it before giving it up to him.

They really did teach him to play "hide and seek" with them.

One of his tricks was to sigh and swell up his body when being saddled, if one of the little boys was about to ride him.

Of course, the saddle sometimes turned after they had ridden a little distance.

Another trick was snatching a cap from their heads, and galloping away with it to the furthest corner, whinnying defiance to the capless youngster.

One May afternoon, as I sat beside a window, some boyish voices called: "We are going to ride out to Muddy Fork. John is lazy; don't have enough to do."

John looked at me, and I plainly saw fun in his eyes. He made a nip at an apple geranium, and then went along as sober as judges are said to be.

His expression plainly said to me: "These four boys seated upon my back are hunting for fun. I'll help find it."

Ernest and Albert whistled gayly. Henry and Walter urged "lazy bones" along.

"Such a good horse as he is! It isn't every one that would carry such a load of restless boys," was my thought, as John slowly crept along, head down, apparently meditating deeply.

In an hour four boys, wet and muddy, walked in at the gate.

"What has he done?" I inquired.

"Done?" chorused an indignant quartette of boyish voices. "He poked all along, as if he was almost asleep, until we got into the water. Then he lay down and spilled us off his back, and just galloped home. He did it on purpose, of course he did. He thinks he can play tricks on us little boys. He don't dare to try 'em on men."

We went to the back gate and saw John standing there, looking meek and subdued, only—I detected a twinkle in his eyes.

He received a scolding, which he did not heed; and a few minutes after I saw him in the stable yard with four boys perched on his back.—Prairie Farmer.

HARMLESS TREE SQUIRRELS.

Of the tree squirrels (genus Sciurus) there are fifty-seven species and subspecies; but there are not so many individuals that any boy or man can go out with a nasty old shotgun and kill a dozen of them in one day without being guilty of pot-hunting and murder. I have known men to boast of having "bagged" twenty-eight, thirty-six, and even forty squirrels in one day,—as if they had done a thing to be proud of! Proud of what? Of waging elaborate and scientific warfare on the easiest of all "game" to kill.—W. T. Hornaday, in St. Nicholas.

THE HABITS OF BEES.

It is said that under favorable circumstances a colony of thirty thousand bees may store about two pounds of honey in a day. Of thirty thousand bees in a hive, which is a moderate-sized colony, half of them stay at home keeping house, tending the babies, feeding the queen, and guarding the stores. In fine, clear weather a worker may gather three or four grains of honey in a day. As large colonies contain as many as fifty thousand bees, it may be seen that possibly twenty-five thousand individuals are out seeking honey. The amount each one brings in is infinitely small, but there is strength in numbers; and one can readily imagine, by watching the little workers pouring into a hive, that even the few grains at a time will fill up the cells quite rapidly. But a single bee would make slow work of it, and would, if continuously occupied, require some years to gather one pound of honey.—New York Ledger.

TWO DOGS.

Two dogs, Rose and Fannie, were members of the same family. The mistress of the two dogs owned a shawl which Fan claimed as her own, and would not permit Rose to use or even share. Fan was the older, and had been in the family longer than Rose, toward whom she showed many signs of jealousy. Fan had the privilege of sleeping on her mistress's bed on her favorite shawl. She would growl if any one approached the bed. Especially did she show anger if Rose came near her.

One day Rose was so badly hurt that she was sent to the dog doctor's for treatment. She was gone for several weeks. When Rose returned, every one was glad to have her back; and none more glad than Fan, who even gave up her place on her favorite shawl to Rose in her mistress's arms. The dear mistress was ill in bed. Fan went to the foot of the bed, surrendering her place to Rose. Two days after Fan's sympathy was exhausted, and her jealousy asserted itself; and she drove Rose from the shawl and her place beside her mistress, and took it herself, never giving it up again.—Outlook.

HOW THE CAT SAVED THE HOUSE.

A man in this State owns a big cat. This man and his cat live alone in a house on the outskirts of a village. The man smokes. It is supposed that a spark from his pipe fell in some sawdust to which it set fire. The man went to bed, but in the night the cat wakened him by scratching his face. The man found the cabin full of smoke. He rang his bell, and blew his horn until the neighbors came and helped him put out the fire that pussy discovered. The neighbors bought a collar for the cat.—The Outlook.

NATIONAL ALLIANCE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.

The monthly meeting was held at 25 Beacon Street, Boston, on Friday, May 10, at 10.30 A.M., seventeen present.

The corresponding secretary gave an account of interesting visits to New Bedford, where a Branch has been lately formed, and to Newport. An address had also been given at the Plymouth and Bay Conference, in which are some very active Branches.

A letter was received from Rev. Clay MacCauley, expressing much pleasure at the promise of some additional books for the library at Tokyo. As he has now the whole responsibility of the Japan Mission, whose scope has become much enlarged, offers and promises of books will be most welcome; and he suggests that each Alliance Branch should agree to send one book, and thus complete the original requisition. Some Branches have already done this, and the treasurer has received nearly $30 for this purpose this year. Mr. MacCauley writes that he has given about one hundred much needed books from his own library rather than see the students in want of them. He continues: "It is no exaggeration to say that in the standard of our studies and the abilities of most of our students, we ought to be ranked with Meadville. Our teachers, too, are of a high order. Three of the four Japanese teachers are graduates of the Imperial University. The fourth has a national reputation."

A very pleasant letter was also received from Mrs. Sarah Pratt Carr, for whose work Rev. Mr. Wendte recently made an appeal to the Alliance. Of the society at Hanford she says: "Our little church is the first one to be started in this vicinity, and, except one, the only one in the San Joaquin Valley, which is three hundred miles long and about sixty miles wide. We have a little town of two thousand people, and a woful amount of ignorance of Unitarian aims and work; but we have done well for a six months' beginning. We number thirty-five members, and among them we have some of the best and most intelligent people in the community. We are now straining every point to lease and fit up a small brick building, which can be had for a reasonable rent, $15 a month, and which is very central, and can be made very attractive and comfortable. We have hard work to raise enough yet for regular expenses; but I hope and fully believe that we shall grow to be a great influence for good in the town, and that this little church will be the beginning of a spread of the liberal faith that will reach every good-sized town in this great valley."

"Please through your reports thank each individual Branch for its donation. I would do so myself; but perhaps that would be a little uncalled for, and perhaps they would not want me to use up in postage and stationery money that would do good and lasting work in other ways."

A letter of thanks came from the little society at Neillsville, Wis., which has received some small gifts from the Branches which have been much appreciated.

Mrs. Andrews was present at the meeting, and spoke of the excellent work being done at Green Harbor, Mass. There is still a small sum needed to complete the desired salary of the pastor; and, if any Branches have money not yet appropriated, it is hoped they will remember Grace Chapel. If each New England Branch would give five to ten dollars annually, Grace Chapel would easily be sustained without constant appeals.

Miss Clarke reported that she was disappointed in not being able to present the new "Study Class Leaflet" before the Branches closed the work for the summer; but it will be ready in ample time to be considered in the autumn. This "Leaflet" will be upon the subject of "Unitarian Belief," and will be of unusual interest and value.

It was voted that the National Alliance should contribute $10 annually to the American Unitarian Association, to entitle it to representation at the business meetings, according to the by-laws of the Association.

The secretary gave a detailed account of her visit to Baltimore, where she had been warmly welcomed, and had attended all the meetings of the Southern Conference. She had met many delegates from the Southern churches and Alliance Branches, and also some of the ministers doing the "circuit" service in which the Alliance is much interested.

It is announced with much pleasure that the usual May meeting of the Alliance will be held at the Second Church, Copley Square, Boston, on Wednesday, May 29, at ten o'clock. Box lunch and social hour at the close of the meeting. It was voted that no collection should be taken, and all members of the Alliance and others interested are cordially invited to be present.

The secretary takes this opportunity to state that these Register reports contain only such work of the Branches as is reported to the Executive Board through the directors and vice-presidents. Consequently, only such appropriations of money as are so reported are mentioned. The treasurer's report of all money received by her appears only in the "Manual."

Twenty-five dollars has been received from the Branch of the Third Religious Society, Dorchester, Mass., to make Miss Elizabeth Parsons Channing a life member of the Alliance. This graceful gift was in honor of Miss Channing's birthday.

The Sunday School.

Although no new service for Children's Sunday, or Flower Sunday, is published this year by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, reprints for 1891, 1892, 1893, and 1894 are available. These services have proven very popular in the past, and ought to be acceptable for continued use. Price 5 cents per copy, or $4 per hundred.

At the anniversary meeting of the Unitarian Sunday School Society at King's Chapel, Thursday, May 30, at 2 P.M., the speakers will be Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, Rev. Minot J. Savage, Rev. Benjamin R. Bulkeley, Rev. Paul R. Frothingham, and Miss Sarah L. Arnold.

The usual Channing Hall "Talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, May 18. The subjects treated will be Lesson XXXIV., "Jesus before Pilate," and Lesson XXXV., "The Death of Jesus." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham. Intermediate and advanced at 3 o'clock, by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

The second edition of the "New Song and Service Book" is now ready. The publication and selling of this help to Sunday-schools at such a low price was rendered possible only by using money from the usual contributions sent by the churches and Sunday-schools to the Unitarian Sunday School Society. This is one of the ways in which donations are rendered back to the denomination in the channel which directly assists Sunday-schools not financially strong.

SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—The eighth regular meeting, twelfth season, 1894-95, will be held in the parlors of the Church of the Disciples, corner of Warren Avenue and West Brookline Street, Monday, May 20, 1895. Subject, "The Sunday-school and Church.—Joint Services, Doctrinal Teaching, Confirmation Classes, and Other Means of Uniting Sunday-school and Church." Speakers: Rev. George W. Cutter, Newport; Rev. George C. Wright, Lowell; Rev. Minot J. Savage, Boston.

NEW YORK SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—The second annual festival of the Union was held last Sunday in the Church of the Saviour, Brooklyn. Persistent showers interfered seriously with the attendance. Moreover, Rev. Edward A. Horton, who had been engaged to address the Union both at its festival and its annual meeting, was detained by illness. In spite of these serious drawbacks the three hundred and fifty children of the Brooklyn schools, with a few from out of town, made up a very happy and resonant chorus, which sang heartily and listened attentively to addresses made by Rev. Messrs. Edward Hale and Frederick J. Gould. At the annual meeting on Monday the attendance was unusually large, the supper being served by the ladies of the church at New Brighton. At the business session the following officers and directors for the season of 1895-96 were elected: president, Frank R. Mitchell; vice-president, A. Emerson Palmer; secretary, Rev. George H. Badger; assistant secretary, Miss Edith Holden; treasurer, Miss Helen E. Stone; directors, Henry B. Wells, Rev. Messrs. Russell N. Bellows, Samuel A. Eliot, and Frank S. C. Wicks, Miss Nathalie Vidaud, Miss Elizabeth B. Curtis, Mrs. Edward M. Cook, Mrs. Clifford E. Bellows, Mrs. Frederick P. Forster. At the evening session Mr. Horton's place was taken at short notice by Mrs. Harriet Lincoln Coolidge of Orange, who held the delighted attention of her hearers, as she explained, with charming clearness, simplicity, and mastery of her subject, her adaptation of Froebel's methods to the Sunday-school kindergarten.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.
I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.
I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

Temperance.

Paris is mainly a wine-drinking town, but, like Marseilles and Lyons, does not consume so much as many of the smaller towns; though, when examined in detail, the provision seems to be on a sufficiently generous scale. In Paris the annual rate per head is 340 pints of wine, 16 of cider, 21 of beer, and rather over 12 pints per head of spirits.

The temperance law recently passed in Indiana requires that all screens and obstructions shall be taken away from the doors and windows of saloons, and that all townships and city wards shall have local option to suppress as well as to license them. This law is a great movement in advance, and is an indication of the rapidly growing sentiment toward the suppression of the traffic.—Methodist Recorder.

Education.

A large and very successful school of domestic science is in operation at Pratt Institution, Brooklyn. There is a normal course of two years, and classes and private pupils take lessons in different branches of housework and cooking. There are large kitchens, laboratories, and laundry, and all the necessary paraphernalia for successful work.

The twenty-seventh anniversary of Hampton Institute will be celebrated in connection with the exercises of the graduating class, May 22 and 23. On Friday, May 24, there will be a conference of graduates, former members of the school, and officers and friends of the school in regard to the methods by which the best interests of the colored race in the South can be promoted. The subjects to be considered are "Industrial Openings for Negroes, and How they are filled," "Home Life among the Negroes," "Education," and "Influence of Colored Leaders over their People."

Charities and Reforms.

The International Prison Congress, which is to take place this year in Paris, will open its session on June 30 next at the College of France. Representation at this congress is assured from eighteen foreign governments. These are England, Belgium, Austria, Denmark, Spain, United States, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Norway, Roumania, Russia, Serbia, Sweden, Switzerland, and Holland.

The sixty-third annual report of Perkins Institution and Massachusetts School for the Blind gives a very complete account of the last year's work. It contains a detailed report of the development of Edith Thomas, Willie Robin, and Tommy Stringer; and the touching anecdotes ought to open wide the pocket-books of many who have not yet contributed to this important and inspiring work. It is a wonderful story, this of opening the perceptions of these unfortunate children to the hidden world of light, sound, and communication; and the report ought to be widely circulated.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHARITIES AND CORRECTION.—The twenty-second National Conference of Charities and Correction will be held in New Haven, May 24 to May 30. The following is a partial list of speakers and subjects:—

Saturday morning, May 25, at Alumni Hall.—Reports from States; "The Ideal Function of State Boards in the Economy of the Commonwealth," by Dr. F. H. Wines of Illinois.

Saturday afternoon, May 25, at Seminary Building.—Section Meetings, "Child-saving Work": "Some Problems in Child-saving Work," by C. Loring Brace, secretary Children's Aid Society, New York; "Colored Children in the South," by H. W. Lewis, Washington; "Preventive Legislation and Work in Ontario," by J. J. Kelso, superintendent Ontario, Toronto. Section II., "Juvenile Reformation": "Discipline: How Best to attain it, concretely considered," J. E. Coffin, superintendent, Whittier, Cal.; "Farm School for Girls: How conducted, and with What Results," Mrs. L. L. Brackett, superintendent, Lancaster, Mass.; "Military Drill: Its Place in Promoting Discipline, and the Extent to which it may be carried with Profit," F. H. Briggs, Rochester, N.Y. Section III., "Charity Organization": "Aids to Friendly Visitors."

Saturday evening, May 25, at United Church, 8 P.M.—"Sociology in Institutions of Learning": opening address by President Seth Low of Columbia College, New York; "Is the Term 'Social Classes' a Scientific Category?" by Prof. Franklin H. Giddings of New York; "The Statistical Study of Hereditary Criminality," by Prof. E. R. L. Gould of Baltimore; "Sociological Instruction in Schools and Colleges: Its Feasibility and Probable Results," by Prof. H. H. Powers of Northampton, Mass.; "Science and Sentiment in Economic Policy," by Prof. Arthur T. Hadley of New Haven; paper on "The Elberfeld System," by Dr. C. R. Henderson of Chicago (correspondence from Berlin).

Sunday, May 26, at United Church.—Conference sermon, by Rev. T. T. Munger, D.D., of New Haven. "Child-saving Work": "The Future of Preventive Work," by Charles W. Birtwell, general secretary Boston Children's Aid Society; "Trade Schools: Their Place in Education, Industry, and Philanthropy," by Prof. Charles R. Richards, director of the Department of Science and Technology, Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, N.Y.; "Problems of an Institution," by Walter A. Wheeler, superintendent State Primary School, Monson, Mass.

Here and There.

A large Syrian settlement is to be established in Chicago. There are ten thousand natives of the Holy Land in this country, and an effort is being made by their clergy to make that city their Mecca. The plan is to make a nucleus of the fifteen to eighteen hundred Syrians now in Chicago, induce them to manufacture the unique loom goods of their own country, and start other Oriental industries. Once initiated into the wonders of modern civilization, it is hoped they will return to Syria as teachers of the less fortunate.

At a recent meeting the Committee on Concessions and Privileges granted to Kee Owyang, a Chinaman representing a New York company, the right to erect the Chinese Village at the Cotton States and International Exposition. This village will be of characteristic Chinese architecture, and one hundred and sixty feet square. It will be surrounded by a wall; and inside will be a Chinese theatre, booths, flower-gardens, tea-house, and all manner of Chinese attractions. Chinese merchants will have on sale their rich and unique wares, and the village will be a veritable little Chinatown. The concessionaire is an educated Chinese gentleman, and is backed by ample capital.

A despatch from Berlin to the Evening Post says: "An Englishwoman, Miss Grace Chisholm, has just taken the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at the University of Göttingen, with the express permission of the Prussian Minister of Education. This is the first degree ever taken by a woman since Göttingen became a Prussian university. The emperor has hitherto opposed the admission of women to the imperial universities; and it is supposed that the conferring of the degree upon Miss Chisholm indicates a change of policy, and the beginning of further concessions in regard to the higher education of women. The new departure has caused much stir in the German academic world."

Send it Back

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlina." IT'S FALSE—Pearlina is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearlina, be honest—send it back.

A Restoration of the original colors, but no change in them, is all that happens with Pearlina. The dirt is taken out, and that brings the colors back—but they are never taken away.

If they are not hurt by water, they won't be hurt by Pearlina.

For washing that has been proved to be absolutely safe, without any risk, nothing costs less than Pearlina.

Any other kind of washing is likely to be dear, no matter what the price.

Its SCREW and PLUNGE LIFT for regulating Wick; Lift Attachment for LIGHTING without removing Chimney; SIMPLICITY of Design for Rewicking, and Cleanliness combine to make the

MILLER Lamp

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.

All parts Interchangeable, any of them can be supplied, and it costs no more than the ordinary centre-draft Lamp without our Patented Improvements.

FILES OF "THE UNITARIAN."

I wish to say to persons desiring to obtain back numbers of the Unitarian in order to complete their sets, that they will need to attend to the matter between now and the 10th of June, or it will be too late. The present publisher, Mr. Geo. H. Ellis, can furnish back numbers since January, 1891, the time when the publication office was removed to Boston. But for the five years previous to that time back numbers can be obtained only from me. Most of the numbers of that period I can furnish; but I shall dispose of all before June 10, after which time it will be impossible for me to give aid to any in completing their early files.

Back Bay little boy prayed the Lord to send a baby to his home. "O Lord," he entreated earnestly, "send a baby to our house, either a little brother or a little sister, I ain't particular which!"—The Transcript.

Teacher in Geography Class: "Jim Smith, can you name ten animals peculiar to the arctic regions?" Jim Smith: "Yes, sir." Teacher: "What are they?" Jim Smith: "Five seals and five polar bears, sir."

A little boy was coming home with his mother from church when he heard her saying that the sermon was not worth much. The little boy immediately turned round and said: "O mother! what could you expect for a half-penny?"—Tit-Bits.

An anonymous donor once sent the late Prebendary Calthrop the princely sum of fourpence, urging him to have his hair cut. The prebendary announced the fact in church, adding that he had never paid less than sixpence, and suggesting that his adviser should send the balance of this sum.—Churchman.

The other day, when a prim, precise New England professor sat down to dinner in a Southern hotel, three waiters in quick succession asked him if he would have soup. A little annoyed, he said to the last waiter who asked, "Is it compulsory?" "No, sah," answered the waiter: "no, sah, I think it am mock turtle."

Magnus (who has just moved into a cottage in the suburbs): "See here! I thought you said this was a healthy neighborhood." Acres: "So it is." Magnus: "Well, I can't agree with you. We had not been here a month before my wife sprained her ankle, and yesterday the baby ate something that disagreed with him."

"I could have laughed outright," said Mrs. Brown, "when we were going round Barnum and Bailey's menagerie on Friday." "Why, what happened?" asked Mrs. Jones. "Well, Mrs. Smith called an animal a seraph. Of course, she meant a giraffe; but the fun of it was, it wasn't a giraffe at all. It was a camomile!"—American.

A little girl of seven years was cutting out some paper dolls the other day to show to a friend. The lady objected that the dolls' heads were too wide. "Take the scissors, dear, and trim them off," she said. "No," replied the little maid, "I can't do that: they have to be wide,—they're swelled with instruction!"—Youth's Companion.

A young bachelor, who was beset by a sewing-machine agent, told the latter that his machine would not answer the purpose. "Why," said the agent with voluble praise, "it is the best machine on the market in every respect." "That may be," replied the supposed customer, "but the sewing-machine I am looking for must have flaxen hair and blue eyes."

Little Jack prays every night for all the different members of his family. His father had been away at one time for a short journey, and that night Jack was praying for him as usual. "Bless papa and take care of him," he was beginning, as usual, when suddenly he raised his head and listened. "Never mind about it now, Lord," ended the little fellow, "I hear him down in the hall."

A Harvard student, recently attempting a history of the English language, spoke of the parent German as divided "into High and Low German, the first spoken by the nobility, the second by the peasants and low classes in general." But even this was eclipsed by a statement made by the same man, without any sense of its occult secondary meaning. "Pope's style," he wrote, "seems belabored." To any one who has read the usual criticism of Pope this is exquisitely true.—Boston Budget.

Editorial.

THE Cumberland Presbyterian rightly believes that all evils cannot be cured by legislation: "We in America have held too much to the faith—or the superstition—that legislation and the sovereign acts of government are the cure for all our economic and even our social and moral ills. We do not fully enough understand that evils—financial, social, and political, as well as moral—have their root in individual character, in home training or neglect, in the deep undercurrent of wrong social influences, beyond the reach of Congress or legislatures or judges."

AN important movement for practical reform has recently been organized in the city of New York, which promises large results. The plan is to organize the churches of different denominations into a confederation, under the title of the Council of Churches of New York City. It is proposed to divide the city into parishes, each parish to include the churches within its limits, and each to do a certain part of the work to be accomplished. By this confederation of the churches for charitable, social, and religious objects, it is expected that many hindrances and obstacles now existing under the present system will be overcome, and a waste of money and energy prevented. This organization has the earnest support of a large number of the prominent laymen and ministers of the city. Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst is an active supporter, and it is proposed to begin at once. Rev. Dr. Hegeman, in an address at a recent meeting, went at length into the sociological condition of the great metropolis, and gave many facts relating to the number of liquor saloons, churches, and the condition of the people. He was confident that the introduction of the new motive of united action would cause an increase of workers and money.

THE series of open-air meetings on the Boston Common which was inaugurated last Sunday afternoon is simply another effort of the officers of the Fraternity of Churches to reach out and influence the masses. At the Parker Fraternity, Pitts Street Chapel, and other places the Unitarians have been engaged with earnestness and success in bringing the Church into closer contact with the people. The first meetings on the Common had a special interest as a movement in this direction. The congregation, estimated at over a thousand, and made up of all classes and conditions of men and women, gathered round a box under one of the trees on which the speakers, Mr. Walkley and Dr. Hale, stood. Near them were the singers and others interested in this movement. The audience itself was a study as they listened to the preachers. Although there were other meetings near, where some of the burning social questions were advocated, order and attention were very general; and the people remained till the close. The topics chosen were such as brought the thought of God, personal responsibility, and the value of a good life home to the hearers. The service was simple, direct, and impressive, especially that part where all repeated the Lord's Prayer. Leaflets of a religious character were distributed; and, as none were scattered on the ground after the hearers dispersed, they were probably taken home. The friends of this movement were encouraged by the result of this meeting, and will go on with energy and zeal in this effort to bring the great truths of religion home to the people, and to put them into closer touch with the Church.

THE selection of Bishop Potter of New York as umpire before the committees representing the Marble Workers' Union and the Marble Industry Employers' Association is a hopeful event, and marks the promise of something better yet to come. The strikes are often the result of a misunderstanding and ignorance between the contending parties; and, if instead of fighting each other both sides would try to know more of each other, and treat their differences with more candor and fairness, many serious outbreaks would be avoided. It is a just tribute on both sides to Bishop Potter that he should be chosen. He is in a position to mediate between the parties, and the judicial spirit he has shown fits him for this delicate and difficult office. He believes that many strikes are due to misunderstandings, and in this case recognizes "the sound common sense" of the workmen's committee, and that "the employers have no idea of acting otherwise than fairly with the men" employed. The result will be watched with great interest, especially by those who hope that this example may be followed, so that the misery and loss of strikes may cease, and that both employer and employed may be brought into more cordial and intelligent relations. This is a step forward in the right direction.

ONE of the most interesting phases of the religious life and thought of our times is that of liberal Judaism. The history of Israel has often raised up its prophets, who on the mount of vision have caught glimpses of new truth and seen the dawn of a brighter future. The fires of worship have thus often been relighted, and the soul freshened and enriched by new and nobler truths. Among the foremost of this class in our time is Dr. Hirsch, minister of Sinai Temple in Chicago. For more than three half-score years he has labored both with signal ability and success. During the Chicago Fair he was an efficient worker in the Parliament of Religions, and has in many ways proved the breadth of his spirit and his elevated religious thought. At the recent thirty-fourth anniversary of his ministry he preached a sermon in which he urged upon his congregation a renewed fidelity and consecration to the work of keeping liberal Judaism before the world. "If the past is glorious, the present is all the more heavy with responsibility, and the future a field for renewed progress and success." While full of the broadest sympathy for others, he urged the Sinai congregation to work on distinct religious lines, adding, as reported: "Into Judaism, and not out of it, is our watchword. More Judaism, and not less of it, shall we have learned these thirty-four years." In justice to him we should add that his Judaism is of the noblest and loftiest type.

THE Golden Jubilee in commemoration of Archbishop-Williams's service of fifty years, which took place in Boston last week, was an event of wide significance, and has an interest far beyond the borders of the Roman Catholic Church. Men of diverse religious opinions were invited to join this household of faith in their tribute to the character and life of the archbishop. Besides the highest dignitaries of his own church, representative men of other denominations were present; and the voices of both State and city officials joined in their tributes. It is doubtful whether such an exhibition of general good feeling could have been possible twenty-five years ago; and the chief importance of this testimonial is the evidence it gives of the growth of a more kindly and liberal feeling both on the part of the Roman Catholics and Protestants. This was admirably illustrated in the speech of Gov. Greenhalge, when he emphasized the fact that we have been all growing together, and that "a spirit of liberalism has brightened every sect, every denomination, every party, every race; and your own Church has not stood still in these fifty years." Surely, it was an occasion "worthy to go into the past and to illumine the future!" It helps, amid the rivalries of sects and the divisions of creed, to lift the community into that broader idea of American citizenship which is the glory of our country. Religious and race hatreds in the past have been a blight and curse. Everything which helps to soften these antagonisms and to inspire, alike in Roman Catholics and Protestants, a broader spirit of toleration, will help forward the best interests alike of patriotism and religion.

THE Thirty-first International Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations recently held at Springfield, Mass., is a striking demonstration of the power of organization, when guided by zeal, courage, and faith. The report of what has been done is an object-lesson enforcing the value of combined efforts. These associations for young men began with the specific work of carrying on evangelistic meetings in the by-ways of towns and cities. But they have now broadened in their methods, so as to add social, physical, and educational agencies, and thus aim to touch the young man on all sides of his life. This was made so evident in this great gathering that many of the stricter sort began to fear that the direct religious agencies were in danger of being overlooked. But there is no evidence of this beyond the fact that more and more activity is given to general influences. The increase in numbers and wealth has been enormous. As reported, the active membership has reached 116,761; while the value of Association buildings and of real estate, deducting debt, exceeds $13,000,000. There are now 103 railroad associations, with a membership of nearly 26,000. There are also 570 brotherhoods in colleges, and there is the manifest purpose to increase the work so as to embrace all the colleges in the world and all of our large railroads. With an energy born of an earnest enthusiasm and devout consecration, these workers go forth to influence the young men for their highest good. Notwithstanding the narrowness which excludes from active membership all who are not of the evangelical creed, and that efforts are chiefly directed to advance the evangelical type of theology, it still remains true that, as a part of the great Christian forces in action, the Young Men's Christian Associations are in their own way helping to establish the religion of Jesus in the world, and to build up the kingdom of God, which rests on righteousness, truth, and love.

WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.

The meetings of this organization held in Chicago last week were marked by a spirit in every way excellent and worthy of emulation. There was plainly a hearty desire for union and co-operation with all those who, bearing the Unitarian name, would most naturally seek its fellowship; and, though there was no abatement of the determination of the conference not to be limited in its sympathies by any denominational ties, the practical need of standing closely together within the denominational circle was strongly felt and emphasized. As by universal consent there was a disposition to let alone the discussion of issues, from debate of which little gain can now be expected. If there has been division of thought and feeling in the past, nobody's opinion as to the responsibility for this division is likely to be affected by further argument; and, of all useless desires, the hankering to see some one punished is about the most superfluous. From all this the attention of the conference was turned entirely away to face the problems of the future. This surely marks the beginning of the end of one of those painful controversies to which all growing bodies are subject. Unquestionably, there has been much quickening of thought on both sides during the discussions of the past few years; yet all may rejoice at the prospect of closer reunion soon to be accomplished.

In another way the spirit of the conference was hopeful. Widely separated churches are apt to pay some penalty for their isolation in the growth of misunderstandings which become the basis of a feeling of distrust. This is not a sectional weakness or difficulty, and is not peculiar to church work. Everywhere it is hard for people who see little of one another to arrive at a perfect mutual understanding. A large part of the troubles of the world would be cured if men and women who occupy antagonistic positions could be brought close enough together to make each other's acquaintance. Of this fact the Conference seemed to be well aware, and to be ready to make allowance for the placing of emphasis at different points of what is, after all, the same great work. Of that blind partisanship which sees, and wants to see, nothing but its own narrow view, and whose attempt to pose as the champion of breadth always adds a ludicrous element to the situation, nothing was expressed. The spirit of good will was not only uppermost, but, so far at least as an outsider might judge, was universal.

The Unitarian movement both East and West is still new, and doubtless has many phases yet to pass through. The slow processes of natural growth are not easily anticipated. If we can be sure that the spirit is really growing, that is much cause for satisfaction. Youth is always full of noble enthusiasms, but has also the defects that belong to its good qualities. However mature the men and women may be who come together to lay the foundations of a new work, while the work itself is young it cannot have the self-assurance that time alone will bring. New movements, like new countries, are apt to be rather needlessly sensitive to criticism. One sign of increasing stability is a less violent reaction against the prick of the critic's lance. In this respect Western Unitarianism gives evidence of having arrived at the consciousness of more and deeper spiritual strength.

Two things accomplished by the conference call for congratulation and praise. First, a deficit of two years' standing in its accounts was made up by the voluntary pledges of members and friends, so that it might begin the new financial year free from debt. The half-hour devoted to this task was filled with much enthusiasm, and was certainly well spent from the spiritual as well as from the material point of view. Second, a plan of general co-operation in Western work was adopted, which has in it the possibility of leading to important results. In brief outline, this plan is that one director of the conference shall be nominated by each of the State and district conferences, and that these directors so nominated and chosen, with the secretary of the Western Conference, shall constitute a Missionary Council for the West, to be the "agent and adviser" of the American Unitarian Association within the territory which these organizations cover. It cannot be said that the plan in all its bearings is yet worked out to completeness, and considerable time must yet elapse before it can be carried into operation. But we feel sure that the step taken is in the right direction, and that from this beginning a careful consideration of the problem will find its practical solution.

The most obvious disadvantage of the plan is that committees are not generally so efficient in executive work as a single officer. What is the business of a number of people in common is too apt to become the business of nobody in particular. But, should our work grow, as we hope to see it increase with the next wave of business prosperity, each of the members of this Missionary Council might easily find himself within a field large enough to engage all his energies. On the other hand, the closer organic union of all our working centres in the West is in itself so desirable an object to attain that, if necessary, we might well forego some other advantages for its sake. But it is not certain that this will be necessary. There should be some way to combine the administrative talent of the single missionary agent with that wisdom which comes from observing the old adage that "two heads are better than one." We commend this plan to the thought of all whom it concerns, believing it to be capable of development into a form that shall meet general acceptance and produce much good.

FROM OTHER LANDS.

As the anniversary season comes round, it is interesting to note the level of the spiritual mercury, as it is observed by individuals in other lands. No one person can speak for a nation, and yet the thoughtful observer must be able to gauge the impressions that sway the immediate community of which he is a part. Such observations are often better caught from personal letters than from formal reports. Within the past week or two various letters received from different parts of the world all tell the same story of the upward and onward reach of humanity for purer air and broader spiritual freedom. It is as though the rush of spring, which is making itself richly manifest in the outer world, were pervading the spiritual world, and seeking new avenues for leafage and fruitage.

From a German university comes the word: "It is interesting to see how interested the professors are becoming in the Ethical Culture movement in this country, which, however, has not such able leaders as in the country of its birth. The tendency is in the direction of liberty of thought. There is a great field for the Unitarian faith in this country, though it is a thorny field. Public opinion, routine, tradition, conservatism, are strong in Germany; and liberals are apt to keep their ideas to themselves. But, if the movement once begins with force, the results will be undoubted."

From India Mr. Mozoomdar writes: "I am about to organize a united mission of all the Brahmo-Somajes,—a mission which is to embrace the whole of upper India, the classical Aryavarta, from Lahore to Calcutta. If by the blessing of God this organization becomes a reality, the foundation will be laid of a new life for the Brahmo-Somaj; and I trust a new race of workers will join our cause."

From far-away New Zealand comes a letter from a Baptist clergyman, who says that, queer as it may look, he calls himself an "Evangelical Unitarian." He tells of secular papers publishing religious articles which are greatly appreciated by the people who are hungry for a better faith. And he and others are trying to reach them in every way possible, that they may be "influenced to righteously reverence one another, and to be inspired with truth and courage."

And from that land of islands to which all eyes have been turned of late comes the clear word of faith of Clay MacCauley:—

"Great changes are at hand for this people. Our work is not the least among the influences which will tend to make the future for Japan nobler and happier. Will you not give the Japan Mission a kind thought and also a cheering word now and then? We are doing the best we can under serious limitations. Our numbers have decreased from seven to two, and yet our work has increased disproportionately much. To be sure, there are a good many Japanese helpers now; but we are sadly in need of some of the best of the mind and heart blessing the life around you."

Germany will fight and win for herself the blessing of a liberal faith. New Zealand may look for a like blessing, if even her Baptist ministers are Unitarian; but for India and Japan Americans may not only give of their sympathy, but in a tangible way may minister to the spiritual work that is going on. Whoever strengthens the hand of Mr. Mozoomdar helps to make the country better wherever his influence is felt, and whoever contributes to the support of our mission in Japan may have the satisfaction of knowing that he is giving to a cause that has proved itself worthy.

THE CROW INDIAN SCHOOL.

Some eight years ago the American Unitarian Association organized a bureau for Southern and Indian work. One result of this was the establishment of the Montana Industrial School at the Crow agency. President Grant had initiated the policy of inviting the various religious bodies to unite with the government in the education of the Indian. Wise as the scheme seemed on its face, it was open to two objections. First, that the government might be led thereby to throw upon religious denominations educational work which it ought to conduct itself. Second, the giving of money by the government to religious denominations for educational purposes was not in accordance with the spirit of our institutions. It established a relation of doubtful wisdom between Church and State, and might lead to the use of government funds for sectarian purposes. Nevertheless the Indian department, under the corrupting influence of the Indian ring, had been so terribly dishonest and inefficient that it was hoped something better might result from this arrangement.

It was under this policy and arrangement that Unitarians entered the work under the courageous leadership of the late Gen. James F. B. Marshall. The school was established under the superintendency of Rev. Henry F. Bond, who with his wife gave themselves with great devotion to this work until it became necessary to transfer its administration to other hands.

While the plan introduced by General Grant worked better than the inefficient scheme which preceded it, the practical objections mentioned above have been forcibly developed. The government has not assumed its full responsibility toward the Indians. On the other hand, it has been evident that, if the government did all it might and should do in the work of Indian education, with all the resources at its command it could do much more than could possibly be done under this divided responsibility. It is possible for the government to provide school-houses and teachers, so that no Indian child may remain without school opportunities; and it is possible under a compulsory education law to compel Indian children to go to school. Just how efficiently the government can do its work is shown in the schools that have been already established. With the Indian schools under civil service rules, political interference is removed; and nothing has stood in the way of the perfect success of the system but the niggardliness of the government in making appropriations. Our senators and representatives have shown neither Christianity nor common sense in spending vast sums of money for the building and arming of cruisers, and refusing hitherto to give enough money to support adequately a system of schools as a public defence against the ignorance and barbarism of native tribes. The time may have been when a fort on the Missouri was more important than a school, but now the school is more important than the fort. If one wishes to see just how an Indian school under the charge of a United States army officer may develop from small beginnings into one of the most admirable schools tried by any test in the country, let him visit the Indian School at Carlisle, Penn., under Captain Pratt, or read the excellent articles on that subject in the New England Magazine for April.

The second objection which we have mentioned, that arising from the sectarian use of government money, has achieved much importance. It may or may not be true that certain religious denominations use their Indian schools largely for religious propaganda. It is what we might naturally expect. But it certainly is true that jealousy and distrust have been awakened between different denominations by the use of government money, and this has led to giving it up on the part of nearly all the Protestant bodies who have been receiving it; and the probabilities are that before long Congress will decline to make any further appropriations for contract schools, but will increase and extend its own work of Indian education.

Under these circumstances the question before the Unitarian body in regard to the Montana Industrial School has been an important one. It has taken a threefold form. First, shall the school be continued as it is, with government aid, which amounts to $100 a year for each pupil? or, second, shall government aid be relinquished, and the school be supported entirely by private or denominational appropriations? or, third, shall the government have the opportunity of taking the school and making it a part of its regular system and organization?

1. In answer to the first question it may be said that Unitarians are opposed on principle to the giving of government money for denominational purposes, and this conviction found expression at the last National Conference. At any rate, the probability that the government will at an early date decline to renew these contracts would force the other two questions upon us.

2. To the question whether the American Unitarian Association, having given up government aid, should abandon the school or support it, there is not the slightest doubt in our minds what the answer should be and would be. Some of the denominations which have given up government aid have been obliged to give up some of their schools. That peril would confront Unitarians. But we have no doubt that an earnest appeal would bring the necessary funds.

But this is not the only question before us. There is the third question, whether the United States government, as one of the partners in the present enterprise, should not have the opportunity of carrying on the school itself. In his last message the President, supported by the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Commissioner, announced the intention of the government to extend its school system and to assume work done by the contract schools. To ascertain whether the government would accept a present of the Montana Industrial School and carry on its educational work, the Committee on Indian Education of the American Unitarian Association appointed a sub-committee, consisting of the superintendent of the Indian Bureau, Rev. Alfred Manchester, and Rev. S. J. Barrows, to go to Washington on this errand.

The Committee were authorized to make the following propositions:—

1. The American Unitarian Association offer to give the United States government the school buildings and plant, costing originally some $20,000, for the purpose of maintaining an Indian school.

2. The government to pay for the stock and tools at a fair appraisal.

3. The present teachers to be retained for at least one year, if found competent.

These propositions were regarded as generous by the Indian Bureau, and were recommended by the Superintendent of Indian Schools, the Indian Commissioner, and finally accepted by the Secretary of the Interior, with the provision that the buildings be made over to the government for a nominal sum, so that it may acquire full legal title to them.

As thus modified, the arrangement received the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Indian Education, with the exception of one member who is in Europe, and whose vote could not be secured. An opportunity was given to contributors to the school at a meeting in Channing Hall to discuss the question, but only two voices were raised against the plan. On Tuesday of last week, at the regular meeting of the board of directors of the American Unitarian Association, the report of the Committee on Education was made and accepted, and a vote passed confirming the arrangement. The transition will be made the first of July, when the present contract with the government expires.

The advantage of the arrangement is that the United States government and the American Unitarian Association can dissolve partnership, that the work of the school which has been carried on successfully for eight years can be continued without break, and that the school may receive all the advantages which come from being included in the government system. The fact that the same teachers are to be retained for at least a year will prevent any break in the personal influence which they have exerted. The school has been carried on by them before on such broad, unsectarian methods that no change would, in this direction, be necessary. It is this very reason that leaves no ground whatever of appeal to Unitarians to support independently a denominational school among the Indians, when the government is able and willing to do the work, and when that work is essentially the same. Whatever other religious bodies might do, Unitarians would regard it as altogether superfluous to establish for general education in any one of our large cities a rival to our public school system. There is no need, likewise, of maintaining a rival to the Indian school system as conducted by the government: rather let that be supported every way. The excuse for establishing a school at all was that the government was not doing the work, and the Indians could not do it themselves. Eventually, the different States will include the Indians in their public school system. The ruinous policy of keeping up the reservation system has retarded the civilization of the Indian. Sooner or later he must be absorbed into our civilization; and the way to bring this about is to treat him as an individual, not as a member of a tribe. Unitarians will have abundant opportunity to continue their Indian work, and they can do it in a way which is not possible for the government to do it. They can support the placing-out system by taking Indians in their homes and farms and factories, and giving them temporarily a practical acquaintance with our civilization. Such home education will do for the Indians what nothing else possibly can do for them.

JAPAN'S TREATY OF PEACE.

The signing of the treaty of peace between Japan and China ends the first act in the great drama which the former nation has set itself to perform. As the curtain falls, the results thus far have filled the whole civilized world with wonder, and placed this island people in the foremost place among the Asiatics. Both in military efficiency and statesmanlike ability she now ranks among the great nations. The skill of her generals, the thorough organization of her army, and the personal bravery of her soldiers and sailors are universally acknowledged. But in the negotiations for peace her wisdom and moderation are as marked as her efficiency on the field of battle. The terms of the treaty are such as to leave no lasting bitterness upon her enemy. Her rulers are acting with reference to the future. Japan is aiming after territorial and industrial expansion. She proposes to compete with the great nations in trade and commerce, and such is the industry and skill of her people that she will surely gain in wealth and power. The war will act as an intense impulse; and, while care will be taken on the part of her rulers to increase her military and naval efficiency, still greater efforts will be made for her industrial and intellectual development. Her natural resources are great, and her rulers propose to use them with intelligent foresight. The influence of the war will be widely spread, and those living in the remotest sections will feel an intense quickening. In the awakening of this nation what will be the effect on religion? A considerable number of the most intelligent classes have drifted from the established faith. It is evident that there must be a reconstruction. Mr. MacCauley, in his address last year when he was at home, clearly pointed out the need and importance of our mission. If it was needed then, it is needed now. This brings the subject home to Unitarians; and one of the questions that will be asked at the coming anniversary will be, What is our present duty to the Japan Mission?

Musings.

SOME two or three months ago I noticed an item in the daily press to the effect that the editor of the Christian Register had been appointed a delegate to the International Prison Congress in Paris, and that he would leave for Europe some time in May. This item, more or less elaborated and diluted, has been going the rounds of the press, sometimes accompanied by an unkindly "cut," which some of my friends have compared to an escaped convict. I resent the comparison. It is not fair to the convict. I have too many friends of that class to wish to do them injustice. From all points of the compass this announcement has come; and the question is, What can I do about it? Not to go to Europe under these circumstances would be to establish the inaccuracy and fallibility of a large portion of the American press. It would be to convict American journalism of hasty credulity and premature assumption; and I ask myself, "Would it be right to put my editorial brethren in such a false position?"—a position which would be so unnatural and unfamiliar for an American editor that he would not know how to adjust himself to it. I have asked myself, therefore, What is my duty under the circumstances? Is it to write a denial to each and every editor of the statement he has published, or is it to endeavor to fulfil the prediction they have unitedly made? I have concluded that it will be kinder to my editorial brethren, kinder to my country, if I decide to extricate them by expatriating myself. If by taking a trip across the Atlantic I can make fifty or a hundred editors in this country tell the truth, is it not the thing I ought to do? I have therefore decided to brave the storms, the dangers, the elastic tumidity of the Atlantic Ocean, with all the gastronomic effects that it involves, in order to fulfil the programme which has been assigned to me. That programme will involve a trip to New York, a brief deflection to the foreign shores of New Jersey, a departure May 18 in an ocean greyhound for Liverpool, some days at the English lakes, visits to Oxford, Cambridge, and certain English prisons, a sojourn in London, attending the English anniversaries, a few weeks in Paris, a trip to Switzerland, and finally a trip to Quebec and Lake Memphremagog, setting foot on American soil at Newport, Vt., some time in August next. This is the programme, and it will take three months to fulfil it. But I have written across it mentally words copied from railroad time-tables and opera bills, "Subject to change without notification."

By the time this second "Musing" reaches the Register office and attains the immortality and immutability of print I shall be far beyond the reach of washerwomen, tailors, butchers, and other creditors; beyond the discomforts of spring cleaning; beyond the obtrusiveness of the modern daily, with its perpetual assumption of news; beyond the importunity of the German band; beyond,—well, I should say about two thousand miles beyond Sandy Hook. I have just completed the first stage of the journey by the owl train to New York, and now I am about to get a railroad passport for New Jersey. If one wants to get out of the nineteenth century for a little while, he can easily do so by going to New Jersey and taking a backward leap into the past. New Jersey, like Brooklyn, furnishes sleeping-room for a good many New Yorkers; and it is not surprising that a dormitory should be dormant. I trust that I am too early for the mosquitoes and too late for the ancient malaria of the Jersey flats. There are signs of progressiveness in this old State, and some of them Mr. Morehouse reports now and then to the readers of the Christian Register.

Brevities.

The Shaksperian motto of the modern civil service reformer: "While these do labor for their own preferment, it behooves us to labor for the realm."

Die Nation, a German periodical, in a recent article on "Ein Amerikanischer Ethiker," compares Mr. Salter in very appreciative words to Emerson. The interest in Ethical Culture seems to be extending in Germany, though the loss of the movement in the death of Herr Gizycki is keenly felt.

The New York Observer, in recommending to church councils the Latin motto,—

"In necessariis unitas,
In non-necessariis libertas,
In omnibus caritas,"— adds, "Undoubtedly there are some vacant seats in that 'omnibus' yet." Yes, that is an omnibus in which there will be always "room for one more."

Last Sunday Rev. M. J. Savage preached on "Religious Liberty and the Case of the Armenians." At the close of his sermon he asked all to rise who united with him in asking the President of the United States to make a moral protest to Turkey against the outrages in Armenia. A throb of sympathy leaped from heart to heart; and, like a mighty wave moved by one common impulse, the great congregation rose in response.

The Christian Advocate publishes a letter from Prof. J. D. Dana of Yale, in which he says: "The new doctrines of science have a tendency to spread infidelity, but it is because the ideas are new and their true bearing is not understood. The wave is already on the decline; and it is beginning to be seen more clearly than ever that science can have nothing to say on moral or spiritual questions, that it fulfils its highest purpose in manifesting more and more the glory of God."

The New England Cremation Society is working to help bring about a public sentiment favorable to the adoption of a reform in caring for our dead, believing that cremation is a more reverent and tender way of disposing of the body than burial, and in every way to be desired for the sake of the living. By holding this public meeting during Anniversary Week the society hopes to interest in the subject people from different parts of New England; and it has been fortunate in securing several able speakers.

It is easy to see how the stories of the early apostles and preachers varied as told by different reporters. Dr. Hale preached on Boston Common last Sunday afternoon, but no two papers told the same story about it. Not only were the abstracts of his remarks quite different, but the facts about external details were unlike. To one reporter he stood on a deal packing-box, to another he was mounted "on a folding bench." One man saw him under an elm, another under a "popular" tree. Perhaps it was not a sycamore that Zaccheus climbed, after all.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

THE seventieth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association comes on Tuesday next in Music Hall. There will be occasion for congratulation, for reminiscence, and for the onward look. Addresses will be made in the morning, afternoon, and evening. The names of some of the speakers are to be found in the standing notice of the meeting. Others also will be heard. Letters will be read from some of the veterans, like Dr. Furness, Rev. Samuel May, Dr. James Martineau, and others. In the afternoon Dr. Edward Everett Hale has been asked to respond to these letters as one of the younger men. Grouped around the Association, which is the parent of most of them, will come the anniversaries of the Sunday School Society, the Women's Alliance, the Temperance societies, guilds, Unity Clubs, Lend a Hand Clubs, and other organizations, religious and benevolent. The week will be crowded with meetings through which will flow the currents of vigorous intellectual and spiritual life. The warmth of Unitarianism comes from a slow-burning fire. The light it sheds is fixed and steady. But it may easily happen that, after seventy years of the steady diffusion of light and heat, a great flame may be kindled. At the Ministers' Union, a youthful organization, Mr. Simmons of Minneapolis will speak. At the Berry Street Conference, our oldest institution, Mr. Ames will be heard. In our columns elsewhere will be found a condensed programme of meetings adapted to all ages, sexes, and conditions.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION NOMINATIONS.

The Committee on Nominations of the American Unitarian Association have received ballots for candidates for president, vice-presidents, secretary, assistant secretary, treasurer, and directors for the ensuing year, and have counted the same. They find that the following persons received the largest number of votes, and are therefore to be placed before the Association as the nominated candidates:—

Hon. John D. Long, President .
Horace G. Wadlin,
Hon. Joseph W. Symonds,
Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, LL.D.,
Judge Thomas J. Morris,
Hon. Daniel L. Shorey,
Hon. Horace Davis,
Rev. George Batchelor, Secretary .
George W. Fox, Assistant Secretary .
George W. Stone, Treasurer .
	Vice-Presidents.

Directors.

Mrs. Stephen H. Bullard, Boston.
Rev. Ellery C. Butler, Quincy.
John Mason Little, Boston.
Arthur T. Lyman, Boston.
Henry B. Wells, Plainfield, N.J.
Rev. William W. Fenn, Chicago, Ill.

A SPECIAL PROVIDENCE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The newspapers report that recently at Fort Worth the evangelist Moody prayed fervently for rain, and that the heavens opened, and thanks were being given, when an accident occurred, and many were hurt; for the storm tore the roof off the church. He was not sufficiently careful in expressing his desires, and did not take the precautions of a parson of the olden time in New England, who prayed: "O Lord, send us rain, but not in a hurricane. Let it come down kind o' drizzly drozzly, to refresh the earth." In this way too much of a good thing might have been avoided. I remember another instance of providence, when a note was sent up to the pulpit in a season of wet weather, praying that it might come to an end. The minister read it; but, drawing the curtain aside, he added, "It's no kind of use, bretheren, so long as the wind hangs to the north'ard and east'ard."

CREEDS AND CONFERENCES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I have been looking through a number of creeds, confessions, catechisms, declarations of faith, etc., and have found the work both dreary and unprofitable. It is sad to witness numerous divisions and organizations of Christianity, and sadder still to see that many of their documents do not refrain from mounting up to the mind of God himself, and imputing to him decrees, secret purposes, and motives. With many statements in these productions reason disagrees, but this fact disturbs not the swallowers. Divines banded together are not the best or most impartial judges of truth, for they often look to the confutation of those whose opinions differ from their own rather than appear to be seekers of the right.

I notice one thing mentioned in these documents, the birth of Jesus from the Virgin Mary. She comes into prominence early, and continues late; for she is mentioned in the Apostles' Creed, in that of Chalcedon, in Luther's Catechism, the Westminster Confession, in the Declaration of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, etc. The accounts of the conception and birth in Matthew and Luke are taken literally. Here reason hesitates to follow. The long list of creeds may now be considered antiquated. If confessions of faith be thought necessary, they should be very short, and not contrary to reason. Let it not be thought that I rate human reason too highly; for it is "the candle of the Lord," and therefore divine. Bishop Butler says truly that "it is the only faculty we have wherewith to judge concerning anything, even revelation."

SAMUEL DAVIDSON.

MATTHEW XXV. 46.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Permit me to suggest a new way of looking at Jesus' words in Matt. xxv. 46,— "These shall go away into eternal punishment," etc.—always so painful to read, and which no permissible exegesis which regarded only the word aionios has ever availed to empty of the teaching of eternal punishment. None of us, of course, believes the doctrine; but, if we are thoughtful, we have all had to swallow hard when we read the passage in question, because we do not like to say, oftener than we are compelled to do so, that Jesus in his deliberate and essential teaching was mistaken.

I said that the accepted view of the passage does not avail by any permissible exegesis to empty it of the doctrine of eternal punishment. Neither, indeed, does the present suggestion quite do so: only there is the immense distance between a proposition deliberately put forward as a teaching by itself and one incidentally and without special thought accepted or taken as a matter of course in speaking of something else.

Now, we have always read the chapter as if Jesus was concerned with eternal punishment as his topic, whereas he is talking of the grounds on which future rewards and punishments shall be distributed. It was the brave and industrious servant of the five or the two talents, the kind-hearted who remembered the sick and the needy, not those who made professions, who were at last to receive the blessing. What that reward or the corresponding punishment was to be as to duration was not even at issue, for all Jews of the period (see the Apocalyptic and kindred literature) who believed in a future life at all believed its awards were eternal; and Jesus as a Jew would certainly believe it with the rest, and may even here have had a reminiscence of Dan. xii. 2,— "These to eternal life, and these to shame and eternal contempt."

Let us read, then, anew the words from verse xxxi., with the vivid picture of selfishness on the one hand and lovely unselfishness on the other, and then at the close lay the emphasis where it belongs, not on eternal, but on these; and how our old trouble vanishes away! It is these—selfish souls!—that shall be punished; but the doers of the word, though they never heard of me, shall be blessed.

SUCCESS.

BY HARRIET WATERS FORBUSH.

If we, from whom the passing years
Have taken all our youth's delight,
Nor brought us honors, wealth, or fame,
Or that success we deemed our right,—
Oh! if we could but understand
That love is greater than renown,
That simple duty, daily done,
Adorns us more than laurel crown!

Contentment still is more than gold;
And his alone the true success,
Whose life, "unspotted from the world,"
Has known unselfish happiness.
Then let us lead our humble lives,
Content to do our Lord's behest,
Until the evening shadows cool
Proclaim the toiler near his rest.

And when at last, the daylight spent,
We homeward fare at set of sun,
Nor wealth nor fame will worthy seem,
But only duty, bravely done!

OLD-FASHIONED CULTURE.

BY REV. HENRY T. SECRIST.

And immediately some one will say that here is another modern maniac who intends to rave against everything that has the touch of age upon it. But immediately he should be assured that such is not the case. I have a word in behalf of old-fashioned culture. There is a clear distinction between the types of culture here suggested, both of which have elements that are commendable. In the culture which will remain after the novelties of the passing seasons are cast aside we shall find a considerable amount of the old-fashioned style. For, after all, the common-sense life, as well as the common-sense garment, satisfies most people.

There is a kind of culture which, by its showiness and its obtrusion, compels us to class it with the new fashions. It is somewhat gaudy in appearance, and is noisy in its movements. It has many schemes, makes great claims, and is busied with a multitude of things. Yet, after the day is over and the reckoning made, not so very much has been accomplished by it; and meanwhile it has been anything but attractive. We submitted to some annoyances in expectation of beneficial results, and we have been cheated all around.

There is very much of instability in a large part of present-day culture. There is much trimming of the tips of the vines without any regard for the roots. We are inclined to beware of the person, man or woman, who has the reformation of the world upon his hands. He has so much to do in regulating the affairs of the universe that he makes wretched the part of the universe in which his little mind exists. He is so much interested in mankind that he fails to be interested in his own family and friends. He would save the human race, but forgets to save himself from his disagreeableness. There is so much to be learned that he has not time to chat with his friends; and, if he writes a letter to an old comrade, it must begin with an apology for neglect. He likes discussion. To announce that there will be a "discussion" is a great attraction to the devotees of new-fashioned culture.

When we have been associated with such a person for a time, what a relief it is to meet a representative of the old-fashioned type! Fortunately, there are still some of these types remaining; and it will be well for us if we see the effectiveness of their character and learn how to win it. The very presence of this person acts as a restorative as well as a stimulus. He is calm and dignified. Yet he accomplishes more than many excited ones who work with strained, even if well-meant, effort. He finds time to be in his home, even though his club shall miss him. You enjoy a letter from him, because you feel that he actually had time for writing. He believes that to maintain friendships is as essential as to carry on boys' clubs or to write long theses on the problems of modern society. He tells us that he really enjoys reading a book that has no illustrations. We would learn that analysis and criticism, while very necessary, have their limitations. We have sometimes torn Emerson's essays and poems so nearly to pieces, and have studied them so much, that we have missed Emerson almost entirely. To follow foot-notes sometimes helps and very often hinders.

Perhaps it is a characteristic of old-fashioned culture that it had a place for the genuine lecture,—the lecture as it was known "once upon a time," but that finds little encouragement now. That type of lecture will not now pay the travelling expenses of the lecturer. We have lectures more than ever now, but they are of the kind that offers a course of six for fifty cents. And we, in our weariness, wonder whether we are ever to hear of the lecture that belonged to the old-fashioned culture—so able, complete, inspiring.

Old-fashioned culture made a strong and an attractive character. Somehow there came from it a wonderful solidity. George William Curtis in one of his letters uses the expression "antique honesty." We recognize at once the quality meant, and wish there might be more of it. We want that stability of the old-fashioned culture, even though we must have some objectionable qualities with it. Our typical person is interested in all that is going on about him, but is not swayed by the long procession with flaming banners, or by street corner or public park oratory. And the decade, if not the hour, finds him abundantly justified.

The solidity of such culture does not exclude gentleness, grace, and an appreciation of genuine humor. The enjoyments, however, which it sanctions are not those produced by methods which are questionable, as judged from the moral standpoint. If the laugh is not so harsh, it is, nevertheless, a more genuine expression of a righteous pleasure. I could not tell just how this old-fashioned culture brings its results; but I am sure that there is an attractiveness, a serenity, a reserve force, a quiet but powerful enthusiasm here which is missed in the results of the new-fashioned culture, and which must belong to the perfect character. Yes, I know what can be said against it and in favor of its opposite. But I will have for myself that benediction which comes from the very presence of those saintly ones whom the old-fashioned culture has produced. So, blessings be upon the lingering types of the old-fashioned culture!

SCIENTIFIC SHIRKING.

BY HELEN B. SEYMOUR.

The title sounds like a suggestion of something degenerate. But it is not. No woman's strength is equal to the demands made upon it by the claims domestic, social, and intellectual of these latter days. Since this fact is indisputable, why not look the problem squarely in the face, and decide calmly where to "shirk"?

This writing concerns that class of woman-kind who, in the thick of life, are trying to make a home with their own, or at least two or four extra hands to help them. The woman who employs six or more servants is ruled out of the article.

Those who have been in the success know what it costs in head and hand labor to keep a house up to concert pitch of tidiness. It must be swept, dusted, and arranged, shining as to windows, and polished as to brasses, to be refreshingly clean, not in spots, but all over, all the time. However, if this were the only ambition in the mind's eye, life would be as easy as going down hill. But that inner man, located on the road to the heart, not to mention the inner small boy, must be fed periodically. And while said man thinks, if he pays the bills, it is nothing for the housekeeper to have the table furnished with spotless linen, bright silver, and an unending variety of attractive viands, madame, who has been inventing bills of fare for years, often feels her wits wearing out from the monotony of repetition. However, if these two were the only matters concerned, planning for home life would be like speeding on over even grade.

Yet more important than either of the things mentioned is the care of the children. It is poetical and beautiful to think they just belong to the family, and should grow up in the home as naturally as the roses bud and blossom outside. But perpetual care is the watchword against the ills of the flesh, and the perils of infancy are hardly passed when the vagaries relating to the freedom of the will and the constitutional right to the pursuit of happiness need to be checked and shaped. Ah! the oversight of the house and spreading of the table are pastime in comparison with the responsibility of caring for children. Nor are these three all. Home would not be home unless shared with the outside world. Hospitality, unaffected, that never wearies, is of supreme importance. Emerson, manlike, says, "Why this bustle good wife, when the guest is expected?" But it is against woman nature not to hide nicked china and cod-fishy economies from the eyes of a stranger. The soul of hospitality is sincerity of welcome; and, while it is excellent to sit down to "low living and high thinking," no amount of sincerity or a conversation mounted on stilts can compensate for a soup over-salted, a burned beefsteak, or feeble minded coffee.

And yet success in these four things might not make life seem an up-hill effort, were they all. Unless a woman is content to be classed with the words marked "obsolete," she must have several lines of intellectual work in hand. The age writes history with a swift-moving pen. She must be quick, or she will not read current events, not to mention the literature of the day or standard works. Then there are the studies she hoped to pursue and the plans to carry out when she left her Alma Mater. How many, rather how few, realize the dreams of college days!

These mentioned are only the duties beckoning within the home walls. Outside of the enumeration are the claims of society, the benevolent work due the unfortunate, the church life in its manifold forms, and the club life. Attention to these, it is said, is helpful in the making of a home. Add the necessary needlework and the irregular calls of holidays, house-cleaning epochs, and unexpected company, and where shall the home-maker look for time to have even a toothache?

The problem is stated. For its solution use Scientific Shirking. One cannot do everything: why try? It is questioned, "where shall the remedy be applied?" Put the blister over the pain, the plaster on the cut. Employ that something within that used to be called "elective affinity" in choosing what shall be done. Sanctified common sense, too, is excellent help to the conscience in deciding what to leave undone. And, that Scientific Shirking may be most successful, it should be used with system, a right estimate of essentials and self-control.

What a good thing system is to keep house with! If one has no better outline for the daily round, the little-girl game of "Round the Mulberry-bush" may be used. And how system does help govern the children! And one can get almost no time for books without it! It is the systematic people who meet the emergencies of life without flinching, who can take a week off now and then, and easily overtake their work on return. System is the best help of Scientific Shirking, because it knows just where the stitches have been dropped, and just where things belong when putting them to rights. System seems indispensable when we count the multitude of things, the variety of work, one must be acquainted with to keep house. Is it any wonder the Swedish girl, who had been only waitress in her own country, after struggling with "general housework" for a year, announced to her mistress she "was going into the mill to work, because she had to know only one thing there"? This friendly system must not be of cast-iron, but flexible so it can use modern improvements and adapt itself to circumstances. And, moreover, system believes in practical co-operation. Children early catch the partnership plan, and "helping mamma" is solid happiness, if put to them in the right way. Not only should there be a sharing in the work, but in the home idea. The house, even the parlor in it, should not belong exclusively to the mother or daughters of the family. Look at this picture. A man who had acquired a competency retired from business and purchased a fine residence. But so finished and furnished was it that it was no home for him. So he built for himself a snuggerly adjoining his stable, and read his papers and lived there. His wife was a beautiful woman, interested in clubs, society, and all manner of charitable work; but was there not something awry in her Denmark? Too great emphasis cannot be put on making the boys feel the home is their home, and it is the most blessed kind of shirking of care when the home love and home sentiment win them from the street and its influences. To be sure, holding the boy means the home is a swarming place for the boy's friends; but what are worn carpets, or even worn nerves, if the boys are tided over their restlessness and unsettled ambitions into strong and pure manhood?

Knowing what to leave undone is wonderfully helped by understanding what is most important. Such knowledge is more to life than perspective to a picture. Questions that seemed of import do dwindle in comparison with others more vital. The matter of purchasing four or six button gloves is not worthy of mental debate, but it is essential they should be neatly kept. The question of being fashionably dressed is small when compared with that of being so well dressed no one shall notice what is worn. The uselessness of trying to keep pace with fashion is witnessed by the one item of sleeves. Pin your hope to a pair, and next season you and they are back numbers.

The essentials of cleanliness and comfort having been attained in domestic life, one may shirk the luxuries of æsthetic decorations and fancy cooking. And there are even some days in life when time is worth more than sweeping under rugs, when a judicious flirting of the feathers over the marble clock and dark furniture is more commendable than the most conscientious attention to details of dusting. Mrs. Stowe wrote, "I keep house to live, not live to keep house." Such an ambition may be the death-knell to one's reputation as a house-keeper, but a woman cannot be a model in more than one respect.

It has been written, "Know your Bible and your Shakspeare, and you know all literature." The choice of the best is open to each; and is it not "scientific" to avoid weakening the mind by filtering through it trashy productions, books of doubtful reputation, or even what is recommended as harmless?

Nor can one be in all the organizations of a town. Election should be made to those in which one can get the most pleasure or do the most good. The habit of joining everything and belonging everywhere amounts with some to a passion. If "the one prudence in life is concentration," the opposite of the epigram argues thin living. A calling list of one to three hundred means either exclusive devotion to visiting or pasteboard insincerity. The phrase "keeping up my acquaintance," used sometimes in city life, has in it an artificial tone which cheapens friendship.

Of course, each woman must decide for herself what is of the greatest importance; and just here is where women are queens absolute in their own realms. Granted they are more absolute than sensible sometimes, as in the case of the woman who was fastidious about her family bringing the smallest amount of real estate into the house on their boots, but would never wash her windows until after fly time. (This was before screens were invented.) Another woman always wiped the children's finger-marks from the doors and windows every night before her husband came home because it annoyed him to see them. However, if this simple act made two persons happy, why not?

The third help in Scientific Shirking is self-control. Without it the shirking will be haphazard; but with it come a poise, balance, and independence of character that helps one to live on her own income, not her neighbors, that dresses and educates children according to her own means and good sense, not after the dictates of fashion or even Mrs. Grundy's views. A woman can maintain unruffled self-control even if, while she is interviewing the vegetable man, the grocer waits, the front door-bell rings, the dressmaker wants her upstairs, the baby cries, company is expected, and Bridget is out of temper. Every housekeeper has such experiences. All she needs is to attend to one demand after another, and before the day is ended she may have time to read a poem or hear a bit of fine music.

Self-control, too, helps to real scientific shirking of work and troubles that never come. Before the days of sewing-machines and ready-made underwear a woman, who felt no one could do for her husband as she, knit socks and made shirts, and nearly wore herself out making piles of underclothing, "enough to last years, even if he had no one to mend for him, poor thing." But he died first, and she had the additional labor of composing his epitaph.

Self-control insists that one must shut her eyes to what she cannot mend by staring at, shall cease to worry if every crust is not utilized, and shall triumphantly ignore dust that settles after regular dusting time. Self-control urges that women shall not get angry over small matters, because anger ages one, and sometimes provokes apoplexy.

Self-control affirms, too, that comfort in the home is more than elegance; that progress, which is living, can be made only when a few things are attempted, and these are well done; and that Scientific Shirking is the only thing a woman can use to keep her health and escape a "care-crazed" brain. Some one says, "The spirit of homekeeping is lost because of discouraged housekeeping." There were never so many inventions to lighten labor as to-day. Never before has there been so much written on domestic affairs; yet good servants were never so hard to obtain, nor were there ever so many cases of nervous prostration in the ranks of womankind. What is the matter? Is it not worry rather than work that is wearing out housekeepers? All the comforts of religion cannot keep some women from being miserable not over sins, but over mistakes of the past. A salad below par, a gown that skews in the skirt, or a bargain she failed to embrace, will disturb the peace and mar the happiness of some for hours. Scientific Shirking has no use for the past excepting for its pleasant memories and profitable experiences. And how many lose the joy of the present because they spend their time in imagination on rickety bridges they never really have to cross!

Scientific Shirking lives just one day at a time, and only one minute of one hour of that day at once.

Said a plucky little woman, "I can usually find a way to accomplish what I very much want to do." Shakspeare understood her ability when he penned:—

"Make fast the doors upon a woman's wit, and it will out at the casement; shut that, and 'twill out at the key-hole; stop that, 'twill fly with the smoke out at the chimney."

A FEAST OF REASON.

It was at the pleasant quarters of the Aldine Club, Fifth Avenue, New York. The master of the feast was Mr. John S. Clark, a Boston publisher, who is a warm admirer of Dr. Fiske, as many are now trying to call him, but who will always be plain John Fiske to those who know him best and love him well. Mr. Clark invited some forty gentlemen to meet Dr. Fiske at dinner, and many of them came from distant cities to do honor to the distinguished guest. It was a nice dinner, including "Mousses of Chicken à la Darwin" and "Filets Mignons à la Spencer," at which, I fear, either of those sad dyspeptics would have balked. The guests were warned in advance that there would be talking on the lines of Dr. Fiske's "Destiny of Man"; and the pretty menu, following the cheese and coffee, had a passage from that tiny monograph on a great subject,—“We can now see clearly that our new knowledge enlarges tenfold the significance of human life, and makes it seem more than ever the chief object of divine care, the consummate fruition of that creative Energy which is manifested throughout the knowable universe.” When he came to speak, Dr. Fiske was wise above what is written in the last phrase of this passage. For “knowable universe” he substituted “the universe as known”; and this was well, for I do not see why somewhere under its ample roof the universe may not house beings as much superior to man as man is to the ape or the ascidian.

Mr. Clark's address of welcome was a thoughtful and appreciative review of Dr. Fiske's work during the last thirty years, its incidental emphasis on Buckle, as if he were a third with Darwin and Spencer, being its most doubtful point. Dr. Fiske's talk was poured out in good measure, but we did not sit uneasily in our chairs. It was the more interesting for its autobiographical character. It was a personal confession of the method and the incidents of his intellectual development. Darwin's "Origin of Species" at once enlisted his enthusiastic admiration and support; but when, some ten years later, his "Descent of Man" appeared, it was evident that he had not succeeded so well in doing what he attempted as before. There he had exhibited a vera causa for the development of species. Here his development of man lacked something of sufficient proof. At this juncture it was Alfred Russel Wallace, Darwin's codiscoverer of natural selection, who helped Dr. Fiske to supplement Darwin's book with the additional proofs for which that had left a void. The help was twofold. In the first instance it came from Wallace's perception that no sooner were certain intellectual and moral traits of more service to man than certain physical variations, than the stress of natural selection was directed toward their development. In the second instance the help was a mere hint, which Dr. Fiske ultimately developed into his most characteristic and original doctrine,—that of the prolongation of infancy as a factor in the development of the family and marriage and a sympathetic social life. The hint came from Wallace's "Malay Archipelago." It was embodied in the story of Wallace's capture of a baboon mother and child. The mother died, and Wallace brought up the child by hand; and, comparing the process with that of rearing human children, "Dear me," said Fiske, "here is something which nobody has said anything about, and it is the key to the whole situation." The fact is the human baby is as "one born out of due time"; and so he has to have a period of infancy in which to organize the habits for the organization of which there was not time in his ante-natal life. But there is no call for me to go on with this. It is worked out in the "Destiny of Man" and the "Cosmic Philosophy," but not, if I remember rightly, in its relations to Wallace's help as in Dr. Fiske's delightful talk, which from history passed into prophecy, and forecast the future in a very cheerful and inspiring fashion.

Dr. Henry Van Dyke was the next speaker; and he asserted his Orthodoxy in a distinct and fearless manner, finding it in nothing inconsistent with the true teachings of science and evolution. Certainly not, so long as the Orthodoxy is to be made the standard of the science and the evolution. Orthodoxy has always been able to reconcile its dogmas with science on this basis. The moment any scientific doctrine is established Orthodoxy can find proof-texts for it in the Bible. It was evident that Dr. Van Dyke had not learned the alphabet of Dr. Fiske's philosophy; and, in his bland, self-satisfied unconsciousness that there was anything the matter with him the evening found its most amusing situation. St. Gaudens, our great sculptor, a man as simple and sincere in all his ways as Daniel French, a peer of the same realm, could not be persuaded to say anything, though he certainly could not have blundered worse than Dr. Van Dyke. Carroll D. Wright showed us that he, as well as Gladstone, could make figures sing. Machinery as an aid to social evolution was his theme. He told us what mind embodied in machinery could do to increase the value of crude products, a few cents' worth of crude iron, for example, being made worth more than $200,000 when converted into the pallet-arbors of a watch. Mr. R. W. Gilder, who looks the poet that he is, had a fine thought of the suggestion which painting and sculpture carry of the supersensible. Mr. Dorman B. Eaton made a happy application of the doctrine of Darwin to civil service reform, appointment and promotion by examination and merit being simply artificial selection and the preservation of the fittest. Rev. M. St. C. Wright ushered in the coming day both literally and figuratively with a few earnest words. It was a good time, taking it altogether; and Dr. Fiske must, I think, have been pleased with so many personal acknowledgments of the help which he had rendered many men of many minds. His lecture in my church on Sunday evening, May 5, on "The Origin of Evil," was one of several that he has been giving in New York. Many are glad that his interest is rather growing than declining in this kind of thing. But his audience was small in comparison with that of a New England clergyman who is reviving the methods of ancient prophecy by introducing object-lessons into his preaching. Last Sunday night he had two bicycles on the pulpit platform, and found in every part of them some illustration of things heavenly and divine. But that is not the funniest thing out in the religious line. This is a papal benediction, with plenary indulgence, in articulo mortis, which has been sent by Leo XIII. to Hugh McLaughlin, the head devil of our Brooklyn machine politics for the last thirty years. May it be sanctified to him!

J. W. C.

THE PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

For the eighth time in the space of one hundred and seven years the Presbyterian General Assembly is in session at Pittsburgh. At least two of the earlier meetings held here were of especial importance. At that of 1836 occurred the great trial of Dr. Albert Barnes, and other doings resulting in a split of the denomination into old school and new school, which lasted for thirty-two years. Hon. E. R. Hoar, not long before his lamented death, in a letter to the writer concerning his early residence of a year in Pittsburgh, said: "While in Pittsburgh, I attended the session of the Presbyterian General Assembly which tried Dr. Albert Barnes for heresy, and attempted to try Dr. Lyman Beecher, and there heard some of the ablest, most vigorous, and eloquent theological discussions that I have ever heard in my life."

The dread of heresy still abides in the stanch old church, and at the close of the third day of the present assembly the evidence is strong and growing stronger that the old-time ability for strenuous debate has not diminished.

The second of the two notable assemblies here was that of 1869, at which the split of 1836 was ended and a union of the two parties effected. The present assembly commemorates the twenty-fifth anniversary of that famous reunion, and is held in the same church that echoed to the glad doxology at the union of 1869.

Another reason why the assembly should come again and again to Pittsburgh is that the synod of Pennsylvania contains one-fourth of the Presbyterian Church, and that Pittsburgh is its strongest point. This would seem to justify a part of the boast of the moderator, Dr. R. R. Booth, who said, "Presbyterianism has made Pennsylvania what it is, and has essentially created all that is best in the United States." The latter claim is a large one; but, exaggerated or not, it shows that the Presbyterian Church has a high sense of its mission and influence. The criticism has been often made upon Unitarians that in their conferences they are wont to "brag terribly." So far as that is true, the writer has felt much at home in these Presbyterian meetings, and has indulgently sympathized with the zeal that has found expression in such words as "God gave this country to Presbyterians when there were none to contest their fitness for the position"; "The Presbyterian Church has always stood in the front rank for an educated ministry"; "Ours is the church under which England, Scotland, and Ireland were once united in religion." Small usefulness would lie in that church whose members were not proud of its name and its qualities.

Another true-hearted note in these meetings is that of trenchant self-criticism from the lips of speakers who think they see defects in the organization and method of their Church, and of devout confession of the inadequacy of their work as compared with their opportunity. The retiring moderator, Dr. Mutchmore, in the opening sermon was severe in his arraignment of the Church on the ground that its cumbersome machinery of organization often defeated its ends by preventing rapid action, that it had neglected the education of the young, and that too little use had been made of lay workers, both men and women. This, too, was a familiar note to the Unitarian reporter. Among us, also, there rise up earnest spirits who say that old methods are not necessarily perfect, and that "new occasions teach new duties." Whether it be discouraging and unwise or not, self-criticism is not confined to Unitarians.

Presbyterians are human from crown to toe. With certain differences, they are just like Unitarians. They, too, believe that all the land is theirs, if they will only march in and possess it. They, too, believe that their gospel is the one thing the present day needs. They, as well as we, have a topping sense of being intellectual. Ex-Gov. Beaver said in a speech (the hearty and persuasive eloquence of which showed that he stands to Presbyterianism somewhat as ex-Gov. Robinson does to Unitarianism), "Whoever cannot see the logic of the Shorter Catechism, and accept it from the first proposition to the end, must be somewhat deficient here" (tapping his head, amid great applause). They, like ourselves, cannot get money enough to carry on all the work they desire to do. They rustle morning papers in the pews before the exercises begin. They, at an evening meeting which was opened with prayer and Scripture reading, applauded the choir's rendering of a religious song. They are human, if they are orthodox.

This assembly appears thus far to be strongly conservative, and sensitively on the alert against any touch of heresy. It would take great moral courage for any man to utter there the sentiments for which Drs. Briggs and Smith have been persecuted. If it takes courage to follow one's convictions out of an orthodox body, it certainly takes more to express them openly in such a body as the Presbyterian Assembly. The Presbyterian Church has a multitude of laymen whose Christianity is more Unitarian than it is Trinitarian, but such men do not appear at general assembly. Yet the assembly is conscious of the advance of unorthodox ideas in its churches and its theological seminaries, and the result is a sad atmosphere of distrust in its deliberations. When three eminent doctors of divinity were nominated for the position of moderator, each person who made or seconded a nomination took the greatest care to vouch for the orthodoxy of his candidate, and to declare him free from all disloyalty to the Presbyterian Church. From the first the dark word "disloyal" has hung over the assembly like a cloud ready to burst out upon any man who ventures to dissent from the majority. Nearly every debater, upon rising, begins by a protestation that he is and has always been "loyal to the Presbyterian Church."

This general feeling of anxiety found early expression in the report of the Committee on Theological Seminaries. This was presented Friday morning by Rev. W. C. Young, who took occasion to say that the only way to stop the general condition of unrest in the denomination would be to adopt the report, the substance of the report being that every seminary be required to make such change in its charter as is necessary to give the General Assembly the right to appeal to the civil courts to compel that school at all future times to teach solely what the assembly defines to be Presbyterian doctrine. For two hours on Friday afternoon and three hours Saturday morning the discussion upon this report waxed warmer and warmer; and it is to be resumed Monday, and continued until finished. Unlimited time is allowed each speaker. The three hours of Saturday were occupied by three speakers. Ecclesiastical argument is made a weighty thing; and, while this is not a heresy trial, it is the laying of strong foundations for trials that are sure to come. So the debaters "scent the battle from afar," and are making a spirited discussion. The opposition to the report has been ably led by Rev. Howard Johnston, D.D., of Chicago; and the speech which has been most weighty in its favor thus far has been that of Hon. Thomas McDougall of Ohio. Many conservatives have joined the liberals in maintaining the independence of the seminaries. It is claimed to be unjust to distrust them all simply because Union has (as one speaker said) "been a scamp." And the committee's report is resented as an imputation upon the loyalty of the various boards of trustees of the seminaries. "Cannot the three hundred trustees who are all good Presbyterians be trusted as much as this committee of a dozen?" is the cry. The defence of the schools thus far has been upon the most general grounds,—expediency, difficulty of making charter alterations, etc. No speaker has ventured to say openly what a Pittsburgh minister, himself a conservative, said to the writer,—that the assembly is making an attack upon personal liberty. This must be in many minds, but the man who says it in the assembly will expose himself to the suspicion of "disloyalty." The assembly is likely to vote strongly for the committee's report, and to say squarely that any seminary that refuses to submit is thereby shown to be not a Presbyterian, but an undenominational school.

The report of the Committee upon Sabbath Observance called out several speeches more forcible than enlightened. Sunday newspapers were denounced in unmeasured terms. It was declared that no good Presbyterian could buy or advertise in a Sunday paper. One speaker said, "If these papers and all other modern laxities on the Sabbath cannot be stopped, our occupation as ministers is gone." The minister who presented the report mentioned as a most reprehensible thing that he had, since coming to Pittsburg, received thirteen invitations to Sunday dinners. There was a general expression of desire for the old Puritan Sabbath as the safeguard of religion and righteousness. Several of the lay delegates were among the most pronounced in this matter.

More than once in the assembly, and in the women's missionary meetings, which are held simultaneously, a great antagonism to the Roman Catholic Church has been expressed. Gen. Beaver went so far as to say, "The Romanists gather multitudes of children into their schools, and there teach them to disobey their fathers and mothers."

The constituency of the assembly is almost entirely different each year. Ministers and elders are sent to it to some extent in routine, so that, save in exceptional cases, no one man appears oftener than once in ten or twelve years. This prevents the warm personal interest that is possible in the conventions of a smaller religious body, and perhaps is one cause of the unrest and distrust.

There has been a surprising lack of general interest in the meetings. There are hundreds of thousands of Presbyterians in and near this city, yet at no session has the church been crowded to its fullest capacity. It will seat thirteen hundred. The commissioners occupy six hundred seats, and that there do not come people enough to overcrowd the remaining seven hundred seats is a puzzle to the writer. Is it because the assembly is supposed to be occupied with merely formal business, or is it because the session covers so many days, or because most of the lay members of Presbyterian churches have swung too far ahead of the temper that prevails in the general assemblies? CHARLES E. ST. JOHN.

ANNIVERSARY WEEK.

This calendar is compiled from notices received at this office.

HOSPITALITY.

The American Unitarian Association Building, No. 25 Beacon Street, will be open during the week until 7 P.M. daily. All are welcome.

As for many years past, the Boston Young Men's Christian Union offers the hospitality of its rooms, 48 Boylston Street (near Tremont Street), to the clergy and laity of all denominations—both ladies and gentlemen—who may be visiting Boston during Anniversary Week.

Religious Intelligence.

NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE.—The next meeting of the New England Associate Alliance will be held in Concord, N.H., on Tuesday, June 11. Mrs. Phalen will speak on "Religious Reading." A full programme will be published later.

"NEW WORLD" DINNER.—The friends of the New World Review are invited to dine at the Hotel Thorndike in Anniversary Week, as in previous years. Dinner will be served at one o'clock P.M. on Wednesday, May 29. Prof. C. C. Everett will preside; and brief addresses will be made by Rev. P. S. Moxom, D.D., Dean Hodges of the Episcopal Theological School, Mr. Francis C. Lowell, and others. Tickets to be procured at the clerk's office.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. Theodore C. Williams will preach May 26. Service at 10.30 A.M.

An Out-door Service: The first of the six out-of-door services to be held on Boston Common took place last Sunday. A cornet led the singing. Next Sunday at 5 P.M. Rev. M. J. Savage will preach in the same place.

New South Church: At the annual meeting of the society of the New South Church (Unitarian), corner Tremont and Camden Streets, held in the parish parlors a few evenings since, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year, namely: president, H. C. Whitcomb; first vice-president, F. E. Bartley; second vice-president, W. A. Nutting; treasurer, J. H. Wiggin; sub-treasurer, S. A. Stetson; auditor, F. R. Tibbitts; secretary, E. T. Capen; C. F. Koopman, Jr., J. W. Wilbur, S. Kelley.

ANDOVER, N.H.—Rev. C. J. Staples of Manchester will deliver the baccalaureate discourse for the graduating class of Proctor Academy Sunday, June 2. The graduation exercises will be held Friday P.M., June 7. An entertainment will be held by the alumni in the evening.

BATH, N.H.—All Souls' Church at Bath, N.H., has passed a successful winter under the ministration of Rev. W. P. Elkins. But its heavy debt of $800 is a great burden upon the shoulders of its members. Once relieved of this debt, the church would be a far greater power for good in this little farming community, where there are large hearts, but small purses. The midsummer fair will be held in August; and the leaders will be grateful for aid in money and fancy articles, which can be sent to Mrs. John Bedell or Mrs. Sophia Orne Johnson.

DOVER, N.H.—A correspondent writes: "Rev. Dr. Ward has been preaching for the last two Sundays very acceptably to our parish in Dover. The parish has had the good fortune to receive $2,000, bequeathed by Mrs. Elizabeth Hale Jacques, daughter of Hon. John P. Hale, in memory of her father and mother and of her own interest in the church. Recently, upon a Sunday, the minister who was expected to conduct services did not arrive. The congregation did what it could to fulfil the requirements of a religious service by singing a hymn and then taking up a collection for the Unitarian Association."

PITTSBURG, PA.—On Sunday, May 19, the pulpits of nearly all the churches in Pittsburg and Allegheny were supplied by ministers in attendance on the Presbyterian General Assembly. Rev. C. E. St. John of the First Unitarian Church offered his pulpit to the assembly's Committee on Supply, and it was courteously accepted. Rev. H. C. Ferguson of Canton, Ohio, was appointed to preach there, and did so in a spirit of cordial fellowship. He did not hide his orthodoxy; yet he maintained an attitude of entire respect to his hearers and their convictions, and recognized that he and they are engaged in a common work.

ROXBURY, MASS.—Rev. John W. Chadwick of Brooklyn will preach on Sunday morning, June 2, at All Souls' Church, Roxbury (Rev. Mr. Lyon's).

TACOMA, WASH.—Rev. Alfred W. Martin has been in Boston, and has called our attention to the accidental omission of a word in a recent notice of the non-resident membership roll opened by his church. The invitation was for all persons not residents of Tacoma who are in sympathy with the cause of universal religion to identify themselves with this new ideal in religion by sending their names to the secretary, Mr. J. R. Hendrey.

PLYMOUTH AND BAY CONFERENCE.—The twenty-eighth annual meeting of the Plymouth and Bay Conference was held May 8. Lack of space prevents a full report; but the papers by Mr. Batchelor and Mrs. Davis won the appreciative interest of the conference, while the resolutions showed a desire to co-operate in earnest, effective work. The officers of last year were re-elected.

THE AMERICAN CONGRESS.—The Congress of Liberal Religious Societies will hold its annual meeting in Sinai Temple, Chicago, June 4, 5, and 6. Among the important topics to be discussed will be further considerations of "Plans of Confederation of the Various Liberal Forces of America," "What We can Do Together," "The Dangers and Abuses of Wealth," "Various Sociological Problems as they press upon the Churches of To-day," "The Spiritual Value of the Higher Criticism," "The Common Elements in All Religions" or "The Fundamental of Universal Religion," "The Exchange of Pulpits between So-called Liberal and Orthodox Ministers," and similar questions, together with reports upon missionary and publication plans and problems. Dr. Alfred Momerie of London, Rabbi Voorsanger of San Francisco, Rev. Dr. Herron, and President George A. Gates of Iowa College, Grinnell, Ia., with many of the representative members, lay and clerical, of the Jewish, Unitarian, Universalist, and Ethical Culture movements will take part in the Congress. A full programme will be published later.

ESSEX CONFERENCE.—The Essex Conference of Unitarian Churches held its spring session at Newburyport on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 14 and 15. Rev. Dr. Beane and his people were hearty in their welcome; and, in spite of the dreary north-east storm, there was a fair number in attendance. And the exercises were interesting and profitable. Hon. E. P. Dodge, the president of the conference, was in the chair.

A strong and beautiful sermon on "The Value of Faith," by Rev. W. R. Alger, was much enjoyed by the large audience present on Tuesday evening. The devotional meeting on Wednesday morning was conducted by Rev. F. A. Gilmore of Haverhill, who spoke of "Contrition and Consolation as presented in the Fifty-first Psalm."

The morning essay was by Rev. George Batchelor, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, upon "The Transition from Philosophy to Religion." It was a timely presentation of the need of an earnest, living religious life in our churches.

In the afternoon Rev. George D. Latimer gave a paper on "The Church and the World." He held that the spirit of the Church is one of self-repression, and the spirit of the world is one of self-assertion, and treated their relation to each other in the formation of a perfect character.

Rev. Albert Lazenby of Glasgow, Scotland, was present, and took part in the discussions of the day.

WORCESTER LEAGUE.—The last meeting of the season of the Worcester League was held on Wednesday, May 15, at the First Unitarian Church, Worcester. Besides representatives from five city churches, members were present from Auburn, Brookfield, Clinton, Grafton, Petersham, Sterling, and Warren. The morning was given to business, and to Mrs. Sarah Theodore Brown's paper on "Rescue Work in the German Evangelical Church." This was mainly the account of factory life in the village of Chemnitz, Germany, as told by Dr. Göhre in "Three Months in a German Workshop," a book recently translated into English. Dr. Göhre, who questioned whether he would study theology or political economy as a profession, went to Chemnitz, and solved the problem by actually living the life of the operatives for three months. He tells of their being huddled together in small and unsanitary rooms, of the poor food they ate, and their bitterness toward the Church. At the close of her paper Mrs. Brown brightened this dark picture by telling of the rescue work which has been undertaken by the Evangelical Church, mostly along the lines called preventive, an account of which was given in the New World by John Graham Brooks.

At 12.45 luncheon was served. The afternoon session opened at two o'clock. The subject, "Religion," was presented in two papers. The first—"What is Personal Religion? Is it Natural? What is Religious Liberty?"—was given by Mrs. C. L. French of Clinton. The second, prepared by Miss Marion Drew and read by Miss Carrie M. Houghton, was upon "The Difference between the Old and New Theologies in their Effects upon Religious Life." A collection was taken for the Unitarian church at Ithaca, N.Y., and an invitation accepted to meet in Leicester, Mass., for a special meeting in October.

WORCESTER CONFERENCE.—The spring session of the Worcester Conference met with the First Unitarian Society in Hudson on the evening of May 15 and all day of the 16th. The weather could not have been better. Mention deserves to be made of the beautiful and profuse decorations of the church and the fine singing of both choir and congregation. The conference was opened on the evening of the 15th with a religious service. Rev. Stopford W. Brooke preached on the words: "Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage."

On the morning of the 16th there was a devotional service, conducted by Rev. A. S. Garver. In the absence of the president, the vice-president, John C. Otis, Esq., of Worcester, occupied the chair. The conference voted to change the preamble of its constitution to conform with the new preamble of the National Conference. The conference appointed as its delegates to the National Conference to be held in Washington next October Charles H. Blood of Fitchburg, John C. Otis, Worcester, Mrs. W. S. Heywood, Sterling. The secretary read a letter inviting the conference to send delegates to meetings of the American Congress of Liberal Religious Societies to be held in Chicago in June. After some discussion the following motion was unanimously adopted:—

"We thank the American Congress of Liberal Religious Societies for the courteous invitation to take part in the coming annual meeting to be held in Chicago; and, instead of appointing delegates who would be unable to attend, we desire to express our sympathy with the general aims of the Congress."

The essay of the forenoon was read by Rev. W. F. Greenman of Fitchburg on the subject, "The Immediate Advance of Unitarian Congregationalism." The essay was a consideration of the next step which the Unitarian body, and especially the Worcester Conference, should take. The essayist declared his firm faith in the Congregational idea, but complained that it had not been better applied to our church life. The discussion of the essay was opened by Rev. George W. Kent of Worcester, who thoroughly agreed with it, while stanchly defending the liberty and independence of the individual churches. Messrs. Walsh and C. A. Allen took part in the discussion. Mr. Allen spoke in high terms of Rev. George Batchelor, secretary of the American Unitarian Association.

After a bountiful repast the conference met to listen to several laymen speak on the topic, "To What Kind of a Church would I be Loyal?" The first speaker was Jonathan Smith, Esq., Clinton. His phase of the topic was the preaching. Mr. Smith said he would be loyal first to the preaching of affirmations; second, to the preaching of general principles, with their applications to the life of to-day; third, to preaching on subjects which are of a purely moral and religious character. The secular sermon has no legitimate place in the Sunday morning service. The essayist held up Phillips Brooks as a model for preachers. The next speaker was Archibald M. Howe, Esq., of Cambridge, who spoke on "Missionary Work," declaring it to be our most sacred trust. We have a cause so simple that it belongs to all mankind. "Missionary work," said the speaker, "begins in the home, in the family devotions around the table." He advocated a closer inter-communication between the American Unitarian Association and the local conferences. Mr. Howe paid a high tribute of praise to Mr. Stone, the nominee for treasurer of the American Unitarian Association. The subject of "Philanthropy" was treated by F. E. Holman, Esq., Clinton. While conceding that Unitarians are, as a rule, generous with their money, the essayist questioned if they are as earnest and faithful in the work. We need to learn that the chief sources of strength come from within. Effective reform requires personal work. Dilettanteism in philanthropy is worse than indifference. The church which should claim our loyalty is that church which stands out boldly as a religious and spiritual organization.

The essays were discussed by Messrs. Wilson, Littlefield of Peterboro, Bassett of Berlin, Bodge of Leominster, Hayward of Marlboro, Green of Reading, Garver and Kent of Worcester. A vote of thanks was given to Rev. S. W. Brooke for his courageous sermon, to the essayist of the morning and the laymen who took part in the exercises, and to the Hudson parish for their generous entertainment and hospitality.

The next meeting of the conference will be held in Upton in October, when Rev. G. H. Bodge of Leominster is expected to read the essay. The directors of the conference authorized the secretary to invite Rev. G. W. Kent of Worcester to take his place for the remainder of the year, inasmuch as his parish in Clinton has granted him a year's leave of absence to study in Germany.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The board of directors of the American Unitarian Association held their regular monthly meeting at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, May 14. There were present Mrs. Wells, and Messrs. Batchelor, Crothers, Dole, Fox, Hale, Hosmer, Howe, and Lincoln.

The reports of the treasurer and the Finance Committee, which will be included in the reports at the annual meeting, are here omitted.

On recommendation of the Publication Committee, new editions were authorized of "Five Services for Public Worship," "Day unto Day," "Unitarian Affirmations," "Thoughts Selected from Channing," $111.73 was voted to cover expenses of the Ladies' Commission on Sunday-school Books. $2,000 was put at the disposal of the Publication Committee for the coming year.

On recommendation of Rev. D. M. Wilson, superintendent for New England, the following appropriations were made: South Unitarian Congregational Society, Worcester, Mass., $600; First Unitarian Society, Wolfeboro, N.H., $300; Bowen Memorial Chapel, Tiverton, R.I., in memory of Mr. Thomas Whittredge, a benefactor of the Association, $600; First Unitarian Society, Lancaster, N.H., $100; Church of the Messiah, St. John, N.B., bills to be paid at the discretion of the secretary, also $350 for the salary of Dr. MacDougall through the month of June; First Unitarian Society, Ware, Mass., $30 contributed by J. T. Stevens, Esq., for that purpose to Rev. W. H. Savary, on arrears of salary for last year, $50 contributed by the Plymouth and Bay Conference for that purpose.

On recommendation of the Executive Committee, it was voted to send Messrs. Brown and Savage to the Western Conference.

Rev. Alfred Manchester, superintendent of the Indian Commission, appeared to present the case of the Indian School in Montana. At his suggestion it was "Voted, That, in accordance with the proposals made by Messrs. S. J. Barrows and Alfred Manchester, representing the Commission on Indian Education of the American Unitarian Association, and also in accordance with the amendment to those proposals suggested by the Department of the Interior, Office of Indian Affairs (Finance, 1522-1523-8946-11597-13512-'95 enclosure), the American Unitarian Association will transfer to the United States, on the first day of July, 1895, the buildings and equipment of the Montana Industrial School, on the Crow Reservation, Montana, on the following terms, namely: the United States shall pay to the American Unitarian Association for buildings the nominal sum of $1, and for equipment, as per inventory referred to in the above-mentioned correspondence, $2,443.57, and shall assume entire control of the Montana Industrial School, on the terms mentioned in Articles 2, 3, and 4 of the proposals already submitted to and approved by the Department of the Interior; and the American Unitarian Association will thereupon relinquish all claim upon the property and management of said school."

A communication was received from the American Congress of Liberal Religious Societies, inviting the American Unitarian Association to subscribe to the funds of the Congress, and to send delegates to the approaching meeting in Chicago. The secretary and Rev. S. M. Crothers were appointed a special committee to express the general sympathy of the Association with the objects of the Congress, but to call attention to some practical difficulties in the way of the working plan suggested.

A long report was received from Rev. Clay MacCauley in Japan, and referred to the Committee on the Annual Meeting.

The chairman appointed as auditors Charles H. Hooper and George Peirce.

Adjourned to meet Friday, May 24, at three o'clock, to hear the secretary's draft of the report of the directors.

A Business Man's Comfort.—How many business men stop to realize that in one single office chair before their desk they spend fully a third of the 24 hours in every day? And this chair is usually an uncomfortable old-fashioned back number of the furniture family. In another column of this issue the Palme Furniture Company present some new styles of their leather-cushioned office chairs, which are the acme of comfort and elegance. There is no man in this city conducting a business, however small, who cannot well afford one of these restful and luxurious office chairs for his own private use.

Deaths.

In Brooklyn, N.Y., 20th inst., Joel W. Stearns, in the 69th year of his age.

Mr. Stearns was born in Leominster, Mass., April 4, 1827. After doing business for a while in Boston, he came to New York about 1850, and connected himself with the house of John C. Beale, a stationer, and ultimately, and before long, as a partner with William P. Beale, who had been with him a clerk in his brother's employ. This partnership lasted until Mr. Stearns's death, and the firm was known among stationers as one that was a credit to their guild. Mr. Stearns was one of Samuel Longfellow's young men in the Second Unitarian Church, for which his affection remained always very great. Before its altar he was married to the noble lady whose loss some ten or twelve years since was the greatest sorrow of his life. Of their five sons, three live to keep their parents' memories green. Mr. Stearns was a man of bright and happy temperament, of ready sympathies, of ardent enthusiasm for the things that appealed to him as deserving the devotion of his conscience and his heart. He was an ardent patriot, and particularly interested in the anti-slavery struggle, in which he took an honorable part. He was a lover of good books and pictures and an eager traveller. He was one of the founders and one of the most devoted members of the Rembrandt Club, a Brooklyn society of gentlemen interested in the fine arts. The Union for Christian Work also found in him a loyal supporter, a long term of official service testifying his regard. Gentle, kindly, affable, and humorous, he made many friends, whom he cherished with a chivalric loyalty. These words are written "that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed," for wide was the circle of those who found life something happier and pleasanter because of the brightness of his nature and the goodness of his heart.

SEVENTIETH ANNIVERSARY

—OF THE—

American Unitarian Association,

TUESDAY, MAY 28,

—IN BOSTON, AT—

MUSIC HALL.

The American Unitarian Association will hold its seventieth annual meeting in Boston, at Music Hall, on Tuesday, May 28, at which business will be transacted and subjects of great practical interest will be presented. There will be three sessions,—in the morning at 9.30 o'clock and in the afternoon at 2.30 and in the evening at 7.30.

The delegate and life members will occupy, at the morning and afternoon sessions, the seats in the body of the Hall, and will be admitted by tickets sent them for that purpose. Should any fail to receive such, they can be had on application to the Association, 25 Beacon Street, Boston.

To transact the business of the Association, it is necessary that the body of the Hall should be reserved for members. But the galleries will furnish ample accommodation for others who desire to be present. At the evening meeting all seats will be open to the public.

At the MORNING SESSION there will be an address of welcome by his Excellency, Gov. Greenhalge; the usual regular business of the Annual Report of the Directors and Treasurer; and an address by Mrs. B. W. Dix, president of the Women's Alliance.

At the AFTERNOON SESSION there will be addresses on the needs and opportunities of our work. Letters from Dr. James Martineau and others will be followed by a response from Dr. E. E. Hale. Addresses are expected also from Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer and others.

The EVENING MEETING will be devoted to the discussion of the relations and duties of the liberal church to the community. Addresses are expected from the president-elect, Hon. John D. Long, Wm. M. Brundage, Ph.D., Rev. Albert Lazenby, delegate from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and Rev. W. W. Fenn of Chicago.

The doors will be open at each session three-quarters of an hour before the time of commencing.

Clergymen are invited to take seats on the platform at the evening meeting, and to be in the anteroom for that purpose at 7.25.

1849 THE CHILDREN'S MISSION. 1895

THE FORTY-SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CHILDREN'S MISSION TO THE CHILDREN OF THE DESTITUTE will be held on Wednesday afternoon, May 29, at three o'clock, in Arlington Street Church.

Addresses will be made by Rev. Albert Lazenby of Glasgow, Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, and Rev. Albert Walkley; and brief reports of the work of the year will be given by the Secretary and Treasurer.

Singing by a quartette from the Winthrop Sunday-school.

All persons interested in work for orphan, destitute, and dependent children are cordially invited.

WM. H. BALDWIN, President.
WM. CROSBY, Superintendent.

A BURDEN OF PRAYER.

BY REV. THEODORE C. WILLIAMS.

Father, to-day
I humbly pray
Into no sin my hasty feet may stray.

My wilfulness,
Till thou shalt bless,
Cannot sustain me in true holiness.

My boasted might
To choose the right,
Forgetting thee, my God, is mean and slight.

From my true path,
Scorning thy wrath,
I flutter as a foolish insect doth.

My wing of love,
Not aimed above,
Goes trailing in the mire, and is not love.

My sight, my power,
My love's brief hour,
Are baubles only, till some starry dower

From heaven doth shine
On what seems mine,
And bless poor me with light and love divine.

The Western Anniversaries.

WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.

The opening services of the Western Unitarian Conference were held on Tuesday evening, May 14. Prayer was offered by Rev. W. M. Backus of Alton, Ill. The sermon, by Rev. John E. Roberts of Kansas City, was from the text, "And no man putteth new wine into old wine-skins."

The devotional service on Wednesday morning, conducted by Rev. B. R. Bulkeley, was heartily entered into by both the leader and the several speakers who followed him. It was truly "devotional."

The president's address was given by Hon. D. L. Shorey as follows:—

The first session of this conference was held in Cincinnati, May 7, 1852. Rev. Mr. Livermore, historian of the conference in its first quarter of a century, says in reference to its first meeting: "We met in that dear old smoky church at the corner of Race and South Streets,—the church where Ephraim Peabody, William H. Channing, and James H. Perkins had been ministers, and where now stands a large dry-goods store. There were Hosmer, Heywood, Clarke, Huidekoper, Mumford, De Lange, and his bride of two days, Webster, Boyer, Scarborough, Conant, the man in earnest; and the wise men from the East were Drs. Lothrop, George E. Ellis, and Briggs. William Green, Esq., of Cincinnati presided; and he contributed much to the success of the meeting by promptness and punctuality, adherence to parliamentary rules, and that love of keeping the digressing ministers to the question which I have observed gratifies the lay mind as some pleasant retaliation for being so soundly lectured from the pulpit without chance of reply."

We have no member of that first session here to-day; but we have "wise men from the East," many ministers who have grown mellow in service, and a layman in the chair whose functions—as determined by sound precedent forty-three years ago—are to keep "digressing ministers to the question."

I am very happy to greet this morning, as the first president did, the wise men from the East. These distinguished guests require no introduction nor formal welcome here; for they come as friends among friends, in unity of purpose and spirit, and as coworkers in the same free and pure religious movement.

If I venture once again to greet our friends in this conference, I can ask nothing more than that my words may be received in the fine spirit of the greetings they have already given to each other.

Of the ministers who attended the earlier sessions of the conference, some are worn out in service, some have been transferred to other fields, and some are not living. I do not recall any pulpits within the limits of the conference that are now filled by the ministers who occupied them when I first took this chair, twenty-two years ago. Men come and go. The life of an institution is commensurate with its usefulness. It is for you, my friends, to determine how long the one purpose stated in our charter—"the general interests of the societies connected with the conference"—shall continue to be promoted by this organization. The original purpose of the conference, in my opinion, cannot be promoted to the full measure of our opportunity without greater harmony of feeling and action than we have sometimes had. We have passed through periods of excitement in which some animosities among friends—the only animosities hard to bear—have been engendered. I hope we are on the eve of a better understanding with kindred associations that are and ought to remain in sympathy with our general purposes. It is a question of policy, and not of principle, how intimate shall be the relations between this conference and any of the kindred associations I have alluded to. Some questions touching these relations, affecting especially methods of work, will come before you for consideration. Every delegate will have opportunity to be heard on these questions; and at the close of the discussion the opinion of the conference will be given in the only legitimate way a corporation speaks,—by its vote. I need not say that a vote so taken upon a discussion so participated in will bind every sane conscience, even a religious conscience, which sometimes seems to be lacking in ethical qualities. In that way, and in no other, shall we have harmony and effective co-operation; and the long-awaited-for enthusiasm may return to our churches.

Rev. Mr. Forbush requests me to say that important engagements in the Missouri valley prevent his attendance, and that he regrets his inability to be present.

As my long term of service draws to a close, and memory takes me back into the years as they have come and gone, each with its promises and hopes, its burdens and trials, its patience and courage, and all with their comradeship and loyalty to duty, I have an abiding conviction that the younger men and women now coming to position and leadership will find in the life of our conference a record worth preserving. Words and voice would fail me if I should attempt to express the deep sense of gratitude I feel for the kindness, the consideration, and the friendships which these years have brought to me.

The secretary, Rev. A. W. Gould, reported some sixty services held during the year, besides several lectures. He had written some fifteen hundred letters, been present at two dedications, and helped several churches to secure ministers. Touching the Liberal Congress, he said that he felt its work to be so closely akin to our own that he acted as chairman of its Missionary Committee. He had found several points where the union of the liberal forces seemed possible only along the lines of the Liberal Congress.

The expenses of the conference for the year were, in round numbers, $4,800. The income from all sources amounted to $4,450, leaving a deficit for the year of some $350. This amount, added to the deficit brought over from last year, made a present deficit of $2,000.

The report of the treasurer, which had been summarized by the secretary, was read by Mr. Hosmer, the treasurer being absent on account of illness. Brief reports of the State conferences followed.

On behalf of the Illinois Conference Rev. C. F. Elliott reported that a minister, Rev. Seward Baker, had recently gone to Sterling; and, with the help of $200 from the conference, his salary for a year was now assured. The movement at Valparaiso, Ind., which had always been fostered by the conference, was promising. The Church of the Messiah in Chicago, under the leadership of Mr. Fenn, was developing a new missionary spirit.

In Wisconsin Mr. Secrist said that the workers were all young men and new to the State. They were only just becoming familiar with its missionary possibilities and needs. Now that these were coming into sight, and the workers were coming to know each other, he felt that good results might be hoped for. During the past year there had been an effort to revive the work at Kenosha and some other points, but no new field had been opened.

For Iowa Mr. Harvey said that the annual conference at Sioux City in October, 1894, had seventy-seven delegates present, this being by far the largest number which the conference had ever had. The enthusiasm of the conference was likewise marked. The Finance Committee reported $900 raised during the year for missionary work. Two new churches had been dedicated within the year,—one at Cherokee, and the other at Perry. Cherokee, Washta, and Marcus—three points developed by Misses Safford and Gordon—had united in a call to Mr.

Van Sluyters; and thus there was every promise of permanence to these movements. Miss Safford had recently started a new movement at Ida Grove, where the large congregations and the notable enthusiasm gave every promise of a new church. During the year, too, Mr. Byrnes had started a society at Forest City, where there were now sixty-eight members. A promising movement at Coon Rapids was being developed by Mr. Stevens of Perry. At Ames a little society of twenty-five members had been organized by Mr. Harvey; but, having been shut out of two of the public halls, through the persistent opposition of Orthodoxy, the society had at present no meeting-place. At Centerville, where Mr. Bidwell, now of Geneseo, Ill., had worked for nine months, there was an earnest band of Unitarians. In all there were five new mission points. Old and New became a conference organ in January, and is proving a very effective servant.

In Mr. Wyman's absence Mr. Roberts reported for the Missouri Valley Conference. He felt that this body was not very efficient,—was, indeed, hardly more than hypothetical. The best of feeling existed among the ministers, but organized effort was lacking. The report concerning his own church in Kansas City, with its audience of from five to seven hundred, was very interesting. The work of the Ladies' Aid Society of St. Joseph, Mo., where Mr. Roberts now speaks on Sunday evenings, is especially noteworthy. During the past six months this society has raised some $1,600 to pay off church debts. At their recent annual meeting a board of trustees was selected from these women, thus replacing the male board; and now the church is thoroughly alive, the congregations reaching some two hundred.

Mr. Forbush, in a short address, spoke of the excellent work which Mr. Crooker is doing in Montana. He believed that the work of developing churches in the larger centres, at whatever cost, was the true policy. He believed that the work in the college towns bore fruit in much wider fields than we at first realized. The chief workers in many of our churches will be found to be the boys and girls who received their initial impulse from the Unitarian preacher in their college town.

Miss Bartlett reported that the Michigan Conference was doing little. Upon being requested to say something concerning her own work in Kalamazoo, she told of the kindergarten, which for the past three months had an average attendance of fifty-eight. This school is free to all who cannot afford to pay, and most of those who send to it cannot. The expense of running it has been $1,000, which has been raised by subscription. The Frederick Douglass Club, a colored people's society, meets in Miss Bartlett's church every Thursday evening. It has between thirty and forty members.

A paper was read by Rev. F. W. N. Hugenholz on "Social Injustice as a Source of Atheism and Religious Indifference." He had come in contact with some of the Pullman strikers, and cited them as illustrations of the attitude of wage-workers to the Church: it was one either of indifference or of bitterness. He cited also the Trinity Church tenement-house case as one of which every labor organization had been informed. Such inhumanity made the Church a hissing and a by-word among laborers. Mr. Hugenholz found the cure for these evils in two things,—the single tax theory and a bimetallic monetary standard.

Rev. William R. Lord of St. Paul, in discussing the paper, said that social injustice is itself only a manifestation of atheism. The people who are responsible for this injustice are in so far atheistic. He remarked that the preaching of to-day is intensely ethical, and men are thus made more conscious than ever of the discrepancy between living and preaching. The reason why churches are filled with women is that the preaching is so ethical that the men cannot stand it. Mr. Lord referred to the Standard Oil Company as a representative of the gigantic frauds of the age. This organization crushes the lives out of lesser dealers without the least compunction. It bleeds the body politic at every place where its keen knife can find an entrance; and then, as a salve to its conscience, it tosses a university to one city and a hospital to another. And the leading directors of this institution are members of a prominent church. Here, then, lie the roots of atheism; and we need the courage to tell these plain truths, even though the president of the Standard Oil Company sits in one of the pews and contributes largely to the church. He felt that the land question and the money question were economic rather than ethical, and could not, therefore, well find a place in the pulpit.

The writer is unable to report Rev. C. F. Elliott's address on "The Bitter Heroism of Science," as he heard it only in part.

The evening service was unique, in that the ministers were permitted to hear from the laity.

The paper on "Thought and Form," by Mrs. Anna L. Parker of Quincy, Ill., was a thoughtful presentation of the uses of symbolism in literature. She spoke first of the great cathedral age, in which form was made to symbolize thought. In Dante, the great master of symbolism, thought was presented under the guise of form. His Beatrice, representing at first his youthful longing for celestial things, comes at last, in the Divine Comedy, to represent the thought of the soul's relation to God. So inherent is this symbolism in the race itself that the myths of the world are nearly all symbolic. The writer found the story of the "fall" in Genesis and the poem of Job both illustrations of symbolism. Much of this same symbolism is to be found in early Christianity. In modern literature the Faust legend, with its symbolic meaning, has found various interpretations. We find in it the cry of the individual for freedom from ecclesiastical tyranny. It is the herald of the Reformation. In Goethe's "Faust" the symbolism becomes entirely spiritual, dealing with spiritual conflicts of the inner life. And now this symbolism has reached the literature of our own day. Ibsen and Maeterlinck were cited as examples of this tendency. Maeterlinck's "The Blind" was alluded to as one of the most vivid pictures, either in art or literature, of the helplessness and spiritual blindness of the Church. Thus, reading the literature of the present in the light of the past, we discern in the present religious and social unrest not omens of decay, but promises of life; for it is thought struggling for larger, truer expression.

Mr. E. D. Coxe of Rogers Park followed with a paper on "Beauty in Nature in Relation to Man," the subtlety and appreciation of which reminded one of Millet's letters. Before writing it, one would think he must have prepared himself, as Corot used to do for his painting, by praying that he might see the world with the eyes of a child. For him, as for all those who have true insight, the world is beautiful because it is the utterance of divine thought,—is the garment of God.

The great meeting of the conference, and one which promises to be historic, was held on Thursday morning. The church was reasonably filled at ten o'clock; and, when the names of the delegates were called, seventy-nine were present. Western Conference people know that this is an unusually large delegation. The business of the morning was the consideration of the report of the Conference Committee on the relation of the Western Unitarian Conference to the State conferences, and to the American Unitarian Association, and to the American Congress of Liberal Religious Societies. Mr. Judy, as chairman of that committee, after stating that the report had been submitted to the full Board of the Western Unitarian Conference, and had there been unanimously indorsed, and that the representatives of the American Unitarian Association had likewise given their personal assent to it, read the following resolution:—

Resolved, First, that each of the various State or district Unitarian conferences within the limits of the Western Unitarian Conference shall be invited to nominate triennially one member of its board to serve for three years, or until a successor is chosen in the same way, as a director of the Western Unitarian Conference. The representatives so nominated, when elected by the Western Unitarian Conference, shall, together with the president and secretary of the conference, constitute the Missionary Council, a Standing Committee of the board of directors of the Western Unitarian Conference, whose duty shall be to assist and advise the secretary of the conference in all matters pertaining to missionary work.

Resolved, Second, that it is part of this plan of co-operation that, when the Missionary Council has been constituted, it shall become the agent and adviser of the American Unitarian Association within the limits of the Western Unitarian Conference, and that it shall also have the power of submitting annually to the Nominating Committee of the American Unitarian Association the names of those persons whom it would like to have as representatives of the West upon the American Unitarian Association Board.

After the reading of the report relative to the Liberal Congress the foregoing portion was taken up; and, after a word of commendation from F. L. Hosmer, emphasizing the unanimity of the board of directors in relation to it, the report was unanimously adopted, and was followed by a hearty clapping of hands. The report relative to the relation of the Western Conference to the Liberal Congress was again read, as follows:—

In view of the resolution of last session, which reads, "Resolved, That we recognize the approaching Congress of Liberal Religious Societies as an effort toward the union of the liberal forces for which we have the heartiest sympathy, that we regard it as in line with tendencies which this conference has long cherished, that we will entertain any proposition which may be made by the Congress suggesting a plan of union among liberal bodies which shall secure closer co-operation without materially disturbing existing organizations," and in response to the invitation of the Liberal Congress to send delegates to its meeting in 1895, therefore, be it resolved:

1. That we heartily avail ourselves of the privilege of sending these delegates to the next annual meeting of the Congress, to take part in its deliberations; and

2. That the board of directors of this conference be instructed to enter heartily into any negotiations looking toward the establishment of a common headquarters in Chicago for the various liberal religious societies and the organizations that represent them.

3. That the conference recommends that the board co-operate with the officers of the Liberal Congress in all ways that are conducive to the common interests of the two bodies.

Mr. West of Chicago asked to have that part of the resolution which relates to the establishment of headquarters reread, and wished to know whether the board was positively instructed to establish such headquarters, or was so instructed if they deemed it expedient. The section was reread, and the president said he would put the latter interpretation upon the section. Mr. West said that, with such an interpretation, he had no objection to it. The resolution, as a whole, was then unanimously adopted; and applause followed.

Mr. Hosmer made a brief statement concerning the deficit, saying that until last year no deficit had ever been carried over. The amount was now $2,000, and he felt it to be our duty to do as much as possible toward raising that amount. In something less than half an hour the whole sum was raised, and the conference was ready for the addresses by Messrs. Brown and Savage which they had been promised the previous night. It has been my privilege to note at various conferences that there is nothing else which so consecrates and hallows a service as a subscription such as this, which calls for genuine sacrifice. It did not fail in this case; and, when Rev. Howard N. Brown of Boston rose to speak, it was to a set of people already full of the spirit. After indorsing most cordially the work of the morning, he closed by suggesting that the time had come for us to talk and think more of religion and less of the philosophy of religion.

Mr. Savage congratulated the conference upon the action taken. He said that now Grindall Reynolds has gone from among us he wished to bear witness to the value of his work and the catholicity of his spirit. When he was nominated for the office of secretary of the American Unitarian Association, Mr. Savage opposed his election, believing he was too conservative a man. But he had been mistaken in his estimate, for during the whole term of Mr. Reynolds's service he did not know of a single instance in which the question of radicalism or conservatism had been considered in granting funds for any church's support. This gave him an opportunity to say that he believed in a Unitarianism which was broad both ways. So interpreted, the name "Unitarian" stood for the broadest, freest, grandest religion he had ever found. The name itself, whatever it has stood for in the past, now stands for the unity of the universe and of religion. For, though there have been and are many religions, there is but one religion. As the name implies unity, so the spirit of the denomination is aiming to find and rest in this central faith. Religious liberty, as such, was absolutely valueless except as it furnishes an opportunity to seek and find religion as a vital reality. Liberty we must have; but it is a means, and not an end. The speaker closed with a strong and tender plea for a more positive and spiritual type of Unitarianism,—a plea which touched us all.

Mr. George H. Ellis of Boston then asked the privilege of the floor. He stated that he was in most hearty sympathy with the action taken, but wished now to call the attention of the conference to a grave responsibility which that action entailed. The conference must now be made representative for all the States included in its limits. Only about one-third of the churches within these limits were represented in the present gathering. Unless it could be shown that the Western Conference is a representative body, the American Unitarian Association would not be likely to intrust it with its work. He hoped, therefore, that steps would be taken to meet this common-sense objection, that the plan proposed might be carried out.

Mr. Hosmer, in a few words of simple and heartfelt gratitude, carried our thoughts all upward to Him in whom the eternal harmonies abide; and, with a silent Amen in all our hearts, the morning session closed.

The writer regrets that he is unable to report Rev. George A. Thayer's scholarly paper on "Our Free Congregational Policy"; but he heard it only in part.

The Nominating Committee submitted the name of Hon. D. L. Shorey for president, and hearty applause followed his unanimous election. The secretary, Mr. Gould, had submitted a communication to the president, declining to be a candidate for reelection. His reason for declining was that the action of the morning looking to the union of the East and West, an action in which he heartily rejoiced, and which he had labored to make possible, would bring duties to the secretary which he felt some one else would better assume. For he feared that, without meaning to do so, some of his utterances in the past had created antagonisms which might stand in the way of one who would have so large a part in carrying out the proposed union as the secretary. In the light of this communication the Business Committee advised that the office of secretary should be left vacant, to be filled by the board of directors of the conference.

Rev. C. F. Elliott of Hinsdale moved to amend the report of the committee by striking out the advisory clause relating to the secretaryship, and substituting therefor the name of A. W. Gould for secretary. Rev. Jenkin L. Jones seconded the amendment, saying that he thought the present exigencies of the conference demanded a secretary. He thought further that the same sensitiveness which had led Mr. Gould to decline renomination on this occasion would lead him to resign his place whenever he felt that the good of the cause demanded it. Should he so fail, Mr. Jones would not hesitate to remind him of his duty. Mr. Effinger felt that the opinion of the Business Committee should be respected. They had carefully canvassed the field. He moved that the amendment be laid upon the table. This motion, not being debatable, was withdrawn; and Mr. Harvey moved that the amendment be amended to make the term of Mr. Gould's service six months, thus leaving the directors free at the time of the adoption of the new régime to elect the person whom they may then think best. This amendment to the amendment was lost, and the original amendment carried, and Mr. Gould declared elected, no votes, I believe, being cast against him.

The following-named persons were elected directors for the term of three years: J. R. Effinger, A. W. Gould, F. L. Hosmer, J. L. Jones, Mrs. C. P. Woolley.

The following resolution was presented by the Business Committee:—

Whereas, in the death of S. S. Hunting we have lost a fellow-minister who gave most generously to our cause, both of his services and his means; who stood at all times for the broadest fellowship and the most kindly interpretations; who in social reforms was instant and faithful; who combined a ready appreciation of all the larger intellectual movements of the times with a deep and sincere devotion; and who, as a friend and a man, was ever kind, true, and brave,—therefore be it

Resolved, That we hereby record our sense of deep loss in his death, and also our sincere thankfulness for the good which he has left as his memorial in the world.

A few feeling words to Mr. Hunting's memory were spoken by Jenkin L. Jones, Miss Hultin, and Mr. Elliott; and, by a rising vote, the above resolution was adopted.

A resolution regretting the illness of the treasurer, Mr. William McFadon, and extending thanks for his past services, was passed.

A resolution thanking the Third Church for its generous and beautiful hospitality was heartily indorsed.

This report would be incomplete, did I not add that the pleasure which all the delegates experienced at this conference was greatly enhanced by the thoughtfulness on their behalf exhibited by the Third Church and its minister. The music of the conference, though always simple, was very beautiful. All I need say of the last social evening is that it was one of uninterrupted pleasure, passing not seldom into delight. We trust that many of our conferences may be closed in this happy manner.

LEON A. HARVEY.

WOMEN'S WESTERN CONFERENCE.

The fourteenth annual session of the Women's Western Conference preceded that of the conference proper, being held on Tuesday afternoon. The president, Rev. Ida C. Hultin, said in her annual address that the conference had been organized for a specific purpose,—that of stimulating work among women. The results of such work, however, should be to do away with any necessity for separating the work of women from that of men. The Western Conference had always welcomed women, and the only question now was whether women would be ready to accept the opportunity. If so, the president hinted that the work of the Women's Western Conference was practically done. No definite missionary work for the year could be reported, save that the Post-office Mission work had been kept up.

Owing to the failure of those appointed on the programme for the afternoon, the paper and the report of the secretary had to be omitted. On motion, the business of the conference was then taken up. After considerable discussion the following resolution was adopted:—

Whereas the withdrawal of a certain number of the members of this conference from its active support, that they might be better able to work for other organizations, and the growing conviction on the part of another element in our constituency that the principle of separate women's organizations in Western Unitarian activities is false, together with the general monetary stringency of the times, renders it impracticable for this conference to further prosecute its work, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the activities be suspended, and that its members be urged to direct their energy and contributions to the maintaining of the same work through the instrumentalities of the Western Unitarian Conference, to help which we came into being, with which we have always worked, and in the interest of which we now suspend our separate activities.

Resolved, That the officers of the conference be instructed to solicit continued support of its members until all incurred obligations are met, further action to be determined by the developments of the future.

Resolved, further, That, in view of the above circumstances, the present board of officers be continued, with full power to fill vacancies.

In accordance with the spirit of the foregoing resolution, steps were at once taken to raise the deficit of $300 reported by the treasurer; and $200 of that amount was promptly raised.

Spiritual Life.

Meditate daily on the things of eternity, and by the grace of God do something daily which thou wouldst wish to have done when the day of judgment comes.—Dr. Pusey.

You might entertain divine and heavenly thoughts even while about your earthly employments and refreshments, but this is little known and little sought after.—Archbishop Leighton.

The soul's sight of divinity encompassing it is the one perfect and immovable ground of religious life. For comfort, for help, for hope, faith, trust, for depth of moral convictions, for understanding of life, we need only the soul and God. The beholding of other souls is great and life-giving: we drink in their beauty, loftiness, sacrifices, glory. But we return into our own soul as the holy place wherein we can hear God speak for ourselves.—James Vila Blake.

All profound natural beauty is a veiled form and faint disguise: the spiritually-minded never fail to make the right meaning out of it. Many sounds leave an unfinished overture: many fragrances of the wood or the sea, the pure breezes, and the mountain herbs, stir up the depths in us. In such sense-perceptions we are aware of something that needs filling up. There is a feeling of sore inadequacy, when it cannot be supplied. Faith supplies it, and calls it the Presence of God.—Mozoomdar.

Man sees to a certain point, and there his eyesight breaks down. But, when his eyesight breaks down, there presses upon him something, whether he likes it or not, a perception of the unlimited, or infinite. It may be said this is not perception, in the ordinary sense of the word. No more it is, but still less is it mere reasoning. We know not what it is; but we know that it is, and we know it because we feel it and are brought in contact with it. If it is too bold to say that man actually sees the Invisible, let us say he suffers from the invisible.—Max Müller.

Literature.

"THE MESSIAH OF THE APOSTLES."*

The third volume of the series in which Dr. Briggs is treating the development of the Messianic Idea is primarily devoted to a study of the Messianic elements of the New Testament outside of the Gospels; yet it is not until the second chapter that the main topic of the work is entered upon, Chapter I. being devoted to a consideration of the "Messianic Idea of the Judaism of the New Testament Times." This chapter serves the valuable purpose of connecting the present discussion with those which have preceded. The book of Jubilees, the Assumption of Moses, the familiar Apocryphal book of Baruch and the recently recovered Apocalypse of Baruch, the Apocalypse of Ezra, the fourth book of the Sibylline Oracles, and the Shema and Shemoneh Esre of the Jewish liturgy are carefully analyzed, and the various characteristics of their Messianic teaching clearly set forth. Foot-notes give the latest views concerning the date and origin of each of these books, besides containing other valuable critical material.

In Chapter II. the forms of Messianic doctrine current among Jewish Christians are gathered from the book of Acts and the Epistles of Peter, Jude, and James, but mainly from the two Epistles ascribed to Peter. The most striking of the new elements derived from these writings have relation to the expected near-coming of the great world-conflagration and the day of judgment.

Under the category of "The Messiah of the Earliest Paulinism" are brought together the meagre testimonies of Acts concerning the faith of Stephen and Philip, what the same book has to tell of the Christology of Paul and the Messianic teachings of the two Epistles to the Thessalonians. The coming of the "Man of Sin," as well as of the Messiah, is declared to be still in the possibly remote future.

Notwithstanding the general fulness of the treatment of the two Epistles to the Corinthians, some of the positions taken stand in need of further elaboration in order to make us quite sure of the author's intention. The nearest approach to a distinct statement of what is supposed to be the soteriology of the apostle is found in the following passage and its context: "Christ died a physical death, and suffered for the sin of the world. All who died in him were therefore relieved from that death as a penalty. Accordingly, they no more suffer the penalty of death. Death ceases to be a penalty by the death of Christ." Do these words contain the doctrine of Paul or the theory of his interpreter? If we understand their implication, it is this: that, although the physical death entailed upon all men as a penalty for the sin of Adam reproduced in them still remains, notwithstanding that the sin of which death was the appointed penalty has been taken away through the sacrifice of Christ, this death is henceforth a blessing, and not a curse, because leading to a glorious resurrection. The universalism of these Epistles seems to us to be rather meagrely treated.

Dr. Everett's interpretation of Gal. iii. 7-14 appears to Dr. Briggs to be "not in accord with the facts of the case as to the usage of terms in the writings of Paul." On the other hand, he rejects the revisers' rendering of Romans ix. 5, placing himself on the side of Dr. Ezra Abbot's, to whose notable essay on this passage he refers, and deciding for the rendering, "He who is over all, God, be blessed forever."

An examination of the Epistles of the imprisonment—namely, Philippians, Ephesians, and Colossians—brings to light a marked advance in the Christology of the apostle in the four years succeeding the writing of his letter to the Romans. In Philippians it is the doctrine of the kenosis, or humiliation of Jesus in condescending to take upon himself a human form and submit to the death of the cross, which, because of its originality, specially holds the attention. In Ephesians are found more numerous but less striking developments of the Messianic idea. The Epistle to the Colossians is rich in Christological material, but its view is almost entirely limited to Christ considered as "the image of the invisible God" and as "the mystery of God."

With regard to the Christology of the Pastoral Epistles it will suffice to give the statement of Prof. Briggs, that it "is not without development, although it is much less prominent than in any one of the Christological Epistles." In his treatment of Titus ii. 13 he lends the weight of his authority to the change proposed by the American Committee of Revision, which would make the readings of the text and the margin of the revised version change places, so that the common reader, who seldom, if ever, looks at the margin, would find "the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ," and not "our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The Epistle to the Hebrews is strikingly Messianic. Notwithstanding its points of likeness to the later Pauline Epistles, it advances far beyond these in its Messianic doctrine. Yet in one sense its unknown author is more conservative than Paul. The latter utterly discards the Levitical law, while the former builds upon it a new temple, with Jesus as high priest, "after the order of Melchizedek."

A satisfactory study of the Messianic ideas of the Apocalypse is, at the present day, impossible without a previous determination of the principal questions pertaining to its date and literary form. Since critical opinion with regard to the composition of his book is rapidly undergoing transformation, and hardly as yet gives signs of permanently crystallizing about any one hypothesis, it is not to be expected that much certainty can attach to the results supposed to be already arrived at by adventurous Dutch and German scholars. Nevertheless, if the new thought concerning the Apocalypse is not as yet firmly established, it is pretty certain that the old Apocalyptic learning is now of very little value. Dr. Briggs has finally come to accept the documentary theory of the composition of the Apocalypse, which but a few years since he felt under the necessity of rejecting. Under these circumstances he could hardly do otherwise than give some considerable space in the present work to a careful study of the structure of the book in accordance with the critical views now held by him. The reader will not regret this departure from the general plan of the work, and is even likely to enjoy the twenty-five pages of "Higher Criticism" quite as much as the one hundred and fifty subsequent pages of analysis of the contents of the book, with which we cannot here undertake to deal.

The fullest development of Messianic doctrine in the New Testament is found in the Epistles ascribed to John and the apostolic portions of the Fourth Gospel; that is, the Prologue and iii. 16-21. Dr. Briggs's development of the teaching of the Prologue lacks nothing in impartiality and thoroughness. He recognizes sufficiently the dependence of the author upon Philo, while emphasizing the differences between the Alexandrian-Jewish and the Christian conception of the divine Logos. We cannot, however, think that any rendering and interpretation of i. 1 which does not fully recognize the distinction between the Divine Name, with the article and without, does justice to the thought of the writer. In this respect Dr. Briggs does not quite satisfy us, although making a nearer approach to a clear statement of the quasi-ditheism of the passage than we have ever before noticed in any Trinitarian author.

The concluding chapter of the work summarizes the results arrived at in the preceding pages, following, however, a different order, so as to gain the advantage of a new point of view. Instead of tracing the sequence of the development of Messianic ideas in the apostolic times, everything is grouped about the New Testament representation of Jesus as pre-existent, as the crucified human Messiah, and as the future judge, or "his pre-existence and his post-existence as well as his existence in this world."

Dr. Briggs is to be congratulated on having brought to such a successful termination this truly remarkable series of volumes on one of the most important themes of Biblical study. The Christology of the New Testament is likely to wait long for a more competent and more successful expositor.

JIM OF HELLAS. Boston: Estes & Lauriat.—A sufficient recommendation of this little book is the name of Laura E. Richards on the title-page. Jim of Hellas is the hulk of an old Greek sailor run aground in a New England village. For a breach of the common law he is subjected to hard labor,—not so very hard,—putting about the village, doing odds and ends. He makes his penance so efficient when he comes to work for Miss Palmyra Henshaw—it was her hen-roost that he had decimated—that he engages the affections of the lady; and at the end of the story we hear a sound of marriage-bells. They ring double at the end of the next story, "The Troubling of Bethesda Pool." Now, Bethesda Pool was a maiden lady, who kept an inn, and whose house was her castle, not to be thrown open incontinently to any one who came along. But there came a day when she gave a party in the big parlor of the inn, waking the echoes of the twinkling feet which had danced there long ago. So fought she not as one who beateeth the air. The party was a stratagem; and it succeeded. Moreover, it had indirect effects that she did not anticipate, but for which she was not ungrateful.

GOD'S PARABLE, AND OTHER POEMS. By Susanna Massey. G. P. Putnam's Sons. The democracy of poetic talent is one of the most interesting and pathetic features of our time. There are scores and hundreds of women who write better verses now than Mrs. Sigourney ever wrote; but where she was accounted a poet of genius, and had many readers, these are, at best, allowed a certain talent, and their readers are but few. The verses in this book are many of them more than tolerable, some of them are Biography and History.

Letters of Celia Thaxter.

Edited by A. F. and R. L. With four portraits. Handsomely printed on the best paper, and carefully bound, 12mo, $1.50.

A book of singular literary and personal charm, produced in a unique and exceedingly attractive style.

Letters of Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

Edited by ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE. With 16 portraits and other illustrations. 2 vols. 8vo, gilt top, $6.00.

These letters, with comparatively few exceptions, have never before been published. They date from 1785 to 1833; are addressed to Mrs. Coleridge, Southey, Wordsworth, Lamb, John Murray, and many others; they throw much new light on Coleridge's life, character, career, and friendships; and the intimate and personal note running through them gives them a peculiar interest.

John Greenleaf Whittier.

Life and Letters. By SAMUEL T. PICKARD. With 7 portraits and views. Second edition. 2 vols., crown 8vo, gilt top, $4.00.

"A model of biography and of careful editing of the papers left by the greatest of New England poets, the poet who far beyond any other interpreted the New England thought, life, and conscience of his time."—Boston Advertiser.

George William Curtis.

By EDWARD CARY. With a portrait. Third edition. 16mo, $1.25.

"A truly admirable book. Those who knew Mr. Curtis best and loved him most will best appreciate its quality."—J. W. C., in Christian Register.

Lucy Larcom.

Life, Letters and Diary. By Rev. DANIEL D. ADDISON. With fine new portrait. Third edition. 16mo, $1.25.

"The book is deeply interesting; and her correspondence with Whittier, Holmes, Longfellow, Phillips Brooks, and other eminent persons is delightful reading."—Portland Press.

Familiar Letters of Thoreau.

Edited with an introduction and notes by FRANK B. SANBORN. With a full index. Second edition. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

"This volume is an admirable supplement to the complete edition of Thoreau's writings. . . . As an addition to his biography, this work is a revelation which all his friends will greatly prize."—The Outlook, New York.

Frances Power Cobbe.

Her Autobiography. With a portrait and a picture of her home. Second edition. 2 vols., crown 8vo, gilt top, $4.00.

"It is distinctly charming as it is exceptional to come upon a writer who has lived a long life, and joyfully acknowledges that it has been a happy one. Miss Frances Power Cobbe not only belongs to this class, but, so far as any recent biographer is concerned, may be placed at the head of it."—London Telegraph.

Maria Edgeworth.

Life and Letters. By A. J. C. HARE. With a portrait and view of her home. 2 vols., crown 8vo, gilt top, $4.00.

"One of the most vivacious series of letters that have appeared for some time past."—Morning Post, London.

"Merely to read her letters is to tidy up one's mind."—The Speaker, London.

Sir Walter Scott.

Familiar Letters. With a steel portrait of Scott and an Autographic plan of Abbotsford. Second edition. 2 vols., 8vo, gilt top, $6.00.

"The magic that clings to everything that came from the pen of the Great Unknown lies over them, and the public of to-day will read them as eagerly as the public of seventy years since read the 'Tales of my Landlord.'"—Pall Mall Gazette.

The First Napoleon.

By JOHN C. ROPES. With maps and appendices. New edition, with a new preface and a rare portrait of Napoleon. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $2.00.

A book of remarkable interest in its treatment of Napoleon's political and military career, which Mr. Ropes is peculiarly competent to discuss.

Letters of Asa Gray.

Edited by JANE LORING GRAY. With portraits and other illustrations. 2 vols., crown 8vo, gilt top, $4.00.

"Dr. Gray was an unusually attractive man, and his circle of friends included many of the men and women best worth knowing in Europe as well as at home."—The Congregationalist, Boston.

The Mississippi Basin.

The Struggle in America between England and France. 1697-1763. With full Cartographical Illustrations from Contemporary Sources. By JUSTIN WINSOR, author of "Cartier to Frontenac," "Christopher Columbus," etc. 8vo, gilt top, $4.00.

This volume takes up the story of American exploration where Dr. Winsor left it in his "Cartier to Frontenac." It traces the counter-movements of the English and French, in adventure, trade, and war, for the possession of the Great Valley.

Cartier to Frontenac.

A study of Geographical Discovery in the interior of North America in its Historical Relations, 1534-1700. With full cartographical illustrations from contemporary sources. By JUSTIN WINSOR, editor of "Narrative and Critical History of America." 8vo, $4.00.

"The wondrous story has been told by Parkman in half a dozen volumes with a vividness and vivacity not likely to be surpassed, and which have given it a wide popularity. It remained a desideratum to knit together the scattered sketches into one whole body. This Mr. Winsor has done, and that admirably."—The Nation, New York.

Important New Publications

My Early Travels and Adventures

In America and Asia. By HENRY M. STANLEY. With maps and portraits. 2 vols., 12mo, $3.00.

Mr. Stanley's new work relates his experiences and adventures during his brilliant career as a newspaper correspondent from 1866 to 1870. Painting in vivid yet truthful colors the stirring scenes of pioneer, Indian, military, and mining life on the plains and in the mountains of the far West; describing with power and picturesqueness the opening of the Suez Canal, a voyage up the Nile, and the explorations in Palestine; and narrating, with a sympathetic appreciation of Oriental life, the incidents and scenes of a journey to the Caspian Sea and through Persia—the work has an abiding historical and pictorial interest. Its autobiographic value is equally remarkable.

Outre Mer

Impressions of America. By PAUL BOURGET. Translated from the French. 12mo, $1.75.

"Go with him through the United States in this volume, and you will feel better acquainted with your own country. He is a close observer, a good worker, has great descriptive talent; add to this a graceful style, a vein of wit, a sparkle of satire."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

The Peoples and Politics of the Far East

Travels and Studies in the British, French, Spanish, and Portuguese colonies, Siberia, China, Japan, Korea, Siam, and Malaya. By HENRY NORMAN. With 60 illustrations and 4 maps. 8vo, $4.00.

"Vivid in description, shrewd in observation, painstaking in investigation, pleasant in tone and temper, and full of lively impressions of travel. The whole volume is thoroughly readable, and constitutes a valuable and timely contribution to the study of contemporary life and politics in the East."—London Times.

Churches and Castles of Mediæval France

By WALTER CRANSTON LARNED. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

"A beautiful volume. It is the record of the impressions of the great monuments of France made upon a traveler of rare and cultivated taste. A remarkably interesting book."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

How to Know the Wild Flowers

By Mrs. WILLIAM STARR DANA. New edition, revised and enlarged. With 152 illustrations by Marion Satterlee. 12mo, $1.75, net.

This new edition of Mrs. Dana's popular book, which is printed from new plates throughout, contains fifty-two new illustrations; also including in the text descriptions of about fifty additional flowers, while many of the old descriptions have been rewritten or amplified—thus greatly increasing the value and usefulness of the book.

"I am delighted with it. . . . It is so exactly the kind of book needed for outdoor folks who live in the country but know little of systematic botany, that it is a wonder no one has written it before."—Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

English Seamen in the Sixteenth Century

By JAMES A. FROUDE. 8vo, $1.75.

"We need not say that Mr. Froude's account of the seamen is picturesque and inspiring. His descriptive powers are superb, and he has drawn the mariners of England with a master hand."—Church Standard.

Lotos-Time in Japan

By HENRY T. FINCK, author of "The Pacific Coast Scenic Tour." Illustrated. Crown 8vo, $1.75.

"Admirable realistic sketches, from life and nature, of every-day scenes and experiences in the Japan of to-day. One of the most interesting books on Japan ever issued. It is handsomely illustrated, and will hold the attention from title-page to finish."—Boston Commercial Bulletin.

truly admirable; but, in the struggle for existence that is going on among the literary products of the time, they will not attain to the survival of the fittest. But, surely, such a sonnet as "Where Love hath been," should find a home in many hearts. The constraint of the sonnet is always helpful to Miss Massey. She runs best in harness.

THE WEB OF LIFE. By Augusta Cooper Bristol. Buffalo: Charles Wells Moulton. This is a volume of poems of more earnest strain, and the pieces are so few that they suggest a certain disposition on the part of the writer to give the public only what is best in her portfolio. One feels that here is one who looks into her own heart, and writes. But the expression is not equal to the thought. It suffers from a vocabulary which is too abstract on the one hand and too decorative on the other,—too florid, in the manner of the poetry extemporized at Spiritualist meetings.

A QUIANT SPINSTER. By Frances E. Russell. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—This is a very bright and pleasant little story. The indications of Miss Prissie's character are such as to amply justify the title of the book. She is, indeed, "a quaint spinster." The situation in the Spinster's Home, which she establishes with her surprising legacy, reminds us a little of the situation in Mr. Howells's "Undiscovered Country," where we have a Shaker community conspiring in a love affair, as here we have the spinster doing, and with good success.

School Books.

In the Students' Series of Latin Classics Messrs. Leach, Shewell & Sanborn have issued Cicero de Oratore, Book I, by W. B. Owen, Ph.D., Professor of the Latin Language and Literature in Lafayette College.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers publish "Elements of Inductive Logic," by Noah K. Davis, LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Virginia. In preparing the treatise, the need of collegians and of graduate students in the universities is kept in mind. The book is well calculated to assist the processes of thought of those who are studying the inductive sciences.

Miscellaneous.

We have received the "Proceedings of the Bunker Hill Monument Association for 1894," containing the address of the president, Hon. W. Frederic Lincoln. The number of registered visitors to the monument during the year ending May 1, 1894, was 26,470 visitors from the United States and 1,342 from foreign countries.

Messrs. Maynard, Merrill & Co. have issued among their French texts "Le Chant du Cygne," with an appendix and notes. Young pupils will find this series a pleasing and helpful instruction to the French language. This number has been edited by Arthur H. Solial of Chicago. The same firm have also issued among their German texts "Robert Blake" and "Cromwell," zwei ausgewählte Aufsätze von Reinhold Pauli, edited by C. W. S. Corser.

A third edition of "Iola Leroy," by Frances E. W. Harper, is issued by James H. Earle, Boston. This book was noticed in the Register in an earlier edition. Its writer is well known by her efforts for her own race, and as "Superintendent of Colored Work" for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It has been said that no other woman has come so intimately in contact with the colored people of the South as she. Her book is interesting chiefly as a contribution to the race discussion from the point of view of an educated colored woman.

The Magazines.

The North American Review for May contains an article by Cardinal Gibbons on "The Preacher and his Province." He counsels young clergymen to adapt their remarks to the special needs of their hearers, to be moderate in their judgments of men, to quicken their sympathies by intercourse with the people, and to be interested in the social, political, and economic questions affecting the interests of the nation. An article on "Elementary Education," by Hon. William T. Harris, indicates the points of importance in the report of the Committee of Fifteen. Other articles of importance and interest are: "Our Situation as Viewed from Without," by Prof. Goldwin Smith; "Russia and England," by Prof. A. Vambéry; "Diplomacy and the Newspaper," by E. L. Godkin. "The Income Tax" is discussed by Hon. George S. Boutwell and "Plain Speaker." The Japanese Minister at Washington, S. Kurino, writes of "The Future of Japan," and shows how what Japan has done and is doing is the serious work of earnest men, striving for a definite purpose.

Literary Notes.

Prof. Miall's book on "The Natural History of Aquatic Insects," will be published at once by Macmillan & Co. It is intended to assist the naturalist, and especially the young naturalist, in the study of the very interesting insects which abound in our ponds and rivers.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "luck in with wedding-gifts."

[From The New Unity, May 2, 1895.]

The selection we give in another column from "The House Beautiful"—one of Mr. Gannett's uplifting studies which James H. West has just published—was not made because it was the most inspiring word the pamphlet contains. Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on "The dear Togetherness" is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. But this extract was selected simply because it was the shortest that could be made to stand by itself. By sending its publisher fifteen cents our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1835, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

OUR OWN.

BY HENRIETTA R. ELIOT.

[Suggested by motto to "Light Bird on the Wall," in Fröbel's "Mutter und Kose-Lieder."

Some day my child will understand
What true possession is,
And know that, though his hands may hold
The things which he has bought with gold,
They are not, therefore, his.

Not with our hands, but with our minds,
Do we most truly own.
The sunset light upon the sea,
The passing strain of melody,
Are ours, when they are gone!

AUNT LOU'S PUG.

I am Dick Plum, and the adventure I am going to tell you about happened last spring. We had moved down to our country house on the Kitterstix River earlier than usual; and my Aunt Lou Ripley, my cousin Mabel Cornell, and her brother Frank were visiting us. Aunt Lou is a young lady, Mabel is eleven,—almost as old as I am,—and Frank is nine.

We had been in the country about two weeks; and it had rained a good part of the time, so we didn't have our row-boat put in the water. But at last one Saturday morning the weather turned warm; and on his way to the station father told Sam, the coachman, that he could get Tim, the gardener, to help him launch the "Lily," and left permission for me to take Mabel and Frank for the first row of the season. So none of us minded being left behind on the carriage drive which at lunch mother proposed to take with Aunt Lou down to Ocean Pines. They were going to stop for father at train-time, and a seat would have to be saved for him.

Pink was to go, though; but just before the carriage came mother found him with a chicken-bone under the parlor table, and for punishment Aunt Lou took his best blue ribbon off, put on his every-day one, and said he should not have his drive.

"Now, Dick," said mother the last thing, "take good care of Mabel and Frank, remember not to venture near the channel, and be sure to be back by half-past five."

"I'm going to row you to the cutest place," I told my cousins, when we were left standing on the piazza. "I call it the shore channel; but it isn't a bit deep, and mother meant the regular steamboat channel, out in the middle of the river. This other one winds in and out among the sedges about a quarter of a mile below the house, and we can have no end of fun down there."

"O Dick," exclaimed Mabel, "then can't we take Pink with us? He always feels so bad when Aunt Lou scolds him. And I can hold him on my lap, so he won't be in the way."

"Yes, I don't care," I answered; and so the pug was put aboard, and we swept off down the river at a fine rate.

"Just wait, though, till we get into that shore channel!" I exclaimed. "Then you'll see her scoot."

And scoot she did, but it had been so long since I had had anything to do with the river that the real cause of this never struck me till we had got more than two miles from home. Then I suddenly realized that I must have had the tide with me all the way, and that therefore it would be against me going back.

"I must turn around," I said, after looking at my watch. "It's quarter past four now, and we ought to get home before the carriage does."

But I soon discovered that something else besides the tide was going to be against the "Lily" on the return trip, and that was the bottom of the river. That inside channel was now so narrow that I had to get Mabel to help me head the boat the other way. Then I took to rowing again with a will, for I knew I must beat the tide if I wanted to get back in time for dinner.

But at last there came a time when I couldn't get her to move. Bow and stern were both stuck fast; and after Mabel and I had pushed on separate oars, and then united our strength on one, and finally got Frank to help, too, and then couldn't budge the "Lily" either way, I just dropped down on the seat and gave it up.

"But what are we going to do, Dick?" asked Mabel.

"Oh, it isn't the doing of anything that is going to trouble us," I replied, laughing. "It's the seeing how long we can sit still without doing anything. But wait a minute," I added, with a glance at the point where my knickerbockers ended, just below my knees. "Perhaps it isn't too late to try one more 'do.'"

Then, getting Frank to unlace one of my shoes for me, I set to work with all speed at the other; and in less than two minutes I was ready to step overboard.

Ugh! how cold the water was! It almost seemed as if some sharp, steel-pointed instrument had been run up clear through my body. But I ground my teeth together, and began to tug on the "Lily's" painter. Very soon, however, I discovered that my feet had grown warm in a very queer way, and then it seemed impossible to brace myself to pull. The next instant I found out what was the matter. I was sinking into the muddy bottom of the river, which was enough like a quicksand to make me straddle the bow of the boat quick as a wink to keep myself from going down any farther. So that way of getting ourselves out of the fix had to be given up.

"And there's no wading ashore and leaving the 'Lily,' either," I added to myself, as I dangled my legs in the water, trying to get the mud off.

"How long did you say we'd have to stay here, Dick?" inquired Mabel, gravely.

"Why, till the tide goes down and comes up again."

"And how long will that take?" she went on.

"About two hours and a half," I replied.

"O Dick!" exclaimed Mabel, on hearing this. "Then we can't get home in time for dinner."

"Can't you halloo for somebody to come?" suggested Frank.

For answer I pointed to the woods that lined the shore at this point on one side and to the wide stretch of sedge-grass that separated us from the main channel of the river on the other. We were quite cut off from the rest of the world, although we could see plenty of houses half a mile or so away.

Suddenly Mabel burst out with, "O Dick, have you got a pencil and a piece of paper?"

"Here's a stub and the back of a steamboat time-table you can write on," I replied, after rummaging in my pockets.

"Oh, I want you to do the writing!" she exclaimed, as she patted the pug in her lap. "Write a note to your mother, and send it by Pink."

"By Pink?" I cried in rather a disgusted voice. "Why, I never heard of a pug being taught to fetch and carry."

"But let me tell you, Dick," interrupted Mabel. "Don't you remember the other afternoon when it cleared off for a while, and Aunt Lou and I took Pink and walked along the shore down this way, looking for a certain kind of sea-weed? Well, I'm certain we came as far as this. So don't you think Pink will find his way back to the house by scent if we should put him ashore here?"

"We'll try it, anyway," I answered. "Now what shall I say?" And I began to write:—

"Aground in Shore Channel, Half a Mile below the House.

"Dear Mother,"—

"I don't care," replied my cousin. "Only be sure and ask them to send a shawl for me."

"And something to eat," put in Frank, quickly.

Then I went on:—

"Don't worry. We are not drowned, but have got to stay here till about eight o'clock, when the tide comes up. Please send us some sandwiches and a shawl, and don't be frightened."

*"Your affectionate son,
"DICK PLUM."*

Mabel said that would do, and I tied it very carefully to Pink's second-best ribbon with a piece of string I had. Then I picked the pug up, and was just going to drop him overboard, when Mabel caught me by the arm.

"O Dick, stop! He'll sink in the mud, and—and the note'll get all wet."

This last was certainly to be avoided, so I put the trembling dog down in the bottom of the boat, and meekly inquired how I was going to get him ashore.

"I—I forgot all about that part of it," returned Mabel.

I looked at the sedgy bank, not three yards from the "Lily's" gunwale, and then proposed building a bridge with the oars. Frank helped me to do this; but, even after we had put the name-board over the handle part of the oars, the pug would not trust himself on it.

It was now nearly six o'clock, and really chilly; and I could imagine mother walking up and down our dock, thinking all sorts of terrible things had happened to us.

"Mabel," I exclaimed, "Pink doesn't want to leave you. You must be cross to him. Give him a slap, and say, 'Go home, sir!'"

"But, Dick," she objected, "just think how cruel that would be, when Pink is going to do so much for us!"

"I can't help it," I persisted. "You can make it all up to him afterward by stuffing him with chop bones all day long, if you like. But don't you see this is a case where little things must suffer for the good of great ones?"

Mabel seemed to understand what I meant; and, having put both paws on the bridge, shut her eyes, and, crying, "Naughty Pink! Go home, sir!" gave him two or three light taps on the head.

I was afraid they weren't heavy enough; but the pug seemed to think differently, and, giving a sudden spring, scudded across the oars with a rush that sent the name-board splashing into the water.

"Oh, Pink's tumbled overboard!" screamed Mabel.

"Hush!" I commanded. "Don't call him back. He's off splendidly now."

And he was. After he had got ashore, Pink kept straight on toward the house; and pretty soon we couldn't see him any more.

"Do you think he has got there yet, Dick?" Mabel would keep asking, while Frank wanted to know more than once if I was sure the note had been tied on tight.

At last it got to be half-past six, and I just had discovered that the tide had turned, when Frank suddenly jumped up on the seat and cried, "Here they come!"

I hopped on to the bow-locker, and began to wave my cap and pocket-handkerchief, as I made out the forms of five people hurrying along the shore toward us. Mabel sprang up, too, and began to cry, "Here we are! here we are!" in a succession of shrieks.

In about three minutes I was able to make out Sam and Tim ahead, one with a boat-hook over his shoulder, and the other with a coil of clothes-line around his arm; and behind them was father carrying a basket and helping mother through the tall sedge-grass, and then came Aunt Lou with a shawl and Pink capering along at her heels.

"Three cheers for the pug!" cried Frank, jumping about in a way that would certainly have toppled some of us overboard, had not the boat been so firmly settled.

You see he thought our troubles were all over now. So did Mabel; for she began to laugh at the funny look that relief procession had, as it came marching along the shore, picking its way around the marshy spots in the sedge. But I had my doubts all the time.

I kept them to myself, though; and, when they all came up and stood there on the bank about ten feet away from us, I said I was awfully glad to see them, and asked if they had found out where we were by the note Pink had carried.

"Oh, yes," exclaimed Aunt Lou, catching the pug up in her arms, and then letting him drop quickly when she found how muddy his feet were. "Wasn't it cute of him? He came pasting up to the dock, where we all stood watching, half wild to know what had become of you, children; and I saw that bit of paper tied to his ribbon the first thing. And now I've forgiven him for being naughty this afternoon; for, if it hadn't been for him, you might have had to stay here till dark night."

But, Pink or no Pink, it seemed as if we would have to stay where we were till dark, after all; for, although the boat-hook, the coil of clothes-line, and Sam, Tim, and father were all combined in one tremendous effort, not an inch could they budge the "Lily" out of the mud.

Father had already flung the shawl to us; but it had gone too far, and landed just out of reach among the sedge-grass on the other side. Now, after they had failed to move the boat, Tim took off his boots, and, declaring that "the chiller shouldn't starve for their suppers" if he could help it, caught up the basket, and, in spite of my warnings, started to wade out to us with it.

But two steps were enough for him. Feeling himself sinking, he dropped the basket, and stretched out both hands toward Sam with the cry: "Och, murder! It's the haythen Chinees are afther draggin' me down to thim!"

And there was the basket of provisions floating off on what little water there was, and everybody so excited over Tim that nobody thought to try to fish it out with the boat-hook till it was too late.

I laughed. I couldn't help it, though I was so hungry; and I laugh now whenever I think of how father, mother, Aunt Lou, Sam, Tim, and the pug stood there on the bank for the next half-hour, looking at us, and we at them. To be sure, it was worth something to have their company; but then it seemed so aggravating, after we had gone to all that trouble of getting Pink off with the note, not to have the successful delivery of it do us one bit of practical good. For it didn't; and we never got a thing to eat till the tide came in and floated us off in time for an eight o'clock dinner at home.—Harper's Young People.

CHARLEY'S DAM.

From the time that he came into the world Charley Hulburt was a "water baby." Given a basin of water, a tin can full of sand, and a few stones, he would amuse himself for hours making miniature dams and bridges. His mother called him her "little engineer" as she watched his persevering fingers.

So it happened that, as he grew older, she chose for their summer home a quiet village among the mountains, through which ran a shallow brook, that the proclivities of her boy might have full scope.

The stream was just back of their barn, dancing and rippling over the stones with a merry song of welcome to its new play-fellow; for Charley had taken to the water immediately after breakfast on the day following his arrival, and, when his mother came to join him an hour later, she found him bare-legged, with trousers rolled above his knees, paddling far down the bed of the brook.

"Hullo, mumsey!" was his shout when he saw her. "I've found a bully place for a dam. Come on in, and help me build it!"

Nothing loath, the young mother followed his example. Leaving shoes and stockings on the bank, she kilted up her skirts, and waded down to where he had begun to lay the foundations of the dam. Her stronger hands filled in the chinks with mud and sand, packing them firmly, while Charley brought the stones and placed them in position.

All day they worked like beavers, pausing only when the noon hour came, to sit on the bank and eat their luncheon.

As the sun was setting, and they heard in the distance the lowing of the cows at milking-time, the last stone was laid, the last handful of dirt was mortared in. The two builders retired a little, to gaze proudly at their work, which looked solid as a wall of masonry.

"Isn't the brook mad, mumsey?" laughed the boy, as he watched the water chafe against the barrier. "You can't break it down, old fellow! When mumsey and I build, we build to stay."

That night the rains descended and the floods came. Mrs. Hulburt awoke very early in the morning to hear the rain pouring in torrents on the roof of the piazza. Going to the window, she saw that the village street was flooded; and on the surface of the water floated pieces of wood, hand-rails, and planks.

Into the adjoining room she flew; and, rousing her sleeping boy, she cried:—

"Charley, Charley, get up! The foot-bridge is down, the street's afloat, and it's all the work of that horrid dam!"

Huddling on their clothes, they crept downstairs, wrapping their rubber coats around them as they went, and stopping only to take the long-handled spade and hoe from behind the kitchen door. A look in at the barn confirmed their fears. Poor Brindle, the old farm horse, stood ankle-deep in water; and his whinny of reproach seemed to ask, "Who dammed the brook up yesterday?" The ducks were swimming over the floor; but the hens still clung to their perches, and clucked to each other in dismay.

As the authors of the mischief came round the rear corner of the barn, they saw the brook dashing over the dam, a small cataract, and the meadows overflowed. Down the stream, pell-mell, helter-skelter, through water and mire and mud, they raced rather than ran, till they reached the scene of yesterday's labor. Balancing themselves on the edge of the bank, wielding shovel and hoe, they pushed with might and main until they had dislodged the firmly wedged stones, and an outlet was made for the angry waters. For an hour they worked till every vestige of the dam was destroyed.

The lesson of that night was one that Charley Hulburt never forgot. Forethought for others became the rule of his life. Often, in later years, when about to enter on any undertaking which promised good for himself, the memory of "that horrid dam" would come to him; and he would say once more the verse of warning that his mother wrote for his guidance at the time:

"Build strong, and build to stay,
But never build in such a way
That what you build can, any day,
Another's work in ruins lay."

—Helen Chauncey, in Sunday School Times.

GIANT BEES.

Before long an attempt will be made to introduce into the United States the giant bees of India, which build combs in the forest as big as house doors. Their honey is gathered by professional bee-hunters. The drones are no bigger than ordinary bees, and for that reason it is more likely that they would breed with the races now domesticated here. These bees of India have longer tongues than other bees, and thus they would be able to get from many kinds of flowers much honey that now goes to waste.—Boston Transcript.

TWO FRIENDS.

One day, not long ago, I was walking in Central Park; and, as I came down a certain path, I saw several squirrels playing on the grass. Another one was quite by himself, lying at full length on one of the highest branches of a tall oak-tree; and, from what happened soon after, I think that he was expecting a friend.

Presently I saw a gentleman come down the path, stop at the foot of the tree, look up, and call: "Come! Come! Here I am!"

The squirrel seemed to have been waiting for this voice; for at the first sound he ran quickly down the tree to the lowest branch, gave one flying leap, and landed on the gentleman's shoulder.

"Will you have your dinner now?" he asked.

The squirrel answered in his own language, which I do not understand. I suppose he said, "Yes, thank you"; for the gentleman put his hand into his pocket, and drew out a nut from which he took the shell. Then, turning his head toward the squirrel, he fed him the kernel, the gentleman holding it between his lips.

It was a pretty sight to see the squirrel put his little head close to the face of the gentleman. After watching him eat a few nuts, I walked on, leaving two very happy friends under the big oak-tree.—St. Nicholas.

THE ORIGIN OF LACE-MAKING.

There are many pretty legends of the origin of lace-making; and one of the prettiest is the story of the Venetian sailor who, on the eve of a sea voyage, gave to the woman he loved a piece of beautiful sea-weed, to keep while he was absent, in memory of him. He sailed away; and the girl cared for his gift with constant devotion, superstitiously fancying that upon its preservation depended the safety of her lover or the endurance of his love for her. Therefore, when she discovered that the sea-weed was slowly drying up and falling to pieces, she caught the fine leaves and branches with thread against a piece of linen, and thus invented lace.—Harper's Weekly.

THROUGH THE WEEK.

BY GRACE BLANCHARD.

My poor little shut-in sister,
Who can't be up at work,
Don't get the doldrums, dearie,
And feel you're just a shirk.
But, when your strong companions
Begin housekeeper's week,
Follow the order with them,
And first, your washing seek.
There's washing the sad and bad spots
From out of morbid hearts;
And the wish to be a comfort,
Is a soap of wondrous parts.
Put in the starch of courage,
A stiff upper lip to keep;
And Tuesday iron the wrinkles
From eyes that are prone to weep.
Press the lines of your face all upward,
And smooth out every frown,
Gloss o'er hard facts with a polish
Admired by all the town.
On Wednesday take your mending,
And eke out faith with hope,
And patch out pain with patience,—
"Darn things," instead of mope.
Then, when your ways are mended,
On Thursday go and call
On those, in prose or poem,
Who have done you good at all.
Learn their views on every subject
You want or ought to know:
Visiting day is nicest
Of all the week, I trow.
After this fine communing,
On Friday sweep your brain
Of vapors, cobwebs, nonsense,—
Ideas that miss their aim.
Saturday cook up mischief,
And spice it all with wit:
When malice is the flavor,
The bitter oft gets bit.
Prepare some "gems" of kindness;
Be never of the ilk
Who, Beecher says, "preach cream,
But only live skim-milk."
On Sunday! oh, on Sunday,
Don't rule yourself by days,
Just love and trust, "look out, not in,"
Commit to the Lord thy ways.

POOR RICHARD.

In Fiske's "History of the United States for Schools" has been appropriately placed, on the back of a fine portrait of Franklin, after a painting by Duplessis, a fac-simile of a page of "Poor Richard's Almanac." The material at the beginning of the page is so characteristic of Franklin that we reproduce it here:—

"Man's rich with little, were his Judgment true, Nature is frugal, and her Wants are few;
Those few Wants answer'd, bring sincere Delights,
But Fools create themselves new Appetites.
Fancy and pride seek Things at vast Expense,
Which relish not to Reason nor to Sense.
Like Cats in Air-pumps, to subsist we strive
On Joys too thin to keep the Soul alive."

A STORY OF MILLAIS.

"My boy, those are the lights of London." This was the answer that Mrs. Millais gave her eight-year-old son as they approached the great city, just fifty-seven years ago. He was travelling with his parents on the top of the mail-coach which ran between Southampton and London; and he saw in front of him a red glow in the sky such as he had never beheld before. No doubt he felt for the moment like the hero of "Locksley Hall,"—no doubt ... "his spirit leapt within him to be gone before him then, Underneath the light he looked at, in among the throngs of men."

His second day "among the throngs of men" was the most eventful of his life. His mother (to whom, as he has more than once confessed, he owes everything) took him to see Sir Martin Archer Shee, then the president of the Royal Academy. The boy, it seems, had been in the habit of making sketches; and, as generally happens, these sketches were thought a very great deal of by his friends. As generally happens also, a leading artist was asked to give an opinion upon them. Sir Frederic Leighton's father approached Hiram Powers, the American sculptor, in a similar case. Mrs. Millais called upon the P.R.A. The boy's talents were thought a great deal of by his friends (she said); but she dared not trust merely to the opinion of friends. Would Sir Martin kindly tell her whether it would be prudent for his father to bring him up as an artist?

The fond mother must have been somewhat startled by the answer which she got from the president. "Madam," he exclaimed, "you had better bring the boy up to be a chimney-sweeper." "But surely, Sir Martin, you will look at my son's drawings before you decide?" asked Mrs. Millais. "Very well," replied the great man, "let us see them." Thereupon a portfolio was brought up from the hall, and opened and inspected by the president. He examined the drawings for some time, and then, placing his hand upon the little boy's head, asked him if he did all those drawings by himself. Young Millais choked, and was unable to say a word. But the look upon his face gave an affirmative answer to the question. Thereupon the president gave an opinion which wild horses would be unable to drag from his successor, Sir Frederic Leighton, in respect of the work of a child of eight. "Madam," he said, "it is your duty to bring this boy up to the profession." And the wisdom of his advice has been fully justified by the career of the boy in question.—Review of Reviews.

The Sunday School.

Sunday-school workers are cordially invited to visit the rooms of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, 25 Beacon Street, during Anniversary Week.

The New Song and Service Book, issued by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, is still having a large sale. Nearly one-half of the second edition has been already ordered.

The Roslindale Sunday-school has fifty copies of "Unity Services and Songs" to give away where wanted. Any one wishing such a gift can apply to Miss Mary Hastings, Roslindale, Mass.

The last Channing Hall "Talks" in the present course will be given next Saturday, May 25. Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Advanced, Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, at three o'clock. Subject, Lesson XXXVI., "The Resurrection." All cordially invited.

A clergyman on the Pacific Coast writes as follows: "The weakness of our cause in the West lies in the feebleness of our Sunday-school life." When the situation is carefully examined in many cases where there seems to be a decline of denominational prosperity, it will appear that the explanation offered above is applicable.

The leaflet lessons on the "Life of Jesus," which have been issued the past winter, prepared by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford and Rev. Edward A. Horton, will be published in two manuals the coming summer,—one containing the Advanced, and the other the Intermediate lessons. They will form together a valuable text-book on the subject. Price for each manual, 20 cents per copy, or $1.80 per dozen.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—The closing session of the twelfth season of the meetings of the Unitarian Sunday School Union was held at the Church of the Disciples May 20. The first business was the election of officers for the ensuing year. The Nominating Committee reported the following list, which was unanimously chosen: Mr. Frank B. Thayer of Boston, president; Mr. Robert C. Metcalf of Roxbury, vice-president; Miss Louisa P. Parker, Cambridge, secretary; Mr. Julius H. Tuttle of Dedham, treasurer; directors, Rev. Edward A. Horton of Boston, Mr. M. M. Burdick of Providence, Miss Grace Gage of Arlington, Mrs. Christopher R. Eliot of Boston, Mr. Frank A. Page of Wollaston. Addresses were made by Rev. G. W. Cutter, M.D., Rev. G. C. Wright, and Rev. M. J. Savage.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN

BY

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

FILES OF "THE UNITARIAN."

I wish to say to persons desiring to obtain back numbers of the Unitarian in order to complete their sets, that they will need to attend to the matter between now and the 10th of June, or it will be too late. The present publisher, Mr. Geo. H. Ellis, can furnish back numbers since January, 1891, the time when the publication office was removed to Boston. But for the five years previous to that time back numbers can be obtained only from me. Most of the numbers of that period I can furnish; but I shall dispose of all before June 10, after which time it will be impossible for me to give aid to any in completing their early files.

ARMENIAN REFUGEES.

The Woman's Signal, of which Lady Somerset is editor-in-chief, says:—

The Armenian atrocities became, if possible, more real to us by the presence in our office of Frederick D. Greene, for thirty-five years a resident in that smitten land, accompanied by two refugees, a husband and wife, all of whose relatives were slaughtered by the Turkish troops, and whose only little child, a boy of three, was bayoneted in the presence of this dark-eyed mother, who is but eighteen years of age. The family was well-to-do, but lived remote from what we call civilization, tending its flocks on the hillsides, reading the word of God, and finding in the good priest that fatherly kindness and sense of protection which comforted their lonely and simple lives. They fled before the Turks and Khourds; but the older ones were soon overcome and slain. The swift-footed young woman was hunted like a partridge on the hillside, but for three weeks eluded her pursuers; and, finally, her agonized face looked in at the hospital windows of what, in the language of Uncle Tom's Cabin, we learned to call "a station on the underground railway."

Some weeks after her husband and his brother reached the same safe covert; and, by means not necessary to be described, they were conveyed to friendly territory, and sent straight to London with their heart-breaking message. The good priest, who was hidden with the young husband for some days in a cave, was searched out by his companions, who, being fleet of foot, escaped; but so reverent is the spirit of the Armenians that they returned when the soldiers had passed on, to seek out and bury their beloved who had fallen. They found the priest bayoneted, mutilated, and, to show the fiendish cruelty of the Turk, they had made a cross with a point of their weapons by two deep gashes upon the old man's forehead.

We do not know when our hearts have been so deeply stirred as by the presence and sad and eager look of these two young people who could not speak a word of our language, but whose response to every smile and token of interest and affection was most tender and pitiful to see. The little Armenian wife, bereft of her only child, is here without a penny in the world or even adequate clothing, having been robbed of everything by her merciless pursuers. If any of our readers would like to send a practical token of their interest, it will be carefully set aside to help these two representatives of that sorrowful race which, two thousand years later, is suffering a martyrdom not exceeded by any terrors invented by the inquisitors of Judea or the emperors at Rome.

Spirit of the Press.

The Southern Presbyterian says:—

It seems that the colored church question is coming up before us. The Charleston Presbytery has refused to receive as a preacher a young colored man who applied for admission. The South Carolina Presbytery received a number of colored Presbyterians from Abbeville who asked to be organized into a church, and their request was granted. There was some vigorous opposition, especially from the elders present, who feared the "social equality" trouble that might arise. But the petition was granted, and the colored brethren were received.

Temperance.

The Scientific American declares "that beer-drinking in this country produces the very lowest forms of inebriety, closely allied to criminal insanity. The most dangerous class of tramps and ruffians in large cities are beer-drinkers."

The Western Christian Advocate says: "The Hawaiian race is dying out rapidly. The missionaries have done much to elevate the natives; but intoxicating drinks and the accompanying vices bid fair to exterminate the race. The saloons have more power to destroy than the churches have to save."

A Toronto saloon-keeper is reported as saying that the introduction of electric cars in that city has greatly diminished the sales in saloons, as workmen who previously walked home in companies of from five to twenty, and stopped at the saloons on the way for a social drink, now ride home, and, once there, spend the evenings with their families.

Rev. Dr. T. L. Cuyler claims that social drinking customs are on the increase in our country, and he adds: "The decanter is stealing back again to the dinner tables of people from whom we should expect better things. Intoxicants are more freely offered at weddings and in social gatherings. Club life is becoming more popular, and there are very few clubs that are under restrictions of total abstinence. Betting and bottles are the two concomitants of the football matches and rowing matches which attract thousands of our college students."

Personals.

It is not generally known, we fancy, that Mr. Hardy, who in his new novel, "Hearts Insurgent," makes his hero a church mason, was intended by his parents for the clerical profession, but compromised with them by becoming an ecclesiastical architect. It was while busy restoring an old Devonshire church that he met his wife, a Miss Gifford. She approved of her husband's abandonment of architecture for letters, and herself wrote the manuscript of his first novel, "Desperate Remedies." She still acts as his amanuensis, and keeps a record of the prototypes of his local characters.

William Dwight Whitney and James Dwight Dana, the two distinguished members of the faculty of Yale University, were fittingly remembered at the meeting of the Yale Alumni Association of New York, May 3. The memorial presented by D. H. Chamberlin paid appreciative tribute to the attainments of these two men, their achievements in scholarship, and the nobility of their personal character. "Theirs was not a figurative and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed: they held all their scientific and scholastic conclusions open to challenge by competent critics, and open to revision in the light of wider knowledge; and they held all their vast stores of learning at the lifelong and instant service of their students, and of all their fellow-men."

Education.

PERKINS INSTITUTION.—One of the interesting commencements of the season about to open will be that of the Perkins Institution and Massachusetts School for the Blind, which will be held on Tuesday, June 4, at three o'clock P.M., in Boston Theatre. His Excellency Gov. Greenhalge is expected to honor the occasion with his presence. Samuel Eliot, LL.D., will preside; and Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D.D., will make an address in behalf of the kindergarten and its needs. The exercises will open with an overture by Suppee, played by the band, after which the little children of the kindergarten will tell the story of water, and show by means of game and song and modelling in clay how it is one of our greatest helpers. Willie Elizabeth Robin and Tommy Stringer will take part in this exercise. The kinder-orchestra will play an original composition which has been arranged for the tiny musicians by their devoted teacher, Miss Roeske. The application of the principles of sloyd to knitting, together with its results, may be seen in the work of a class of little blind children, who will describe the various stitches and show the product of their handiwork. The literary exercises of the parent school will consist of experiments in physics conducted by members of the graduating class, and reading by touch from Ruskin's "King of the Golden River." This book has just been issued by the Howe Memorial Press; and the class of girls, including Edith Thomas, will use it for the first time on this occasion. Gymnastics and military drill will follow in order, and the exercises will be brought to a close by a chorus sung by mixed voices. Admission tickets may be had by applying to M. Anagnos, South Boston, or at the salesroom of the institution, No. 37 Avon Place. No tickets are required for the top gallery of the theatre, to which the public is cordially invited.

For Business Men.

You have heard of the old lady who kept house on a table, two chairs, a tea store chromo, and her prudence. The question we want to ask to-day is, "On what do you run your business?"

Some business may no doubt be run on the heaviest velvet carpet and go days' time. There are others which run on wind: But, if you are trying to run your business wisely, you can't do better than run it on one of our leather-cushioned office chairs.

You will find that it keeps you in excellent temper and spirits. You meet your customers with an easy, rested look, and without that air of depression, which is a sure accompaniment of a lack of comfort.

Seriously, is there any one chair of all those you have bought for your home that you use one-half or one-quarter as much as you do your own office chair? In it you spend almost one-third of the twenty-four hours. Then why not have a new and comfortable leather office chair at once?

Important Works.

Members of One Body. Six Sermons by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS. 132 pages. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

CONTENTS: I. Roman Catholicism; II. Calvinism; III. Methodism; IV. Rationalism; V. Mysticism; VI. The Unity of Christendom.

In the whole list of Liberal Religious books, past and present, it would be hard to find any series of utterances freer with the true freedom—more ingenious, more appreciative, more prophetic of the unity that is to be, more religiously "satisfying"—than Mr. Crothers gives us in these six discourses. The outline alone, which each chapter contains, of the stronger, more helpful points in the various schemes of religious thought and life discussed, renders the book invaluable.

The Evolution of Christianity. By M. J. SAVAGE. 178 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Old World Religion; Judaism and its Hopes; Conditions when Christianity was born; Jesus and What he attempted; The Influence of the Christ Idea; The First Church and Paul; The Problem of the Trinity; The Church of Rome; Growth away from Jesus; The Protestant Revolution; Science and the Church; Free Christianity.

"One would seek in vain for a more enlightened application of the scientific method to the history of religion; and one can believe that, if close reasoning and rational faith could convert, Mr. Savage's words might bear a message to those who are without the churches and within. One reads with pleasure and confidence and hopefulness, and finds the end come all too quickly."—Boston Times.

Uplifts of Heart and Will. Religious Aspirations in Prose and Verse. By JAMES H. WEST, author of "The Complete Life," etc. Second thousand, with additions. 106 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

"Full of a happy sense of Nature's beauty and bounty. One unceasing aspiration towards the 'Moral Ideal,' the 'Blessed Best.'"—William C. Gannett, in Unity.

"One is very strongly impressed with the sincerity and reality of expression. Mr. West is a devout and earnest religious writer."—Boston Herald.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

Pebbles, Pearls, and Gems of the Orient. Selections from Eastern Wit and Wisdom. By Rev. C. D. B. MILLS. 238 pages. Cloth, full gilt, $1.50.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

Pleasantries.

"In your profession, especially, I suppose time is money." "I do not find it so," answered the musician: "I do not find it at all difficult to keep time."—Indianapolis Journal.

"Why is a great strong man like you around begging?" "Ah, madame, it is the only profession in which a gentleman can address a beautiful lady without the formality of an introduction."—Exchange.

An Irishman, walking along with Biddy, saw a Chinese laundry sign made like a staff with musical notes. "Och, Dinny," said Bridget, "wot's that?" "Shure, I dunno," said Pat; "but, if I had my floot, I'd play it, bedad."

Teacher: "What is the meaning of the word 'excavate'?" Scholar: "To hollow out." Teacher: "Give me a sentence in which the word is properly used?" Scholar: "The small boy excavates when he cuts his finger."—Tit-bits.

A new story is of a tiny girl who spoke very scornfully of babies. "Don't speak that way!" said her mother: "it isn't very long since you were a baby, yourself." "I know it," she said, looking what she felt; "and I'm ashamed enough of it!"—The Transcript.

A good baby story is of a neighbor meeting a little one on the street, and saying, "Good-morning, my little dear. I never can tell you and your sister apart. Which of the twins are you?" And the little dear made answer, "I'm the one what's out walkin'."—The Transcript.

A rustic deacon had to announce that Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, M.A., would preach at the chapel. What he did announce was: "The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes' Ma will preach." He added, with that love of amplification which is habitual in his class, "We hope the old lady will give us a good discourse."—Living Church.

The celebrated Dr. Dumoulin, being surrounded in his last moments by many of his fellow-physicians, who deplored their loss, said to them, "Gentlemen, I leave behind me three great physicians." Every one, thinking himself to be one of the three, pressed him to name them, upon which he replied, "Cleanliness, exercise, and moderation in eating."—Sacred Heart Review.

A cardinal, who commanded the troops of Pope Boniface IX. in the march of Acona, finding himself on one occasion in a position in which he must conquer or die, promised his soldiers that, if they secured the victory, those who fell should dine that very day with the angels. They marched to the combat with alacrity; but, finding that the cardinal was careful not to expose himself, "How is it," said one of them, "that you show no anxiety for the celestial banquet to which you have invited us so warmly?" "Because it is not yet my dinner-time; and I am not hungry."—All the Year Round.

A famous Brooklyn clergyman was once addressing a Sabbath school on the lesson of the day, which happened to be "Jacob's Ladder." He got along swimmingly until a little urchin in one of the back seats squeaked out, "Why did the angels have to have a ladder, when they had wings?" After the inevitable laugh had subsided, the clergyman said, "Well, that is a fair question: who can answer it?" There was a pause, and then up went a pudgy fist. "Well, my little man," asked the clergyman, "Why was it?" "I guess mebber they was a-moultin'," was the astonishing reply.—Presbyterian Journal.

CARLYLE AND MILLAIS.

A bowed-down and world-worried old man stood at the foot of a stately marble staircase in a house at Palace Gate. He was quaintly dressed; and his rugged, thoughtful, and time-worn features wore a curious expression as he gazed wonderingly upon the splendor of the entrance hall of the West End mansion to which he had paid a visit. For himself, this old man had been content during more than forty years with a cheap and unpretending dwelling in a modest street, leading off the Thames Embankment at Chelsea. Still he gazed at the marble pavement, at the dado, and at the white marble columns; and still his wonder grew until, turning at length to the handsome and picturesquely attired gentleman who stood at his side, he blurted out a characteristic question: "Has paint done all this, Mr. Millais?" "It has," the artist replied with a laugh. "Then," rejoined the old man,—who was none other than Thomas Carlyle,—"then all I have to say is that there are more fools in the world than I thought there were."—Review of Reviews.

Editorial.

THE St. Louis Globe-Democrat had a telegraphic despatch from Boston headed, "A New Departure of Unitarians," in which were described the Sunday services on the Common. Among other things, the telegraphic reporter said, "Boston people are somewhat astonished at the change in the attitude of this aristocratic denomination." The story has so often been repeated that Unitarians lack zeal and are dying out that it is received as truth by those whose wish is father of the thought. To such the announcement of the preaching on the Common may awaken surprise. We trust such may be shocked by other surprises in the same direction.

It is too commonly assumed, perhaps, that the salvation of society lies in the upper classes. If by "upper classes" those are meant who are upper in intellect, in knowledge, in judgment, in devotion to the public weal, then the expectation is right enough; but, if it means not the aristocracy of intellect, culture, or character, but the aristocracy of wealth, then the assumption is extremely unsafe. The aristocracy of wealth is likely to be dominated by the aristocracy of fashion, and fashion is capricious and often foolish and absurd. Take, for instance, such a matter as the treatment of a horse. It is only a few days since that some one in a fit of snobbery undertook to defend in a Boston paper the docking of horses' tails. Here is an example of a fashion and a vice which is confined entirely to the rich or the well-to-do. The cartmen do not cut off their horses' tails. If a hack-driver has a docked horse, it is because he has bought it at auction after it has been used or misused by some fashionable owner. If the lower classes, so called, were therefore to adopt the practice of the so-called "upper classes" in this respect, it would result in a distinct deterioration in the horse and in his driver. As this illustration shows, it is not safe to assume that the possession of money and an ambition to be stylish constitute elements which will in themselves insure the health or progress of society.

THE Chicago Woman's Club has recently been wrestling with the question whether a colored woman shall be admitted to its membership. When the subject was brought forward for action, the opponents submitted an amendment to the by-laws, which, if adopted, would practically enable a minority to veto an admission. The issue was clearly taken, and after an earnest and able discussion this amendment was voted down and the following adopted: "Membership shall be conditioned on character and intelligence, without regard to race, color, creed, or politics." Thus was swept away the color line. Although this was adopted by a large majority, it is thought that the matter will be brought up before the Federation of Women's Clubs, and that this may result in the expulsion of the Chicago Club from the Federation. If so, as the Chicago Club is strong in numbers and right in its principles, it can stand alone.

SETTLEMENTS among the poor in large cities have become common, and most notably Hull House at Chicago. But we question if an occasional settlement among the rich would not be also an advantage. There are many of the poor who have not learned how to live, who do not know what to do with their small resources; and a "settlement" may help to teach them. There are rich people who are in precisely the same condition. They have not learned how to live: they do not know what to do with their resources. It might not be necessary to find them tutors from the poor; for there are a sufficient number of rich people who know how to employ their leisure and their fortunes, and they are constantly giving an object lesson to the poor people of the rich slums.

THE recommendation that in all Protestant churches the subject of Christian unity should be the topic of discourse on Whit-sunday, following the pope's recent encyclical, indicates an increasing interest in the general subject. Though at present we are very far from realizing the dream of a true unity among Christians, the discussion shows a wide-spread desire for a broader basis of fellowship. With the fact before us that the idea of unity, as urged by the pope, is limited to his church; that the Lambeth Conference in its plan does not, for its basis, go far beyond the Episcopacy; and that the different branches of Presbyterians at present only hope to reach a confederation of churches instead of organic unity,—these and other facts of the same kind which could be mentioned make it evident that the time has not yet come for a true unity. We can never reach a real unity of Christendom on the basis of form and opinion. It can only come from a unity of spirit which will recognize and tolerate differences of ritual, polity, and creed. Still, it is a decided gain when those of various communions begin to discuss this subject, and yearn to see it accomplished. Anything which will give more breadth to our religious conceptions, raise the mind above a narrow partisanship and belittling sectarianism into a wider toleration of each other's differences, is a gain. For this reason all efforts in this direction should be welcomed.

AS FURTHER evidence of the slow advance of Christian unity, we note another fact. Mr. Stead, before the Executive Committee of the Nonconformist Council, London, raised the question of the recognition of Unitarians as Free Churchmen. This, as reported in the Review of Reviews, was ruled out by Mr. Price Hughes, "who stated that the Free Church Congress had decided to exclude the Unitarians, and to limit its organizations to evangelical Nonconformists. They will be very glad to co-operate with Unitarians in social work; but the Nonconformist Councils, which have been formed under the ægis of the Free Church Congress, were brought into existence quite as much for strictly religious and spiritual work as for social or political work. This being the case, it was absolutely necessary that Unitarians should not be admitted. If they were, (1) it would be impossible for any Nonconformist Council of which they formed a part to be affiliated with the Church Congress, (2) there would be endless worry through practical differences raised whenever the Nonconformist Council undertook any distinctly evangelical work. Mr. Stead suggested that, if this were so, it would be well to adopt a nomenclature which would not imply that they refused to recognize Unitarians as Christians or Free Churchmen or Nonconformists, to which no council of Trinitarian Nonconformists or Unitarians could object. The suggestion, however, was scouted, great objection being taken to the term 'Trinitarian'; and it was ruled that the term 'evangelical' was precise enough to exclude any Unitarian."

THE resignation of Count Kalnoky, who has ably filled the office of Foreign Minister of Austria-Hungary, proves that the power of the Roman Catholic Church has its limits, even in Roman Catholic countries. This minister allowed himself to be mixed up with the intrigues of the clericals who were working against the liberal movements in Hungary. The liberals united their forces, and triumphed in their resistance to priestly control. Notwithstanding his long and valuable service, Count Kalnoky was obliged to resign; and, such was the strength of the liberal party, his resignation was accepted. The Vatican also issued its orders to the Roman Catholics of Italy to abstain from voting at the recent elections. The results of the elections last Sunday indicate a decided majority for the ministry and that many of the Roman Catholics voted. If this be so, it proves that the pope finds it difficult to fully control the members of his church in their political action. It is, nevertheless, true that he still exerts a powerful influence on European politics. This, however, has its limitations. In the palmist days of the papacy a Hildebrand forced the German emperor to kneel before him in submission. Now Leo XIII. is stripped of his temporal rule even in Rome.

THE increasing interest in Memorial Day is an evidence of the strong hold which the events of the war have on those who took part. Since the surrender at Appomattox a new generation has grown up, to whom the varying features of this great struggle are history. To the soldiers who drop the floral tribute on the graves of their comrades with loving remembrance of what they suffered and what they did these are matters of personal experience. This gives to Memorial Day a twofold value. It keeps alive in the old soldiers the memories of the past, and teaches the generation who have come upon the stage since Lee surrendered his sword to Grant at what a cost of valor and heroism the nation was saved. It is a noble legacy of patriotism which these veterans have bequeathed to their successors. The story should thus be repeated year after year, so that those who now reap the fruits of their sacrifices, devotion, and heroism may be filled with gratitude for what they have done, and be inspired by a like fidelity in present duties. Now the country is confronted with different foes; and the children of the soldiers are not called on to die for their country, but to give it their loving service. The battle of to-day is to be fought with political corruption, fraud, and unscrupulous partisanship. We should strive for the triumph of public honor and private virtues.

FLOWERING OF THE BUTTERCUPS.

When Priscilla and John Alden were young, when the Pilgrim fathers and mothers were beginning the work of civilizing Massachusetts, there was little leisure to watch for the buttercups or to study nature in any but her productive moods. To them it was of more vital interest that the maize should sprout than that the may-flower should blossom, that the game birds should be plentiful than that the thrushes should sing in the deep, silent forests. Only when the wilderness is conquered does there come time for the study of nature and art. Visitors from the Old World are often impatient with Americans that life is still so crude here. They forget that, if it takes a century to make an English lawn, it must take much longer to smooth out the rough places in human life and make things beautiful, and to become well informed about the outer world in which we move.

Art claims the winter as its special heritage. Nature woos man in summer. People of leisure and wealth now spend so much time in the country that they have little excuse for a lack of knowledge of the common birds, insects, trees, and flowers that are their immediate neighbors for five or six months of the year. Besides, they not only have the objects themselves to study, but every season sees new books pertaining to these things that make study a pastime. Careful observers have not only discovered the way, but have blazed the path so thoroughly that the wayfarer may not err therein. The birds are pictured in their natural colors, till with book, opera-glass, and patience one may learn to know them by the score. The insects from the most gorgeous butterflies and moths down to the tiniest flies have their biographers, and of the making of books on trees and ferns and flowers there is no end.

But it is not the pleasure of acquiring knowledge alone that appeals to one. The mental diversion from matters of city worry and anxiety is in itself a tonic. Even the relief from too much charitable work and sympathy is often needed, and the study of nature in her own haunts in no way lessens the spirit and ability to resume such work when the winter with its many calls comes again. For those who have had to do with criminals and moral offenders it is an untold blessing to get away to the woods where everything is obedient to the laws of being. This need not necessarily mean that humanity shall be despised as compared with trees and flowers. It means rather that, when one studies the laws of nature and observes how obedience is rewarded, he will return to his duties among undeveloped or ill-developed men and women with a stronger determination than ever to secure obedience to all divine laws.

The spiritual nature likewise finds its lesson, its inspiration, and its rest in quitting the stifling air of the city for the sake of living closer to the manifestation of the Divine in the woods and the fields. Many a man feels this who is unconscious of it. There can be no doubt that it is for the health of the whole man to live in the country, even though he do business in the city. Man gains strength from contact with mother earth, as the old fable taught. The air he breathes vitalizes his lungs without his giving it a thought; and the country scenes that show him the stability of nature, the ever upward striving of all life about him, as unconsciously help to make him a better man. If his feelings were expressed in words, he would say with Lowell:—

"The older I grow, the more I am convinced that there are no satisfactions so deep and so permanent as our sympathies with outward nature. I have not said just what I meant, for we are thrilled even more by any spectacle of human heroism. But the others seem to bind our lives together by a more visible and unbroken chain of purifying and softening emotion. In this way the flowering of the buttercups is always a great and I may truly say religious event in my year."

SOLITUDE.

Wise minds only know how much of life to set apart for communion with self and the Oversoul, for those occupations and claims that demand retirement from the world. It is the preservation of a fine balance. Too much mingling with one's fellow-beings is certainly destructive to reflection, and stimulates only the superficial perceptive faculties. He who seeks the solitude of crowds to meditate must have a rare power of abstraction. People who dread to be alone an hour a week are generally content with the froth of human intercourse, and seek not the depths of character beneath that which ripples and gleams on the surface. The inanities of this existence are a check to permanent growth, and finally fix the habit of the mind in vagrancy, destroying the power to ever strike deeper root in moral and mental soil.

The victims of the trivial are numerous. The social disease of always being en évidence is not perhaps as fatal as the opium habit; but it still strews life's path with a wreckage of inanition and wasted possibilities. On the other hand, too much solitude is not wholesome. Safety consists in finding a just balance, a happy mean. If we fail to rub off eccentric angles and thorny spines against our fellow-beings, if we miss the contagion of their joys and sorrows, forget how to laugh and weep with them, to help carry their burdens, and to receive help in return, we may lose touch with our kind, and grow into the recluse, the oddity, the misanthrope of the country village or the city attic, may miss the wholesome tonic power of public opinion, and fall into mental and physical squalor, or vacuity, because self-respect alone, unbolstered, is not sufficiently strong to keep us out of the slough of apathy.

There is danger in either extreme. Our solitude should give us a keener relish for intercourse with our kind. Our companionship should send us back to solitude enriched and strengthened. In this fine balance of tendency lie health and safety. The sad word of Emerson, "We descend to meet," is felt profoundly by thoughtful people in all ranks of life. The ideal companionship seems perpetually to elude us. We dream of it, hope and pray for it, think we have captured it only to be disappointed. We travel to meet it; but, when we come where our expectancy tells us it ought to be, it is not there. Coldness, indifference, hesitation, secretiveness, are found in the place of that for which we would give toil and treasure. We feel the chill of that fencing and guarding by which human beings protect themselves from the discovery of the secret we so long to possess, the word, the look, the sign, which shall give us the key to character, experience, and growth.

So we come to discover the instinctive necessity of the soul to hold itself from too perfect revelation. As the ocean hides its depths, the waterfall the abyss into which it sinks, so the mystery of character repels. Every man is on his guard. He is known only by unconscious revealings that may be gathered up and formulated into a type. These hints we judge to be truer than anything the lips utter.

When dissatisfied with half-revelation, where we had hoped for perfect communion, we go back to solitude, throw ourselves upon it as into a citadel of safety. Our disappointment and disgust with life make it sweet and tonic. We see true things reflected as in a placid lake. The mind settles to imagery. It sees its own secret start forth in the silences. The painful effects of grimacing and posturing, those shocks and distortions of the actual, pass away. If we have been false to the higher self, we hide in our retreat to wash off the memory of the stain. The soul settles, grows tranquil again, reflects the perfect, unbroken image. Our loves, hopes, aspirations, are clarified. The aim of solitude may be a nursing of those satisfactions that grow out of egotism. The god of the place may singularly resemble our own selfhood. We may avoid others because they shiver the fine-spun web of our own secret vanities, and reduce us to a painful sense of littleness. We live as in a blown-up balloon, always in fear of having it punctured by some profane pin.

If intellectual or æsthetic nurture sets us apart in a little heaven of our own building and furnishing, the fate of Tennyson's occupant of the "Palace of Art" overtakes us at last. Our delights grow hideous and distorted, and shapes of dread fill the spaces that we once believed were occupied by the angel of the ideal. Sore, sensitive, sick souls often withdraw from the world to save themselves from hurts and bruises. They betray a fatal weakness. Many of the precious things of life have been wrested from disability. We must expect to get hurt in life's contest. It is a battle, and in battle only are won "The wrestling thews that throw the world."

We must face the mystery of pain, and determine to draw from it precious elements of strength. A false education, a false religious training, emasculates. That only is true that braces the nature to meet its fate with steady eye and unfaltering will. To the brooding soul solitude is poison. It should throw itself into the very thick of the struggle for existence, to save its sanity. Diseased sensitiveness is not to be respected. Society, careless of the blows it inflicts, has a better method of treatment. If your self-pity is morbid, do not dare to live alone until you are cured; for it may prove a fatal resource if unwisely nursed. The danger of losing balance can best be combated by facing facts, and proving once for all that the will is the man. If we are too much afraid of pain, we shall lose the best part of discipline.

Our solitude should be but a feeder to a large humanity: our human intercourse should be a stimulant to that divine bath of repose, God-communion and self-communion, that keeps us up anew for contact with our kind. Let us remember that all creatures have like longings, like hungerings. All are dimly seeking the deeper satisfactions. Though sadly astray, befogged, and deluded, nothing can quench this insatiable hunger to communicate, to learn of other natures, to be understood, appreciated in the higher ranges of being. Though mainly tongue-tied, we give homage to any who can find expression for the deepest things we have felt,—things that float vaguely before us in lucid moments, and prove to us that another, an unseen sphere, is the true home of our being. Poor wanderers and exiles, we break away from material absorption now and then to think by gleams and flashes of the riddle of the universe, to realize the marvels and wonders by which we are surrounded, and which we habitually gaze at through pinholes. Solitude liberates us, lets us breathe some finer air. We feel its soft waves as caressing as a swimmer feels the tides of tropic seas. But solitude is not a castle to live in: it is a summer tent. We were born into contact with our fellows, for and with whom we are to struggle, to sorrow, to endure, to love. There we must find the higher consecration that solitude cannot give. There is our work, our life task. To the tent we go to take off our battered armor in a losing or victorious fight, to rest and renew ourselves for another effort. There can be no permanent laying by of buckler and shield. The fight is always renewed. God is the Captain; and such as waste in ease are not his henchmen, but deserters and truants.

ABOUT BOY CULTURE.

A real, right-down, genuine boy is about the finest piece of work the world holds, unless it is an upright, genuine girl. The State and the Church ought to understand the art of making fine lads. A recent writer says, "Looking back through the stray leaves of journalism for fifty years, we find no particular concern manifested as regards boys until within the last dozen years." This may be so, but we are now in a fair way to compensate the young fellows for having forgotten their importance. They are forging to the front, and drawing the crowds. Fifty years ago the great sensation was a tour by the President of the United States: now it is a champion ball game or an international collegiate boat race. Manual culture and athletics mean that boyhood had been repressed, and the value of a thoroughly sound body had not been appreciated. Thinking and knowing seemed to be the all-important end of education. Schools were supposed to be for "mental culture." The consequence was that crowds of college-bred men found the professions overfull, and were ashamed to turn to farming or to the trades. Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, fortunately, had no such shame. Athletic culture, while working no damage to intellectual development, is certainly enlarging the capacity of the boys to earn bread. There is an increasing percentage of college classes that is deliberately preparing for arts, mechanics, agriculture, and trade; while nearly one-sixth of all make a venture in journalism. A real revolution is being worked in the way of broadening the outlook for a life-work ahead of our boys. The result is not for them only, but for the whole community. It was disastrous to have our whole educated force poured into three or four channels only,—the professions,—while education of a higher sort was thus kept out of touch and sympathy with the bulk of the people.

But those who know colleges best notice another result of the breach with classical methods and midnight oil. There is a decided lessening of the number of spectated and angular and bloodless lads who filled our schools fifty years ago. A writer in a California magazine says: "There is growing up a generation of boys whose physical beauty and healthful condition put us to shame. Our very sixteen-year-old stripling can outrow us, outrun, outswim, outride, and outdrive us. But that is not all: the fellow can endure fatigue, and can work as heartily as he can play. He has good red blood, and does not seem inclined to waste or dissipate himself." We must remember to take manual training into the count with athletics, for it is not in the college only that the body is receiving more relative care. The full consequence is apparently to be a very great increase in what we call whole-someness,—a good Saxon way of defining an all-round, all-sound human being. It is no small matter to find our schools working on a line with social and sanitary reform, turning out health (wholth), and creating young Apollos. The training which every athlete undergoes forbids the use of tobacco and strong drinks, or even coffee and indigestible foods. It teaches him, as, unfortunately, no other branch of education does teach him, the laws of health and purity, which are only, in other words, the laws that will enable him to make the best use of himself with the least wear and waste.

Dr. McCosh was one of the first to discover that there was a relation between the increase of physical training and a generous, manly spirit, and so an increase of justice as well as temperance. This has been noted by all who know intimately what is going on inside our higher schools. There is less drinking of intoxicants in our colleges, and less hazing. There are occasional outbreaks, and there will be so long as other mediæval notions linger about the halls. In other words, it is comprehended that, if you wish to aid a boy to avoid the sodden habits that infest schools for the masculine sex only, you can do no better than encourage a fair amount of physical training, and create for him habits that make pure blood and uncongested organs. Football has developed much brutality and vulgarity, and needs to be regulated or repressed; but, on the whole, athletics has done a great deal for manliness. Meanwhile there is no loss in scholarship. The reports from half a dozen universities coincide, practically. Cornell's record two years ago showed that the scholarship of the crews was 70, of the base-ball players 73, of the track athletes 76. This is not a bad showing.

All this has probably been taken into account by our college authorities in deciding what to do about intercollegiate games and their atrocities. Doubtless, the ultimate solution will be that physical culture will become a recognized part of education, and that students will receive marks for sound and scientific gymnasium work. When the Greeks spoke of educating a boy, they meant the whole of the boy,—all his powers of body and mind. There is no reason why the athletics should be in the hands of the boys and of outside trainers. It should be a part of the curriculum,—manual training everywhere in the common schools, physical culture everywhere in the higher schools.

Meanwhile the churches feel the new era, and the propulsion to care for the bodies as well as souls of their members. The Young Men's Christian Associations are opening gymnasiums as well as prayer circles and lecture-rooms. Our liberal atheneums are working on the same line. Much less can be said pleasantly of the absurd military drill introduced into some of the Sunday-schools. President Harrison to the contrary, we believe that there is something better for our schools, both secular and Church, than to make war attractive, and instruct the boys to a taste for soldiering.

We must not only sweep away the last relic of the old culture of the intellect at the expense of nerve and muscle, and the old salvation of the soul at the expense of the body, but inaugurate an aggressive systematic effort to create a nation of perfect men and women. The schools and the churches should only be allowed to supplement a home culture that looks to the "sound mind in a sound body." Our homes have been inclined to shirk this responsibility, to turn it over to the public. We have quite too much of this socialism. The coming home will be less of a workshop. It will have an office above that of eating, working, and sleeping. Salvation, in the highest sense, of every faculty of every individual member of the household, will be the ideal. The child will not be farmed out so completely to church and school, and that indefinable something called society.

MUNICIPAL REFORM IN NEW YORK.

The new Commissioner of Charities and Correction for New York City is enforcing, both by precept and example, the truth that charity needs the gospel of personal contact. He works from early in the morning till late at night, not confining himself to his office, but visits hospitals, storehouses, prisons, asylums, and the homes of the poor in basements and tenements. He startles the officials by the way he cuts the red tape and goes directly at work to do what is needed. He does this, not by revolutionary changes, but by quiet personal direction and oversight. The first week he was in office a lawyer called on him with a friend who was a politician seeking an appointment. The former said: "I would like to have this man appointed to a good office. He is prominent in his district, and"—"Stop right there," exclaimed the commissioner. "What is this man's fitness for office? What help of study or experience can he give me? If he has no special qualifications to make him better than the men now employed, your time is wasted in making the application. This department is not to be run in the interest of politics, and the politicians will only find themselves pounding against a stone wall." At unexpected times he appears at the various institutions; and, if he notes any needed improvement, he at once sees that it is made. Here is an incident which illustrates his method. On making a trip to Blackwell's Island the commissioner noticed the cots of the sick as they were taken from the boat, and set down on the dock to await the arrival of the doctor. Taking out his watch, Mr. Faure counted the time the unfortunates had to wait. Then he made a note of it in his book. Nothing was said; but the next day the doctor was on the dock, waiting for the boat's arrival. With this spirit of personal contact, ability, and faithfulness in the chiefs of all of our public departments, we should make a long stride toward a real municipal reform.

Musings.

Just as I was about to leave Boston a friend lent me a picture which I was not surprised to find he valued highly. It is the picture of a young lady. I was struck at once by its beauty. The forehead is intellectual; the eyes, dark, deep, and expressive; the mouth, rather large; the nose regular; the chin, somewhat broad; the face, rather oval. These are some of the unmeaning terms which a passport agent would probably employ if he were filling out an application for such a document for this young lady. But all such terms are meaningless compared with the strong, expressive, yet undemonstrative beauty of this face, with its soft, mystic crown of hair, which appears to be slightly electrified, as if the intellectual activity beneath caused it to ray out; though, of course, the barber or the curling-stick, or some other crimping, frizzing appliance, may have had something to do with it. My friend is a bachelor; and, when I received from him this beautiful picture, I guessed at once its significance. It seemed to mean a great deal to him,—more than I supposed any young lady could mean to him. It was evidently a sacrifice for him to part with it. I accepted it not as a gift, but as a loan. There is something very mysterious about this face. When I inquired about her, I found that she was neither single nor married; that, as an individual, she could neither be described as living nor dead, for, as an individual, she had never been born, and therefore never could die. It was not a “spirit” photograph: it was taken from real flesh and blood. She was not an ideal, nor exactly a reality; but she was and is a type, and a type calculated to make an impression. In short, this picture is not the likeness of any one young lady, but of fifty or sixty young ladies all rolled into one: it is the concentrated, focalized, intensified loveliness of a whole bevy. To speak with literal and historic accuracy, it is a composite photograph of the class of 1887 of Vassar College. Knowing that I was going abroad, my friend gave it to me as an example of the typical American girl; and I shall take great pleasure in showing it as such. A visit a few months ago to that college impressed me much. Under President Taylor’s administration it has continued to grow with new health and vigor; and, when I have attended a meeting of Vassar graduates, I have felt that, with or without a composite photograph, it would be easy for Vassar to furnish notable examples of the best type of the American girl.

I SHALL have to use the greatest discretion in showing this picture. What if some susceptible young man should fall dead in love with the young lady? How hopelessly his affections would become entangled! What an awful revelation it would be to him to discover that he had not only fallen in love with one girl, but with a whole college class! One who has been brought up to polygamy, like the sultan, may face such a revelation with composure and fortitude; but in this country it is considered selfish to fall in love with more than one young lady at a time. Think, too, of the great strain on the pecuniary resources of a young man who attempts to court a whole college class. Who but a millionaire could stand the outlay for “Huyler’s” and carriage hire? And would the class be satisfied with a wholesale collective billet-doux, or exact individual lumps of sugar? I shall take care, therefore, that the susceptibilities of foreign counts and lords are not too severely strained by this picture. But for a bachelor who has resolved to worship women in general, but no woman in particular, the composite picture is just the thing. It enables him to focalize his dissipated admiration without the danger of a marriage certificate. He may worship the icon without being in danger of idolatry. What a large place the composite picture might have played in the system of Comte, if it had been known then, enabling the positivist to go through his ritual before some picture of the collective womanly without exciting the jealousy of his wife. And how much more convenient it would have been for Brigham Young to carry around a composite picture of his seventeen wives and one of his fifty-three children than to go off on a journey with a huge family album!

But the composite picture has its moral suggestions. It expresses solidarity. It tells us that, if we are to have a perfect type, we must seek the perfection of the individual, and must blend the likeness of perfect men and women into that of the perfect man. I suspect that the ideal of manhood which we carry about with us is sometimes the mental photograph of a character whom we admire, and sometimes the composite picture of a score of people blended into one image. This, to me, is the difference between Jesus and the Christ. Jesus is the picture of an individual life,—a sweet, alluring portrait of a man of joys and a man of sorrows, one who inspires us to be what we may be by thinking of what he was. I cannot think that the Jesus of the Gospels is a made-up picture. There was a real man before the camera, though the print may have been touched and colored by the loving hands of the photographer. On the other hand, the ideal Christ is a composite picture. It is the image not only of the historic Jesus, but of all of his classmates in the school of life, his fellow-disciples, his spiritual followers. It is not the perfect individual, but the ideal man. And what we need to do is to realize this ideal Christ in human life and society.

Brevities.

The Conference of Charities now being held in New Haven opened finely with a noble address by Robert Treat Paine.

The man must have spoken from experience who said, “An editor is a man who has the industry of a beaver, the instincts of a bee, and the patience of an ass.”

France will send a ship to the formal opening of the great canal into the Baltic. It is nearly twenty-five years since she has thus honored Germany. Old animosities should fade away in a quarter of a century.

Dr. Talmage describes grace as “a pulley fastened to the throne of grace which we pull, bringing the blessing.” The metaphor is somewhat mechanical, and perhaps Dr. Talmage has a patent on it. It is to be hoped that it will not get out of order.

A writer in Harper’s Weekly dilates on the cheap and innocent recreation of reading the advertisements of summer board and summer cottages that crowd our newspapers. He suggests that “the blessed New England coast” might be a blissful institution, if it were only endowed.

If another country did not claim the site of the tower of Babel, it might almost be given to Russia, so many tongues are spoken there. The British Bible Society distributed more than half a million Bibles in Russia last year, and it required seventy different languages in which to print them.

It is a matter for congratulation, perhaps, but no surprise to the friends of the editor, that the “Lucania,” which took him across the Atlantic, beat the record, having made the trip between New York and Queens-town in five days, eleven hours, and forty minutes. This ought to delight his journalistic instinct.

The Zion’s Herald, with its well-known activity and enterprise, issued last week a memorial number in which a large array of contributions commemorated the deeds of the soldiers of the late war and drew lessons for the future. Among these was a very interesting paper from Mrs. Mary Livermore.

Certain correspondents have suggested to the Watchman that money spent in going to anniversary meetings of religious societies might better be given to the causes. The Watchman wastes no words in replying, but, with a brevity which comprehends much wit, says, “We do not print these articles, for there is a limit to the foolishness that we can publish.”

One is inclined to be despondent over the state of the poetry market when such doggerel as the following—one stanza out of five to match—is seriously given as an exercise for Sunday-schools in the Cincinnati Concert Quarterly :—

“Pa spoke up, and with a switch,
You be sure he struck it rich,
Boys must not be cross and fight,
But, like lilies, should be bright.”

It is encouraging to have different denominations come to the defence of the young men of the country. They have been blamed for non-attendance at church; but Methodists, Presbyterians, the Christian Endeavor Societies, and some others show that they not only attend church, but there is great activity in religious matters among them. Will the young men of the Unitarian folds stand up and be counted?

An exchange calls attention to the anxiety of Father Phelan in the Western Watchman over the moral dangers of the Christian Endeavor meeting in Boston next July. Father Phelan says: “Swarms of motherless girls floating over the country, North, South, East, and West, are a sight not calculated to rejoice the heart of the moralist. Nothing so monstrous is met with in the entire history of Christianity.” This is highly exaggerated; but there is enough truth in the suggestion of possible danger to put parents on their guard in sending their young people from home in such crowds. The boys as well as the girls should be shielded from evil.

WOMEN’S COLLEGES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Why does our Unitarian Year Book, in its list of colleges and theological schools, omit all recognition of the women’s colleges, as Smith, Wellesley, and the like? I have only the 1894 one with me, but not one is alluded to in that; though for 1895 even the “Old Farmer’s Almanac” includes them in its list.

AN OLD HOUSE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

An item in the Christian Register with reference to the old Van Rensselaer house reminds me of an old house I well remember of my boyhood in Medford, the old Gov. Cradock house. According to Rev. Charles Brooks, in the “History of the Town of Medford,” it was built in March, 1634.

BOUND “CHRISTIAN REGISTERS.”

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Do you know any one who would like to purchase forty volumes of the Christian Register, from January, 1844, to November, 1863, quite handsomely bound and in perfect order?

Miss Eliza S. Blunt, Bay Ridge, N. Y., has the volumes for sale.

SECOND-HAND “REGISTERS.”

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Will any one willing to send away Registers after reading them write to the undersigned, when the names of persons who would like to read the paper, but cannot afford to take it, will be sent to them?

Address E. E. M.

IT DOES NOT MATTER.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

It is often said that “it does not matter” when the Episcopal service is read at the funeral of a Unitarian; but, however the request strikes the general mind, should not all persons embracing our free and lofty faith cherish for the same a thorough loyalty? How can they, if really Unitarian, think it does not matter what expression be given to the world concerning affairs of either life or death? Certainly, the reading of the Episcopal ritual at such a time does not leave the impress of a deep devotion to the higher faith.

I am moved to speak, from a sense of honor and gratitude due to the blessed faith by which I was formerly liberated from the bondage of old beliefs. I do not believe that we can at any time (conscientiously) say that it does not matter what we think or do.

If we desire our own faith to increase, and if we long to uplift the world, how can any of us be too loyal to our professions and innermost standards?

Would that every one calling himself Unitarian realized the importance of strictly adhering to honesty of thought, word, and action! Then might we expect a true regard from outsiders, who would see that we really bear witness to our faith.

UNITARIAN.

LITERATURE FOR THE POOR WHITES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Allow me to thank the many readers of your paper for their generous responses to an appeal recently made by me in behalf of the poor whites of “Spoke Branch.” These responses have come from some outside our own communion, which to me is one of the most gratifying features of the movement. Allow me also to remind the readers of the Christian Register that the work in which I am engaged is undenominational or, perhaps, I ought to say interdenominational; and, therefore, I cannot use denominational literature. Nor do I want garret dumpings; that is to say, books, magazines, and papers which are not merely the worse for wear, but thoroughly antiquated. The fact that the mountaineers, whom we desire to help, are for the most part poor and ignorant, is the best reason in the world why they should have the latest and best literature, Second-hand books, magazines, and illustrated papers, to be acceptable, must be good.

A CHALLENGE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I wish that every Unitarian minister could read the sermon preached last Sunday by Rev. Dr. Booth, the moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, now in session in Pittsburg, Pa.,—subject, “Christ lifted up to draw the world unto him.” In this sermon, as printed in the daily newspapers of Philadelphia of Monday, May 20, we have the Presbyterian doctrine of the atonement presented in all its repulsive ghastliness, with all its outrages upon the laws of justice and all its degrading conceptions of the divine character. I wish every Unitarian could read it: it would do our missionary work more good than the most eloquent appeal of a Hale, a Savage, or any of our Unitarian leaders.

There is a feeling more or less prevalent among us that the Orthodoxy of to-day is not what Orthodoxy used to be; that the churches are gradually abandoning the old doctrines, etc. This sermon, however, was preached by the man who has just received the highest honor his denomination can confer. He preached this sermon in the “Assembly Church” before a congregation composed of the representatives of the governing body of his denomination; and he takes advantage of this very important opportunity to present the “sacrificial” atonement as the central point in Presbyterian theology, and with great frankness he presents it in unmistakable language and in its most unreasonable and offensive form.

Of course, the so-called liberal element in that Church will dissent. No doubt they were shocked to hear it; but there is nothing in their past history that warrants us in believing that they will even enter any protest against it. Doubtless they will “stay in the Church, and endeavor to reform it from within.”

But our duty is plain. We have our missionary work, as Unitarians, indicated for us in this sermon. We do not need, for awhile at least, to hunt for any new truths: we certainly have all we can utilize for some time to come. We simply need consecration and faith. If we will proclaim God’s eternal truth as he gives it to us, if we will present the real Jesus, show what his real work was, will only set over against this caricature of the gospel the real gospel, we may trust the Power that holds this universe in its keeping to give our words the power they need to convince men that God is our Father, and not the monster that this hideous doctrine represents him?

Can we not lay aside metaphysics and all the kindred sins that so easily beset us, if only for a little while, and preach the gospel that Jesus brought? Show the world the Father! Show the world the real Jesus, the Revelator, the Way, the Truth, the Life!

GEORGE W. STONE.

MENDICANTS.

We are as mendicants who wait
Along the roadside in the sun.
Tatters of yesterday and shreds
Of morrow clothe us every one.

And some are dotards, who believe
And glory in the days of old;
While some are dreamers, harping still
Upon an unknown age of gold.

Hopeless or witless! Not one heeds,
As lavish Time comes down the way
And tosses in the suppliant hat
One great new-minted gold To-day.

O foolish one, put by your care!
Where wants are many, joys are few;
And at the wilding springs of peace
God keeps an open house for you.

But there be others, happier few,
The vagabondish sons of God,
Who know the by-ways and the flowers,
And care not how the world may plod.

They idle down the traffic lands,
And loiter through the woods with spring.
To them the glory of the earth
Is but to hear a bluebird sing.

They, too, receive each one his day;
But their wise heart knows many things
Beyond the sating of desire,
Above the dignity of kings.

THE NINETEENTH-CENTURY RENAISSANCE.

BY ARTHUR CHAMBERLAIN.

It is almost a truism to say that the present age is always the age that is misunderstood. If, however, we can recall any historical period in which those forces that we dimly recognize as at work around us seem to have their counterparts, we shall find them sufficiently distant for us to lose sight of the half-pertinent and useless details, the personal estimate will have less weight with us, and we may be able to judge something of the outcome of present affairs by comparing the drift of to-day with that of a bygone era.

The Renaissance of the fifteenth century, and the Reformation of the sixteenth which that Renaissance made possible, are brilliant and familiar pages of history. Classical learning, a stranger to Europe for centuries, was driven over the Continent when Constantinople fell into the hands of the Turks under Mohammed II., and the cathedral of the Emperor Justinian became a Mohammedan mosque. The invention of printing increased the possibilities of instruction in this "new learning," which shortly became almost a passion on the part of those students who had fed so long on the dry husks of mediæval scholasticism. Meanwhile artillery was changing the very constitution of society, and Columbus and his followers were giving to Europe a conception of the physical world commensurate with that of the new world of thought.

All this extension of the intellectual boundaries could not be without its influence upon the Church. The new dignity that human life took on from the classical point of view was in direct and healthful antagonism to the ascetic idea that had for so long a time caricatured Christianity, and the new temper toward all that savored of ecclesiasticism made an open Bible one of the earliest triumphs of the printing-press. Theologians turned from discussions relative to the number of archangels that could rest upon the point of a needle and equally important speculations, to consider by what right pope or priest exercised dominion over the temporal affairs of kingdoms or of individuals,—a discussion which finally included their right in spiritual affairs as well, which questioned the very foundation doctrines themselves, until Rome found herself called into court by the reformers on what was virtually an all-inclusive writ of quo warranto.

It was a sad time for those who regarded the form rather than the substance of Christianity, and those devout souls who saw nothing save wholesale destruction in the upheaval may be pardoned when men as daring as More and Erasmus shrank from the consequences of their own logic.

To-day, as this century draws toward its close, we are conscious that the questioning spirit is once more abroad; and, as we look more closely, we realize that many of the disturbing elements which characterized the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries are now present. So that, by comparing the two eras, we may find a lesson of comfort and of hope that will give us courage to go forward.

Our renaissance, like the earlier one, starts with a fresh intellectual impulse; but our "new learning" has its source from more ancient times than those of Greece and Rome. Science takes the place of literature, and leads us back to those periods in the history of the world's formation that make the history of classical times a record of yesterday. The explorations of geology, the measurement of sidereal distances, the approximate determination of the mass of distant suns and of their course through space,—all this, however, was the work of science in its earlier days, before it realized the kinship that draws all creation into a vital unity.

We have learned that the distant worlds are formed of the same materials that make up this; that space is no void, but is filled with infinitesimal bodies that show the working of an intense energy, perceived by us in light, heat, chemical changes, and in the very attraction of gravitation itself. Electricity is losing its novelty as a working force, and has become an every-day drudge for us, carrying our messages, driving our cars, lighting our streets and our houses, regulating our indoor temperature, assisting the surgeon at the operating-table, —in a word, making possible the complex civilization of this century's last decade.

But science does not stop with any mere ministry to our comfort and convenience. The mediæval quest was for knowledge: the modern quest is for life. If science has driven the dryads from the woods forever, dispeopled the air of its sylphs and the water of its Undines, burnt up the salamander in its retorts, and crushed the gnome in its stamping-mills, it has at the same time made known to us forms and conditions of life more wonderful than any of those ancient fables. The microscope itself cannot show us some of these forms in their separate existence: they are only perceptible to the eye of the intellect. But in these minute bodies that float within us as well as around us, not less than in the immensities of inter-stellar space, does Science find that life which she seeks, though its secret eludes her still.

What can be more natural than that this broadening of mental conceptions shall quicken the interest of men in spiritual things as well? It is true that the Renaissance called men out of their absorption in theological speculation to the consideration of other matters, but it was only to give them a vantage-ground whence they might view those "eternal verities" no longer shrouded by the mists of dogmatism. In its keen interest in theology the Puritan epoch of New England bears a certain likeness to the period which preceded the Renaissance, but with this marked difference in their aims: the Schoolmen either concerned themselves with fantastically metaphysical problems or they became special pleaders on behalf of a great ecclesiastical organization. The Puritan strove in all sincerity and truth to “Assert eternal Providence,

And justify the ways of God to men.”

That there is an interest in the things of the spirit in the life of to-day ought to be evident to any one who will take the trouble to look a little below the surface. Religion has not only asserted her claim to rule in social affairs,—the organization of labor and of charity, the higher education of women, the popular control of industry,—but she has revised as well that theological code which has always been her undisputed possession. This is not done at the dictates of "science," as many people seem to imagine, but only in loyalty to that truth which reveals itself to earnest inquiry, under whatever name it is carried on. If to be accurate in observation, skilful in experiment, cautious in deduction, and modest in statement be scientific, the more we have of science, the better, if we desire to learn the truth.

The higher criticism, with its reverent regard for truth, will not injure religion in the estimation of men. That criticism—so long as it is worthy of the name—will not assume infallibility nor refuse to admit new evidence. Superficially considered, the movement in this direction must appear as its correspondent did to the rank and file in the sixteenth century,—as all great theological movements have appeared, whatever has been the time of their coming. The new wine has often burst the old bottles wherein careful men have sought to confine it, and the bursting of the bottles has seemed the destruction of the vineyard. Courage! The vine cannot wither, nor will the grapes cease to grow.

There are religious perceptions that transcend the scientific investigation of physical phenomena, and the true scientist is one of the first to admit that fact. He will not undertake to state on these lines the scientific basis of prayer, nor to analyze the impulse that goes out into worship and praise. He will not pronounce a quickening of the usual methods of development and growth to be impossible, nor will he ever make his self-confessed ignorance a basis for dogmatic denial. It is only where theology undertakes to rest upon certain propositions that belong to the exact sciences or are avowedly physical in their nature that he takes his share in the debate. Any proposal to rest the truth of Christianity upon the statement that two and two is five would be properly rebuked by the declaration of the mathematical truth that two and two is four. Any attempt to discredit the record of the Infinite in geological strata works at the hands of science a like confusion to the presumptuous dogmatist.

The best gift that the nineteenth century Renaissance has for us lies in its new conception of the foundations of spiritual life,—that religion is not at the mercy of the mistakes which fallible men have made in bygone ages, that theology may revise its creeds without the possibility that the essentials of religion can be changed thereby. For, as we come nearer to a perfect conception of what this universe is, we find it a unity,—the same elements in star-dust and in the common earth at our feet, the same law as potent in the most distant sun as in this world on which we live; life in myriad forms, but growing finer as it rises in the scale, with greater capacities for use, accomplishment, beauty, and enjoyment,—a knowledge which testifies that the universe is founded on truth and carried on into higher and more perfect life by the Love that is at the heart of it all.

THE EVOLUTION OF CHARACTER.

BY R. E. WHITMAN.

It has been suggested that Prof. Drummond, in his "Ascent of Man," might well have gone a step farther in applying the principles of evolution to the growth of the soul. I have ventured to adopt this suggestion, and follow out the train of thought thereby indicated.

To many the thought of evolution, as they understand it, is a painful one. Instead of an eternity of changeless bliss it suggests one in which the old order is ever changing, giving place to new and unlooked-for elements, in which nothing endures, nothing is safe. The instinct of human nature is to seek for stability, for permanence. Like children on a happy holiday, we wish that the sunlit afternoon could last forever; and even some hardships are half regretted when they are past. This instinct it is which, in one form, is opposed to progress of any sort,—the conservative instinct, crying, "Change is death," looking only on the surface of things. These are the people who ask if the new views bring any new happiness to mankind that can better the old content. If evolution does not do this, it may well be doubted; for every great new thought—loyalty, comradeship, love, freedom—has left the world happier for its new grasp of truth. The content that comes of falsehood is a fools' paradise at any rate, even if the new truth brought no happiness. All joy that we have is the result of progress. Each new thought has helped along what humanity is ever trying to do,—see beyond the present. The savage just emerging from the beast may resent the curtailing of his own freedom to lift his hand against whom he will; but, when he has once well learned the lesson of loyalty to his chief and to the clan, tradition begins, and the desire of fame, the longing to have his name handed down to future generations, overpowers all else. But this order must change, else it will be its own destruction. The desire of fame is not annihilated, but makes room for new elements, and is itself thereby refined and intensified. But for this, ambition, the last infirmity of noble minds, must have remained the ambition of the savage to hang as many scalps as possible in his wigwam. We must listen to the watchword of the nineteenth century,—human brotherhood, reverence for the rights of man,—or go the way of all nations that have trampled on those rights. The time was when military valor was the only condition of a nation's permanence. That time is past, and now men are talking as if material wealth could satisfy those conditions for all centuries to come. But the love of power, the dominance of the strong over the weak, will be its own destruction, if some larger thought does not make room for itself in the life of the race.

In the churches the conservative instinct is but mistaking shadow for substance. Knowing that there is something real and true within himself which he would not lose for all the world, the churchman supposes that this must be lost because it has changed its name. Some savages refuse to tell their names to a stranger, for fear they may thus put themselves in his power. The Indian will not have his portrait painted, for fear of somehow losing a part of himself. Men cling to money, to houses, to station, feeling that in losing these things they lose themselves. They cling to creed as the one permanent thing in a world of change. It is said of the wife of John Ward that to her his belief was no more than a dress of the mind: his character was unchanged. That is the true estimate. Belief is of the intellect: character is of the soul. Its manifold expression is the writing of the infinite Mind upon a finite creature, but the writing is not the thought. Burn the letter of your friend, you have not destroyed his thought. He may write in a dozen different hands, may express his thought in music, painting, or action; but the character, the soul behind the writing, is still the same. Changelessness of form is hopeless death, not life,—the death for which there is no resurrection till the centuries disintegrate the rock, and some living thing can feed upon it. That which has no life in itself must feed life, and herein is true loss of identity. The plant leaves life behind it to continue its own, but stone once disintegrated will not be stone again. In life, in progress, is the true permanence, the longer probation, the swifter progression.

The evolution of character, therefore, must be from lower to higher, because of the life it holds within itself. But what of the life which seems to fail? It may be only that the soul had unmanageable materials to work upon, is blurred and imperfect in its expression, as a painter could not with his brush execute the delicate designing of the draughtsman. But, when the right tools come to hand, the character may blaze forth in unlooked-for strength and beauty. Character is shown by expression, but expression is not character. To drop the simile, character is that hidden life which is partly shown in deeds and words, but whose expression may be hindered by bodily infirmities or outward circumstances or temperamental bias. Let us not confuse it with its shadow. We see through a glass darkly, and must make allowance for the laws of refraction. The soul may conquer outward disabilities; but, if it does not, it is always an open question whether it was fault or misfortune.

“So let the balance still be mute:
We never can adjust it.”

EVERY-DAY PHILOSOPHY.

BY WILLIAM ROUNSEVILLE ALGER.

VIII.

Unspeakably intense in the stillness of its sparkling gloom, the hemisphere of night hung overhead, like the starred pall of eternity. And the silence itself was the infinite voice of God addressing the soul without a word. And the soul heard with an awe which annihilated the universe and brought its own unendurable infinitude into consciousness.

When November and December come, with their mournful winds and faded colors, the year has burned its strength away; and in the withered leaves and fallen snow we tread among the embers.

Loyola laid great stress on mortification and union with God through mortification. But a wiser and more wholesome method lays still greater stress on vivification and union with God through fulfilment of uses.

"It matters little," Loyola said, "if one serve the world lazily and carelessly; but to serve God negligently is not to be endured." But, in truth, God has no need of service; and the only way we can serve him is in serving his creatures or fulfilling his purpose in ourselves. To serve the world is a part of our duty, and all duty is a service of God.

A collection of the tributes paid by great men to other great men would be a precious fund of inspiration. For example, Goethe said, "Shakspeare, wert thou alive, my place could be nowhere in the world save at thy feet." And Schumann said, "Music owes almost as great a debt to Bach as religion owes to Christ."

He best appreciates the past who uses it most to improve the future.

When character works on character, as it takes effect, everything seems fresh, and intercourse sparkles with interest. The soul of a character is the stamp of a bias, a devotedness to ends. The more character one has, the greater his originality, and the more salient his variety of differences from the parroting crowd. These differences are the qualities which constitute distinction, attract notice, exercise charm, and impart stimulus. Average society is such a weariness because its members are so characterless.

What are the chief uses of bygone divine experiences? To comfort us in present disappointment or dryness, to sustain faith, to kindle aspiration, to inspire patient effort, and to be a treasure for impartation to others.

The only way in which some men can show that they are pleased is by laughing.

He who best loves the glorious memories of the past will cherish the noblest hopes for the future.

If the fear of the Lord is the first stage of wisdom, the second stage is obedience, the third stage is trust, the fourth stage is love, and the last stage is peaceful delight.

What is that sin against the Holy Spirit which Christ characterized as unpardonable in all worlds? Indocility. The distinctive function of the Holy Spirit is teaching. This office is neutralized by obstructiveness in the pupil. This obstruction evidently constitutes an intrinsic unpardonableness as long as it lasts. But a surprising light suddenly breaks in here, as everywhere else in the divine Providence. For, although the sin cannot be forgiven, it can be expiated and outgrown. Obstructive indocility is an indurated insensibility to the meanings of phenomena, both external and internal. The effacing and redemptive atonement for this is made when one acquires a sensitive faith in the omnipresent hierarchy of meanings, and keeps himself open to their instruction, with a spirit attentive, docile, obedient, reverential, and aspiring.

Memory is an imperfect power of recalling what was in what is. When we die, it seems that this power will either become absolute knowledge or infinite oblivion, accordingly as it then participates in the omnipresent Omniscience or is effaced in nonentity. Which will it be? The believer in God, if he is consistent, affirms absolute knowledge; the unbeliever, infinite oblivion. The difference between the two is overwhelmingly sublime in one direction, unspeakably appalling in the other. But both the sublimity and the horror, of course, go for nothing with those who, from thoughtlessness or preoccupation, are insensible to their meanings and their contrast.

THE FINITE IMPLIES THE INFINITE: A RECONSTRUCTED WAIF.

I have had all. Over and through that all, Like a small speck of fire within the eye, A mote, scarce visible, began to crawl And spread and fly, till wide eternity Straightened itself to measure out a pall Where I might lie.

Life tempted me, as the great hungry sea Calls with inevitable voice to youth. Nor fear nor ruth nor the still word of truth Kept the red wine or bitter lees from me, Or showed me what my sovereign aim should be.

I lived, forsooth!

Sweet things of earth, in sequence of their birth, Springing to fevered lips, there met disdain, Importunate and angry with her mirth. Each honeyed gain obtained with patient pain Turned out a poor deceit, devoid of worth. All was in vain.

I have had all. And all has been as naught Against the boundless craving of my thought.

The greatest gifts a greater want awake, Which they still more insatiable make. Till in each gift he sees the One who gives, In vain man lives.

As in the blossom where the night-moths sup, Beneath the honey, through the pure perfume, One little spot with threatening eye looks up, And past the bloom foresees a coming gloom, So doth unsated thirst in each drained cup Find lurking room.

It is my God holds over me this rod, That I may follow where two bleeding feet Through sacrifice their way in triumph trod. When turns to wretchedness each finite sweet, I clasp the Whole, whose infinite complete Fills soul and sod.

CONFIRMATION CLASSES.

BY REV. GEORGE W. CUTTER, M.D.

Among the older churches of Christendom—the Greek, the Latin, the Lutheran, and the Anglican—confirmation has been observed as a natural and necessary step in the religious development of the individual. Usually, it was an open and formal act, whereby a young person, having reached years of discretion, signified his desire for newness of religious life and confessed his obligations as a child of God, as a member of the body of Christ, and an inheritor of the eternal kingdom. Standing before the congregation, the candidate was asked if he was resolved "to renounce the fellowship of evil and to learn and do the will of God as revealed by Jesus Christ." Having declared this to be his solemn purpose, the officiating minister laid his hand upon the head of the candidate, and said, "Defend, O Lord, this thy child with thy heavenly grace, that he may continue thine forever, and may daily increase in thy Holy Spirit more and more, until he come into thine everlasting kingdom."

It was a beautiful and impressive service, looked forward to eagerly and reverently by the young, heartily encouraged and gratefully witnessed by parents and friends, and celebrated as an occasion of joy and thanksgiving by the church. Let us ask if this service, or something similar, may not find a proper place in the usages of our simple Congregational form of religious thought and culture. The rite of confirmation was not acceptable to our fathers of the Puritan and Calvinistic frame of mind. To them it savored too strongly of Romish superstition and priestly assumption. But, as the fears and prejudices of a former age have subsided, something not unlike a form of confirmation has already been introduced into some of our churches, and has been attended with results so helpful and encouraging that the service is steadily growing in favor among all those who believe in the organic life of our body, and desire to have the young brought into closer fellowship with its worship and more fully identified with its highest objects.

Notice that confirmation followed naturally upon a simple course of instruction in what were considered the essential precepts and principles of religion. Whatever training had already been given by parents and teachers was made the basis for further advance and edification in divine things. In the same way we would assume that the home, the Sunday-school, and the church are not at variance and not rivals in their efforts to deepen and strengthen the moral and spiritual elements of the young, but act in cordial sympathy and co-operation in developing the latent principles of reverence and aspiration, and directing to the loftiest ideals of character and conduct. What is begun by parents or teachers should be carried on and confirmed by higher and larger instruction in the more serious tasks of Christian thought and activity. So long as earlier instruction was slighted or neglected in the home and Sunday-school, as has too often been the case, confirmation was also treated with indifference; and it has often been left to chance or accident whether or not our boys and girls were made to feel the value of our liberal Unitarian heritage or reminded of the part they should perform in the life and work of the Church. In fact, one of the startling things in this connection has been the utter indifference with which many parents have treated the entire matter, in some instances even taking the ground that they would rather not do anything to influence the religious thought or faith of their children, or commit them to any form of church fellowship, but would leave them quite free to choose and decide for themselves when they were grown up. As a rule, this apparent liberality was only a pretext or excuse for avoiding a delicate and difficult task, a plain duty, which is incumbent upon every father and mother who really valued the religious culture and moral development of their children. Religious training ought, indeed, to be considered more carefully than any other part of youthful education. If, as we believe, we hold a more helpful, inspiring, and reasonable faith than the other churches; if the central and vital principles of our religion are not only in accord with the highest ideals of Jesus, but also most free from perplexing technical and theological notions, and, moreover, appeal most directly to the finer intuitions of the child's heart and conscience,—then it is not only our right, but our imperative duty to pre-occupy the mind, prepossess the heart, and, by whatever attraction or incentive we may employ, to engage their affections and predispose the mind toward that which to us is certainly the highest and the best.

We need at least to practise that wise guardianship of our young which will protect their religious feeling from being perverted by those who are lying in wait for them at every turn, and who are only too thankful to us for giving them the opportunity. Nothing has proved more weakening and damaging to our church life and prosperity than the folly, apathy, and unconcern of those who should be most jealous to defend the moral and mental rights of the young. Let us first teach them the simple truth, as we understand it, leaving them quite free to acquire more truth with added years and larger experience.

Of course, it will be objected by some that confirmation is merely a form. That is true. Yet let us remember that no great or lasting work can be carried on in this world without forms; and, if we, as a religious body, have any practical aims, definite purposes, and common convictions, we must give them suitable expression in outward symbols. Is it too ritualistic? Not if it contains a real meaning, not if it signifies an earnest purpose, not if it points to a pure and lofty ideal of character, to be attained through constant prayer and endeavor. Is it un-Unitarian? In the words of one of our wisest ministers, I would reply that "there is nothing un-Unitarian but folly and sin." For our liberty of prophesying is so grand and broad that it leaves us just as free to adopt and adapt from the forms of other churches whatever suits our purpose as to reject whatever is inconsistent with our principles of pure and rational religion. For myself, I shall not object to classing the rite among the sacraments; i.e., "an outward, visible sign of inward spiritual grace." For, as I regard it, it is or should be a distinct, deliberate, and serious step in the religious development of the young, and, as administered by us, denotes, not that any miraculous gift is conferred by the minister, nor that any magical power intervenes to change the nature of the child or the feeling of God toward him, but that the young man or woman has reached a period in life when he begins to see for himself its deeper meaning and responsibilities, and to take his proper place in the life and work of the church. The confirmation class simply anticipates this transition period in the religious growth of the young, and provides for its careful and sympathetic oversight. I find that there is a lingering prejudice in the minds of some of our people to such a course, because they are disagreeably reminded of the unnatural excitement of the "revival meetings," and of the arbitrary and artificial methods in vogue among the "orthodox," by which persons of immature thought and quick sensibility are wrought upon to confess something they do not feel and declare something they do not understand. Such a "conversion" is clearly an abuse of the natural religious sentiment of the young, yet it should not carry us to the opposite extreme of denying or ignoring that feeling. From Dr. Channing's time down to this day we have been insisting upon the native dignity and essential goodness of human nature. Let us now give that goodness practical recognition, and provide for its slow, normal, beautiful, consistent expansion.

A serious, thoughtful young girl, brought up in a Unitarian home and Sunday-school, who had never before witnessed a confirmation service, came home lately from an Episcopal church, and exclaimed, "How I wish that we had something like that in our church!" She was not carried away by the form, show, or outward parade of the service; but her heart was touched, her deeper nature thrilled, her devout but dormant feelings suddenly awakened by the event, and she longed to give some outward expression to emotions which, as never before, demanded an outlet. One of our ministers who first proposed such a service to a society in which nothing of the kind had ever existed was happily surprised at the large and eager response he received from eighteen young persons who were ready for the step. There is nothing surprising in this. If the work and study of the Sunday-school have been as they should be; if the young have for a series of years been instructed not merely in the cold, critical facts of Bible history, but also in the deep spiritual significance of religious lives; if they have learned not only the dry, didactic details about patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, but also how the God of Israel was the heavenly Father of Jesus, and is a near and tender Presence over all; how the noblest lives and most heroic men in all ages have drawn strength and inspiration from on high,—what more natural than that the young, whose better instincts have been stirred and whose ideals of heroic service have steadily grown in strength and beauty, should now desire to put in practice and realize in some degree these grand aspirations toward diviner life? The trouble is that we have become so afraid of emotion and so suspicious of all sentiment that we forget that emotion moves the world, and that every great or grand achievement in behalf of justice and humanity has been carried forward by feeling and sentiment rather than by reason, logic, or learning! And so, while the elders are cold, calm, and critical, I ask them to remember that there is a time when the young, touched with a divine enthusiasm for what is highest, long to give themselves without reserve, with a kind of heroic abandonment, to the service of holiness.

The confirmation class is the minister's golden opportunity. If wisely used for two or three months before Easter, he can instruct and inspire the young people of his parish in what they most need to receive, will gratefully accept, and may longest retain. I envy the ease with which every Episcopal rector each year finds, through the established usage of his church, a group of young persons ready to meet him for regular instruction, and ready to pass as a matter of course from the confirmation class to the confirmation service. The strength and success of the Episcopal Church, I suspect, lies in that simple rite rather than in its elaborate litany, in its pulpit performances, or its impressive ceremonies. True, the young may be attracted to the class through the personal appeal or indirect influence of the minister; and here is where he is called upon to exercise the greatest wisdom and sympathy in dealing judiciously with each candidate and in studying individual needs. Yet let him remember that he is working, not for himself, but for the highest good of each soul, and, in the end, he puts them in practical, vital relations with the church, as a community of Christian disciples, and with a cause which rightly claims their allegiance and demands their continued service and sacrifices. The man, the minister, may then leave that parish; and another may take his place. But the church is not thereby weakened, nor the interest and devotion of its members abated. And this, surely, is a positive gain. To succeed in this work, we must have not only the consent and co-operation of all our ministers, but also the hearty assistance and sympathy of parents and guardians and the concerted action of all workers in our Sunday-schools. In other words, the confirmation class and service should be made the accepted and established usage in all our churches. All the lines of work and study in the Sunday-school should converge toward this end; and it should be looked forward to as a blessed and happy event, as the eager undergraduates in college or seminary gladly equip themselves for commencement day. And commencement day, as we know, is not the final goal of life, but simply marks the beginning of a new epoch of larger service and graver responsibility. If our cause is to deepen and grow; if the principles we hold dear are to take positive and definite shape, not only in pamphlets, essays, and manuals, but also in the character and conduct of devoted men and women associated in church life and work; if we, as a religious body, are to have a future fulfilling the hopes of the past generation and at all adequate to the demands of our time,—we must begin with the children.

WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST?

BY H. W. HAZZEN.

I hold the five following answers to the above question complete, final, and conclusive, needing no comment. The first is from David Masson's lecture on "Carlyle's Literary Life and his Creed":—

"Christianity, as it has been professed by all the greatest spirits that have really believed in it anywhere on the earth through the nineteen centuries of its duration, has consisted of two things, united but distinguishable,—a metaphysic, or system of doctrines respecting the relations of God to man; and an ethic, or system of instructions for human conduct. Now, the essence of Christianity, when it offers itself as a supernatural revelation, lies, I hold, in its metaphysic. It lies in the belief that at a particular time in the history of mankind a miraculous shaft of light out of the unseen infinitude struck our earth in Judea, revealing to the Jews first, and afterward to the Gentiles, certain things about the divine Being and his procedure with men which men could never have found out for themselves, in the form of certain definite doctrines or propositions astonishing and almost stunning to the human reason. The ethic without this metaphysic may call itself Christianity, but is not, I hold, Christianity in any sense worth so special a name. To tell men, however earnestly, not to tell lies, not to commit fraud, to be temperate, honest, truthful, merciful, even to be humble, pious, and God-fearing, is very good gospel; but it did not require the events of Judea, as Christian theology interprets them, to bring that gospel into the world. The modern preacher who sermonizes always on the ethic and omits the accompanying metaphysic may sophisticate himself into a belief that he is preaching Christianity, but is preaching no such thing. Wherever Christianity has been of real effect in the world, and has made real way for its own ethic, it has been by its metaphysic,—that set of doctrines respecting things supernatural which was to the Jews a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness."

The second answer is from Carlyle on the "Hero as Divinity":—

"And now, if worship, even of a star, had some meaning in it, how much more might that of a hero! Worship of a hero is transcendent admiration of a great man. I say great men are still admirable; I say there is, at bottom, nothing else admirable. No nobler feeling than this of admiration for one higher than himself dwells in the breast of man. It is to this hour, and at all hours, the vivifying influence in man's life. Religion, I find, stands upon it,—not Paganism only, but far higher and truer religions,—all religion hitherto known. Hero-worship,—heartfelt, prostrate admiration; submission, burning, boundless, for the noblest, God-like form of man,—is not that the germ of Christianity itself? The greatest of all heroes is One—whom we do not name here. Let sacred silence meditate that sacred matter. You will find it the ultimate perfection of a principle extant throughout man's whole history on earth."

The third answer is from Dinah, the woman preacher in "Adam Bede":—

"Well, dear friends, who was this man? Was he only a good man,—a very good man, and no more,—like our dear Mr. Wesley, who has been taken from us? . . . He was the Son of God—in the image of the Father," the Bible says. That means just like God, who is the beginning and end of all things,—that God we want to know about. So, then, all the love that Jesus showed the poor is the same love that God has for us. We can understand what Jesus felt, because he came in a body like ours, and spoke words such as we speak to each other. We were afraid to think what God was before,—the God who made the world, and the sky, and the thunder and lightning. We could never see him: we could only see the things he had made. And some of these things were very terrible, so as we might tremble when we thought of him. But our blessed Saviour has shown us what God is in a way we poor ignorant people can understand: he has showed us what God's heart is, what are his feelings toward us."

The fourth answer is from Emerson's "Address":—

"Jesus Christ belonged to the true race of prophets. He saw with open eye the mystery of the soul. Drawn by its severe harmony, ravished with its beauty, he lived in it, and had his being there. Alone in all history he estimated the greatness of man. One man was true to what is in you and me. He saw that God incarnates himself in man, and evermore goes forth anew to take possession of his world. He said, in his jubilee of sublime emotion: 'I am divine. Through me God acts, through me speaks. Would you see God? See me; or see thee, when thou also thinkest as I now think.' . . . He felt respect for Moses and the prophets, but no unfit tenderness at postponing their initial revelations to the hour and the man that now is, to the eternal revelation in the heart. Thus was he a true man. Having seen that the law in us is commanding, he would not suffer it to be commanded. Boldly, with hand and heart and life, he declared it was God. Thus is he, as I think, the only soul in history who has appreciated the worth of man."

The fifth answer is from "Sermons and Addresses in America," by Canon Farrar, from the sermon therein entitled "Not a Sectarian Christ":—

"The main lesson of the nineteen centuries of Christ's history teaches us that all which mankind has ever known of the best and greatest has been derived from him. I see no danger to Christianity, if only Christ's sons abide in love, relying on his strength. Then the waves of the sea may rage horribly; but they will only roar and strike and be shattered into mist upon the winds, into scum upon the shore. Then the heathen may rage and the people imagine vain things; but Christus regnat, Christus vincit, Christus imperat. He sitteth above the water-floods, and he shall remain a king forever."

THE SERVICE OF THE CHURCH.

BY DR. RICHMOND FISK.

The irreligious man differs from the unreligious man. The first is an antagonist of religion; the second is negative and indifferent. The irreligious man sneers, the unreligious man looks on; and, if he says anything, he smilingly wonders what it all means, what it is all about. His religious life is in abeyance, his mind is closed on its skyward side, his spirit broods on the plain, and looks not to the hills and the heights. The irreligious man needs conversion: the unreligious man needs awakening. Now, no church justifies its existence that is not a power in converting the irreligious, in awakening the unreligious, and in feeding the religious with the bread of heaven. In this power the Unitarian, in common with all the churches of Christendom, finds its life and usefulness. In this power it lives and moves and has its being. This power is the power of truth, the power of righteousness, the power of love, the power of God. The Unitarian Church, without elaborating a fixed system of theology, is none the less theological. That is, it is affirmative of God, and of man as the child of God. It holds all truth as the truth of God and as needful to man. It opens the mind to the free winds of heaven, and fears not. It gives reason her heaven-born freedom, and sets free the spirit of man to find God and his love and blessedness wherever he may be found. Its constant cry to man is the call of an exalted manhood, in which all the talents of mind and heart shall be employed in the high service of building the personal and social fabric of life after the likeness of the spirit and manhood of Jesus. If it emphasizes the intellectual more than others, if it makes reason the authority and test of beliefs, if it finds salvation only in character, it is none the less, rather it believes itself all the more, spiritual and ethical and effective in placing religion above the fluctuating conditions of superstitions, speculations, and unreasoning credulity. Believing religion to be natural to man, it insists that the most perfect religious manhood as witnessed in Jesus is the most natural life of the child of God; that anything less is, at its best, but a life yet undeveloped, and which will only find its full nature when in conscious oneness with the life of God. Man most truly comes, and, indeed, can only come, to himself when he comes to God-like-ness.

THE EVOLUTION OF INDUSTRY.

BY SIR EDWIN ARNOLD.

Look at common modern existence as we see it, and note to what rich elaboration and large degrees of comfort it has come. I leave aside for the moment uncivilized nations and the bygone struggles of our race, its wars and woes, its tyrannies and superstitions, all of which history has greatly exaggerated, not telling us of the contemporaneous contentments. I invite you briefly to contemplate the material side of an artisan's existence in your own Birmingham. Let alone the greatness of being an Englishman and the supreme safety and liberty of his daily life, what king of old records ever fared so royally? What magician of fairy-tales ever owned so many slaves to bring him treasures and pleasures at a wish? Observe his dinner board. Without being luxurious, the whole globe has played him serving-man to spread it. Russia gave the hemp, or India or South Carolina the cotton, for that cloth which his wife lays upon it. The Eastern islands placed there those condiments and spices which were once the secret relishes of the wealthy. Australia downs sent him frozen mutton or canned beef, the prairies of America meal for his biscuit and pudding; and, if he will eat fruit, the orchards of Tasmania and the palm woods of the West Indies proffer delicious gifts, while the orange groves of Florida and of the Hesperides cheapen for his use those "golden apples" which dragons used to guard. His coffee comes from where jewelled humming-birds hang in the bowers of Brazil or purple butterflies flutter amid the Javan mangroves. Great clipper ships, racing by night and day under clouds of canvas, convey to him his tea from China or Assam, or from the green Shinghalese hills. The sugar which sweetens it was crushed from canes that waved by the Nile or the Orinoco, and the plating of the spoon with which he stirs it was dug for him from Mexican or Nevadan mines. The currants in his dumpling are a tribute from classic Greece, and his tinned salmon or kippered herring are taken from the seas and rivers of Canada or Norway. He may partake, if he will, of rice that ripened under the hot skies of Patna or Rangoon, of cocoa, that "food of the gods," plucked under the burning blue of the equator. For his rasher of bacon the hog express runs daily with ten thousand grunting victims into Chicago. Dutch or Brittany hens have laid him his eggs, and Danish cows grazed the daisies of Elsinore to produce his cheese and butter. If he drinks beer, it is odds that Belgium and Bavaria have contributed to it the barley and the hops; and, when he has finished eating, it will be the Mississippi flats or the gardens of the Antilles that fill for him his pipe with the comforting tobacco. He has fared, I say, at home as no Heliogabalus or Lucullus ever fared; and then, for a trifle, his daily newspaper puts at his command information from the whole globe, the freshness and fulness of which makes the news-bearers of Augustus Cæsar, thronging hourly into Rome, ridiculous. At work, machinery of wonderful invention redeems his toil from servitude, and elevates it to an art.

Is he fond of reading? There are free libraries open to him, full of intellectual and imaginative wealth. Is he artistic? Galleries rich with beautiful paintings and statues are prepared for him. Has he children? They can be educated for next to nothing. Would he communicate with absent friends? His messengers pass in the queen's livery, bearing his letters everywhere by sea and land; or, in hour of urgency, the Ariel of electricity will flash for him a message to the ends of the kingdom at the price of a quart of small beer. Steam shall carry him wherever he would go for a half-penny a mile; and, when he is ill, the charitable institutions he has too often forgotten in health render him such succor as sick goddesses never got from Æsculapius, nor Ulysses at the white hands of Queen Helen. Does he encounter accident? For him, as for all others, the bountiful science of our time, with the hypodermic syringe or a waff of chloroform, has abolished agony; while for dignity of citizenship he may help, when election time comes, by his vote to sustain or to shake down the noblest empire ever built by genius and valor. Let fancy fill up the imperfect picture with those thousand helps and adornments that civilization has brought even to lowly lives; and does it not seem stupid and ungrateful to say, as some go about saying, that such an existence, even were it transitory, is not for itself distinctly worth possessing? *

STREET CRIES IN CAIRO.

The water-carriers utter cries equivalent to "May God recompense me!" When they are accompanied by their employers, they ejaculate, "God forgive thy sins!" Instead of calling the names of their vegetables, those who sell them use such expressions as "God will make thee light, O lemons!" meaning that he will make the baskets that hold them light. Wandering cooks go about setting up their kitchens everywhere, and cook fish, puddings, and whatever they have, while their customers sit cross-legged along the side of the street. . . . The vender of roses cries, "The rose was a thorn, but the sweat of the Prophet caused it to blossom!" Beggars add to the confusion by screaming, "I am the guest of God and the Prophet," and toward night, "My supper must be thy gift, O Lord!"—American.

Spirit of the Press.

The Sacred Heart Review appreciates the liberality of Harvard:—

Harvard University, whose first teacher, by the way, Nathaniel Eaton, was a graduate of a Jesuit college, illustrates anew her liberal spirit, as well as that zeal in the cause of early American history which characterized Bancroft, Parkman, and other eminent sons of hers, by placing in Memorial Hall a splendid window commemorative of the work of the Jesuit explorer, Père Marquette, and the Catholic La Salle in the Mississippi Valley. This window is the gift of the class of 1875; and its figures were in a measure furnished by the lamented Francis Parkman, who gave the designers a copy of the only known original portrait of La Salle, the one at Rouen, in France, and advised them regarding that of Père Marquette.

The Watchman is trying to open the eyes of its readers to the value or lack of value of our jury system:—

One of the ridiculous anomalies of our legislation is the jury system which prevails in most of our States. In the days when a newspaper was a rarity, and the communication of intelligence was difficult and slow, the rule that anybody who has heard or read about a crime is presumptively disqualified from trying the criminal may have had something, but not a great deal, to commend it. At least, there was a chance that the application of the rule would not disbar from the jury-box the entire body of intelligent citizens. But that is exactly what this rule does to-day. Any one who has ever witnessed the process of impanelling a jury, in a case of any magnitude or notoriety, has been impressed with the fact that the law is devised with great ingenuity to put illiterate or half-witted men into the jury-box. If a man of intelligence gets a place on a jury, it is a pure accident, arising from the bad working of the law.

The Evangelist does not believe "the simple-minded Kirkland":—

The Armenian inquiry is not concluded. A report from our admiral, sent to the Levant, has just come in. From its tenor we infer one of two things: either there have been no outrages there or the simple-minded Kirkland has fallen into the hands of such gentlemen as are able to make him think lightly of the affair which has stirred the souls of Christendom. A fine old officer of our navy, blunt and honest himself, holding an inquest on the deck of his ship in the harbor of Alexandretta over an outbreak of the terrible Kurds, seven months ago, nearly a thousand miles inland among the wilds of Central Asia Minor, is a "demonstration" of American sympathy, but not a rigid test of truth. We admire Admiral Kirkland, and believe him to be entirely sincere. We believe, too, that the sultan himself did not plan the massacre. Nobody ever did believe that or so report. But that the massacre is a part of Turkish policy nobody doubts; and that the sultan knows it, and will only interfere to change it when driven to it by the mandate of public sentiment, backed by English authority, every intelligent man in Europe knows. And why we are to hide the truth from our eyes is a puzzle. That we can do it is past belief.

* Address at Birmingham and Midland Institute Oct. 18 1893.

Charles Dudley Warner, in Harper's Magazine, asks for consideration of the question, "Whither will Art lead us?" and compares the present situation with that of Italy in the fifteenth century. He says:—

The situation in Italy in the fifteenth century has a lively interest for us. We are witnessing in our day an assiduous and not altogether affected cultivation of æstheticism. There has been a frank return in many of the art capitals to the pagan idea of art and morality. Aside from the considerable æsthetic posing in London, which is merely for effect, there has been some not insincere belief that beauty is sufficient in itself to save mankind and to keep society pure, and that a beautiful line even has a sort of moral quality. It is curious to see what sort of society this theory produces, and to compare the art-for-art's-sake conceptions of life in Paris and London with that in Florence and Rome four centuries ago. The modern life is a good deal feebler and less bold, and not yet so corrupt; but there is a sort of æsthetic imitative effeminacy that is more corrupting than brutality. If the phenomenon of the fifteenth century is repeating itself in the nineteenth century, the query is whether it is merely a coincidence, or whether it is natural that the pursuit now of the Greek ideal of beauty should produce a society all adrift morally. If it is only a coincidence, it is not the only one. In the decay of faith, and in the scepticism as to Christian supernaturalism, there is in both ages the same resort of the superstitious to the study of occult sciences, to astrology and palmistry, to spirits in the air and belief in the antics of mediums, to theosophy and second sight. The two centuries run an equal race in credulity. The repetition is a little discouraging to the believer in progress, and the continual want of harmony between the love of beauty and the love of righteousness is perplexing. Perhaps there is no safer course for one than to sit squarely on the Ten Commandments, and let the world go round.

Spiritual Life.

The essence of true nobility is neglect of self. Let the thought of self pass in; and the beauty of a great action is gone, like the bloom from a soiled flower.—Froude.

Vigilance is watching opportunity, tact and daring in seizing upon opportunity, force and persistence in crowding opportunity to the utmost of possible achievement.—Austin Phelps.

Nothing is sweeter than love, nothing more courageous, nothing fuller or better in heaven or earth, because love is born of God, and cannot rest but in God.—Thomas à Kempis.

Spiritual serenity is spiritual strength. It comes in by no softness of sentiment, but by thorough work. It comes by a faith that emboldens and energizes the whole soul.—F. D. Huntington.

Speak to thyself the perfect word
Thou wouldst the world should hear,
Be by its noble duty stirred,
So shalt thou make it dear!
—William Brunton.

No soul can preserve the bloom and delicacy of its existence without lonely musings and silent prayer, and the greatness of this necessity is in proportion to the greatness of the soul.—Canon Farrar.

You picture to yourself the beauty of bravery and steadfastness. And then some little wretched, disagreeable duty comes which is your martyrdom, the lamp for your oil; and, if you do not do it, your oil is spilled.—Phillips Brooks.

Time is short in relation to opportunities. Every season has its own opportunity, which never comes back. Have you learned the infinite meaning of to-day? It has duties of its own. They cannot be left till to-morrow.—F. W. Robertson.

By doing my own work, poor as it may seem to some, I shall better fulfil God's end in making me what I am than if I were either going out of my own sphere to do work of another or calling in another into my sphere to do my proper work for me.—Ruskin.

It is comparatively easy under duty's lead to brace the will and go forward, dreading, but unflinching, to some large self-sacrifice; but harder far through sickness as in health, through tire as well as rest, through the anxiety as through quietness of life, to be sure to lift a mere cup of water even to a brother's lips.—W. C. Gannett.

The Sunday School.

The Channing Hall "talks," under the auspices of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, which have been carried on at 25 Beacon Street since September of last year, were closed on last Saturday. The course conducted by Miss Dockham for the primary teachers has had the steady and loyal support of faithful workers. Considering the small number of primary departments and kindergartens which we have in Boston and vicinity, the attendance was good throughout. Miss Dockham has charge in Chelsea of a very large primary department, and superintends one also at the First Church in Boston. These she serves, one in the forenoon and one at the beginning of the afternoon. The gathering of those who came to hear Rev. Mr. Pulsford for the last time this season was especially large. There has been a great deal of enthusiasm created in this series of "talks," and the deep sense of appreciation on the part of those who have been favored by Mr. Pulsford has been manifested in many ways. A vote of thanks was passed at this time for the able and inspiring way in which Mr. Pulsford taught the lessons, and individuals took opportunity to thank him most heartily. The subjects for next year in the Channing talks will be "The Teaching of Jesus," as illustrated in his parables, which will occupy the first twenty lessons. The other half of the course will be devoted to "The Beginning of Christianity," as shown in Paul's romantic and instructive experiences.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

REV. H. L. KELSEY, having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship of his fitness for the Unitarian ministry, is hereby commended to our ministers and churches. W. L. Chaffin, Chairman. D. W. Morehouse, Secretary.

REV. SAMUEL THOMSON, having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship of his fitness for the Unitarian ministry, is hereby commended to our ministers and churches. W. L. Chaffin, Chairman. D. W. Morehouse, Secretary.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. B. R. Bulkeley will preach June 2. Service at 10.30 A.M.

CHICAGO, ILL.—It is always an inspiration to read of the earnest, steady work that goes on in All Souls' Church; and every one who is interested in seeing how a church can face the practical responsibilities forced on it by this age of problems ought to study the annual Year Book, which appears punctually each Easter. Rev. J. L. Jones is supported by two paid parish assistants and a corps of directors or chairmen of the various sections of church activity. The Social Charity and Missionary Sections are partly explained by their titles. The report of the last named shows that the society contributes regularly to the Liberal Congress, the American Unitarian Association, the Church Building and Loan Fund, the Women's Conference, the Illinois State Conference, the Western Unitarian Conference, the Sunday School Society, the Montana and the Ramabai Schools; and this they have done regularly, in stated amounts, year after year. The Charitable Section includes work ranging from "the old clothes cupboard" and an employment bureau to social settlement plans. The Educational Section includes the Sunday-school, Unity Club, Confirmation Class, and the Lend a Hand department, with its various branches of library, reading-room, kindergarten, and manual training classes. It is no wonder that a correspondent writes, "Every year of my life I feel glad and more glad for All Souls' Church."

OAKLAND, CAL.—Rev. C. W. Wendte is to take two months' vacation from the Oakland church, which time he will spend travelling and preaching in the Northwest. Rev. Mrs. Wilkes will occupy the Unitarian pulpit of Oakland during Mr. Wendte's absence.

ROWE, MASS.—A correspondent says: "The Unitarian society here has been gradually growing smaller for years, until we hardly number enough to make it worth while to hire a minister and keep up our meetings; but we have struggled along from year to year. For two years we have had the help of an energetic man, Rev. Herman Haugerud. He had so much enthusiasm and life that he has kept us together. When our funds were nearly gone, and our numbers few, and the prospect was that we could not keep our pastor any longer, came unexpected help, in the shape of a check from Hon. George M. Stearns in memory of his parents. His father was one of our earliest pastors. This was a God-send, and it made our way clearer and brighter. We not only resolved to keep our minister, but to build him a parsonage to encourage him to remain with us. We shall use a part of the fund in building it, and name it the 'Stearns Cottage,' as a memorial. We shall be obliged to ask aid from our friends to complete the work already begun. Our minister has promised to remain with us for another year. The cottage will be completed by fall, and ready for occupancy by winter. All favors will be gratefully received, and any gifts from societies or individuals can be forwarded to Mrs. P. P. Chilcott, Mrs. B. T. Henry, or Mrs. Arthur Browning, Rowe, Mass."

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—May 15 saw a spreading out of the San Francisco Unitarian pulpit force. Dr. Stebbins preached a sermon before the graduating class of the State University; Rev. Mr. Eliot preached before the students and faculty at Stanford University; Mrs. Sprague preached in the Unitarian church at San José; and Mr. Sprague occupied the pulpit of the First Church, while Rev. W. M. Jones of San José preached in the Second Church in the morning.—Parish Visitor.

TROY, N.Y.—The Young People's Personal Improvement Club, an unsectarian society a year old, held a public meeting May 21 in the Unitarian church. There was a large attendance. The plans include a weekly session with a study class of forty-five minutes, the "Natural History of Society" having been the recent theme; a debate on some live topic; and a subsequent period of social enjoyment. The future work of the club will be loyal to these general principles, but elastic as to methods and details.

NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE BRANCH ALLIANCE.—The Branch of the Women's Alliance connected with the Second Congregational Church, Concord, N.H. (Rev. F. L. Phalen, pastor), extends a cordial invitation to all the New England Branches to meet with them on Tuesday, June 11. Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells will preside. Exercises will begin at 11.30 A.M. At the morning session Mrs. Mary B. Davis of New York, secretary of the National Alliance, will speak upon "Organized Work of our Women," to be followed by Mrs. Emma Phalen of Concord with a paper upon "Religious Reading." Box lunch at 1 P.M. (the women of the Alliance providing tea and coffee). In the afternoon Miss Eva Channing will speak upon "Our Work in the South." Trains leave Union Station, Boston, at 9 A.M., reaching Concord at 11.10. Returning, leave Concord at 5.05 and 6.30 P.M., reaching Boston at 7.10 and 8.45.

CONNECTICUT VALLEY CONFERENCE.—The semi-annual meeting of the Connecticut Valley Conference of Unitarian Congregational and Other Christian Churches will be held with the Free Congregational Society of Florence on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 4 and 5. On Tuesday evening the sermon to the conference will be preached by Rev. Minot Judson Savage of Boston. Subject, "The Church in Modern Life." On Wednesday morning "The Outlook for Liberal Religious Work" will be discussed by Rev. Messrs. Bradley Gilman, C. F. Abbott, Joseph Waite, James W. Carney, Richard A. Griffin, and others. At 10.30 o'clock a business session of the conference will be held. At eleven o'clock Mr. J. G. Thorp of Cambridge, Mass., will deliver an address on "The Norwegian Liquor Law." A general discussion will follow, in which speakers will be limited to five minutes each. At two o'clock a paper will be presented by Rev. Samuel M. Crothers of Cambridge. Subject, "The Religion of John Milton." The parish in Florence will provide a collation at 12.30 o'clock Wednesday for all who attend the meeting. It will also entertain on Tuesday night all who come; but those purposing to accept the hospitality of the society are requested to send their names to the minister, Rev. F. A. Hinckley, as early as convenient. The chairman of the Committee on Entertainment will be in attendance at the place of meeting, "Cosmian Hall," from 5 to 7 P.M., to receive such guests.

WISCONSIN AND MINNESOTA CONFERENCES.—The joint session of the Wisconsin and Minnesota Conferences of Unitarian churches was held at Menomonie, Wis., May 21-23. Tuesday evening Rev. W. W. Fenn of Chicago gave the opening sermon. The preacher sounded a clear, pure note, that might well set the key of the conference. Wednesday afternoon Rev. C. F. Niles gave a short address of welcome, which was responded to by Rev. F. C. Davis of Winona, acting president of the Minnesota Conference. The afternoon was devoted to a discussion of Sunday-school work. Rev. H. T. Secrist of Milwaukee had the meeting in charge. Rev. R. C. Douthitt of Baraboo read a paper on "General Exercises," emphasizing the cultivation of the spirit of reverence. Papers by Mrs. John Kelley of Menomonie, Rev. William Ballou of Fargo, and Rev. C. F. Brown of St. Cloud discussed "Methods of Class Work," "Sunday-school Literature," "Special Services," etc. "The Relation of the Liberal Church to American Citizenship and Social Reform" was the subject for the evening platform meeting, where Rev. Messrs. W. R. Lord of St. Paul, J. L. Andrew of Sioux Falls, H. T. Secrist of Milwaukee, and W. W. Fenn and T. B. Forbush of Chicago were the speakers. Rev. T. B. Forbush conducted the meeting of Thursday afternoon, when, under the general subject, "The Furtherance of Liberal Religion," Rev. Helen G. Putnam, Rev. T. G. Owen, Rev. F. C. Davis of Winona, Rev. W. W. Fenn of Chicago, and Rev. A. H. Norman of the Scandinavian church of Minneapolis gave their experiences. In the evening Rev. W. D. Simonds of Madison preached the closing sermon, on "The Relation of Religions to Industrial Progress." There seemed no limit to the hospitality of the Menomonie people, and the intervals of the conference were devoted to excursions and social intercourse. The societies represented were geographically pretty widely separated; but there was a feeling of unity of sympathy and purpose renewed that will help the isolated minister for many days to come.

Business Notices.

Worth Remembering. Those of our readers who like to gain a little in wisdom each day may borrow a hint from an advertisement which appears in another column, and benefit by the sound, practical wisdom which it contains. The idea is that, in proportion as you pay less money for an article, you must expend more care in its selection. In other words, it will be safe, perhaps, to purchase expensive furniture in almost any store; but it is only prudent to buy low-priced furniture of a reliable manufacturer. This piece of good advice is given our readers to-day by the Paine Furniture Company, and we commend it for their adoption.

THE ROYAL LAW.

BY K. H. AUSTIN.

Still falls on struggling hearts the strong behest:
"For neighbor as for self your love must be";
And still unfold new meanings, dimly guessed,
Within those words that bind and yet make free.

"Who is my neighbor?" "How shall self be aught
That love may nobly cherish and control?"
Again, and yet again, the answer sought,
In hope or anguish, reaches listening soul.

Again, and yet again, the call, "Come higher!"
Constrains the self to rise above its past,
And, gaining wider outlook, to aspire
For strength wherewith its bonds may be downcast.

Amid the discords of tumultuous life
It hears faint melodies, half understood,— Prophetic, broken tones above the strife,— Humanity confessing brotherhood.

It harkens while a slowly gathering sound,
A unison that seems a far prelude,
Thrills all its being with a sense profound
Of oneness with a mighty multitude.

In faltering accents of a world-wide throng
The words "Our Father" find accordant voice;
And softly swells through troubled air the song,
"In fellowship and sonship we rejoice!"

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

DIRECTORS' REPORT.

Seventy years ago, Wednesday, May 25, 1825, the American Unitarian Association was organized. The day before, without previous consultation, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association had been formed in London.

In that year Rev. Mr. Greenwood, who was just beginning his ministry at King's Chapel, discussed in a series of letters the resources and opportunities of the Unitarian churches of America. He counted in Massachusetts more than one hundred, in the rest of New England about ten, in the whole country about one hundred and twenty. There were some which he declined to classify, because it was not yet certain on which side of the line they would fall. There were some new congregations not yet thoroughly organized.

The first president of the Association was Rev. Aaron Bancroft, D.D.; the first vice-president, Hon. Joseph Story; directors, Rev. Messrs. Henry Ware, Jr., James Walker, Samuel Barrett; secretary, Rev. Ezra S. Gannett; and treasurer, Lewis Tappan,—historic names every one. In the first annual report acknowledgment was made of an income amounting to $1,812.17. Of this amount, for all purposes $885.20 was spent. The proceedings of those early days, with the record of the hopes, the anticipations, and the plans of our fathers, are exceedingly interesting. All were greatly interested in the Cambridge Divinity School, the erection of the building, and the dedication in 1826. The endowment of the Christian Register was a favorite project. Hope was excited by correspondence with Rammohun Roy, the eminent predecessor of Chunder Sen, Mozoomdar, and the other sages and saints who are now represented by the Brahma-Somaj in India. All eyes were turned toward the West with the expectation of planting Unitarian Congregational churches in Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, and other cities, then just springing into vigorous life and prosperity.

It has been often stated that Dr. Channing was not a friend of the new organization. The records disprove that statement. He did decline the office of president to which he was elected; but at the third and fourth annual meetings he made long and eloquent addresses, calling upon all the friends of religious liberty to combine to resist the encroachments of ecclesiastical tyranny and to assist in the spread of Unitarian Christianity. In impassioned speech he protested against the caution, the indifference, and the disorganizing spirit of those who hindered Unitarian progress. He said there seemed to be growing up among them "a party against party, a sect to suppress the sects, an army to fight for peace."

In 1830, when the work of the Association had begun to make itself felt, the executive committee reported in Massachusetts one hundred and forty-seven churches; in the rest of New England, thirty; in the other United States, sixteen; in all one hundred and ninety-three churches with one hundred and forty-seven settled ministers. In 1835, so greatly had the Association prospered that its members resolved to attempt raising $10,000, to be expended in missionary work. In 1844 a new push was made; and it is interesting to note the fact that then, as now and always, women came forward to lead in the work. They organized breakfasts, fairs, and sales throughout the seacoast towns of New England. In Roxbury they raised $1,910, in Medford $1,500, in the four churches in Salem $3,200.

Since Dr. Channing's protest against the attempts made seventy years ago to restrain by legal means the progress of Unitarianism in Massachusetts, times have so greatly changed that we no longer fear legal restraint or social obloquy. But meanwhile our nation has grown to such an extent that our opportunity and duty have expanded beyond anything which could have entered the thought of the founders. The problems remain the same, but the applications are vastly more important. That which Channing and his coworkers were doing for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts we are called upon to do for a nation vast beyond their anticipation, and as yet only at the beginning of its great career. Our problems now are how to reach the heart and mind of a thinking democracy; how to keep steadily in view the growth of men and institutions under the law of righteousness which is the end for which all religious institutions exist; how to maintain the conditions of mental liberty while standing fast also in our loyalty to the truth which has made us free. Passing now our seventieth year, we are called upon to demand and to take a larger place in the life of the American republic.

The death of Rev. Grindall Reynolds, D.D., for thirteen years secretary of the Association, was the first loss of the kind in the history of our body. Reverent and affectionate tributes to his memory, to the worth of his character, and to the value of his services have been put on record. One of his latest public appearances was at Harvard College on Commencement Day, when he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity. His sickness, beginning in August, and his death September 30, not only deprived your directors of the presence of a personal friend, but also took away their chief executive officer at a moment of great need. The National Conference had just come to a triumphant conclusion. The thrill of a new life was felt in our churches. All were moved to do something to correspond to our profession. The hopes and the specific plans and purposes of Dr. Reynolds had been buried with him. Sadly then, and somewhat in doubt, your directors faced the work of the year. They were busy men and women. It was impossible for them to give the time necessary for the carrying out of plans in consecutive order. A committee was appointed, consisting of Hon. George S. Hale, Rev. Minot J. Savage, Hon. John D. Long, Rev. Charles G. Ames, and Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells; and by the first of December an arrangement was made by which the present secretary came into the office four mornings in the week,—mornings, however, which have commonly lengthened into days.

It has been impossible for your secretary to do anything like justice to the eager wishes of your directors; to the opportunities which confront us on every hand; to the demands constantly made by workers in the field; to the expectations excited among liberal thinkers who look to us for sympathy; or to his own sense of duty and responsibility. The attempt has been made, first of all, to carry out and complete so far as known the plans of Dr. Reynolds; then to see to it that the work of the Association, as already established, should receive no detriment; and then according to our means and our working ability to lay out new plans for work.

At the outset of the year your directors were obliged to meet a serious financial problem. A brief historical statement will explain it. Ten years ago our parishes were for the first time represented by appointed delegates. At the annual meeting in 1885 the collections from the churches were reported at $33,000. The directors also reported that the proper work of the Association could not be carried on for less than $50,000, and that to meet the votes of the National Conference and the demands of our constituents $60,000 must be provided. It was then stated that for the expenses of the year $17,000 had been drawn from the General Fund. From that time onward Dr. Reynolds worked according to a policy annually declared and steadily defended. He said that it was absolutely necessary for the well-being of the Unitarian Church to found and maintain more Unitarian churches. He believed that in time the churches would rise to the level of the need, and contribute money enough to carry on the work with dignity and success. Meanwhile, he thought it to be not only his right, but his duty, to draw from the General Fund each year enough to supplement the contribution from the churches and the income from investments. Year by year he reported such action at the annual meeting of the Association, never without hope that, before the General Fund should fall below a dangerous level, the churches would rally to his support. Two years ago the General Fund had fallen to $86,000; and, although the contributions from the churches and individuals had risen to near $61,000, the danger line had been reached, and Dr. Reynolds sadly turned himself to the unhappy task of reducing expenses. He still believed, however, that in the next year he could lift the income from the churches to $80,000. You know what followed. The panic came. The income fell below $51,000; and, while last year the General Fund stood at $75,000, over against it there was borrowed money of more than $20,000. With the expenses much reduced, but still in excess of receipts from the churches and income from invested funds, the problem was a difficult one.

Before explaining how the directors have met their problem, it is needful to show the ground on which, ten years ago, Dr. Reynolds based his confidence and justified the expenditure of the General Fund. In 1881 there were on our list three hundred and thirty-eight societies. Since that time thirty-five have been omitted. One hundred and forty-eight new societies have been added. Some of these churches do not yet feel the power of an endless life. But we may say that by his policy resolutely carried out we have four hundred and fifty-one churches reported in 1895 in place of three hundred and thirty-eight societies reported in 1881. Dr. Reynolds's proposition was: Given to the Association a modest but sufficient income, and ten new Unitarian churches can be formed every year, besides giving aid and comfort to those temporarily weakened or not yet strong enough to go alone. His policy added one hundred and forty-eight societies to our list. The proposition of Dr. Reynolds was demonstrated. To accomplish this result, he believed himself justified in drawing from the General Fund year by year whatever was necessary. He was compelled, however, to admit that this policy had reached its limit.

Your directors came to the work of the present year with $20,000 left over from the previous year to provide for in addition to the annual expenses. The receipts of the year from ordinary sources have been $77,551.80. If the expenses of the year were to be measured by the current income, it would be necessary to apply the surgeon's knife without regard to consequences, and to cut all our expenses down to $77,000. Your directors believed that the representatives of the Unitarian churches here assembled would not approve of that disastrous reduction.

From extraordinary sources we have received $1,000, a loan repaid by the Third Unitarian Church, Chicago, Ill., also bequests as follows: Luther Blood, Groton, Mass., $16,980.26; Mrs. Susan E. W. Brackett, Cambridge, Mass., $9,766.67; Mrs. Lucy F. Breckenridge, Louisville, Ky., $5,000; James Brackett, Cambridge, Mass., $5,000; Charles G. Wood, Boston, Mass., $1,000; Miss Prudence C. Delano, Norwell, Mass., $500; Mrs. Anne M. Sweetzer, Boston, Mass., $45,000; Grindall Reynolds Fund, $1,197; Miss Caroline H. Ingersoll, Keene, N.H., $850.

Briefly stated, the results are these: All expenses up to May 1, 1895, have been paid. The General Fund has been reduced to a little less than $50,000, representing a market value of about $70,000. About $4,000 has been invested in the Brackett, Reynolds, and Ingersoll Funds; and in the Isaac Sweetzer Fund, $45,000.

Much attention has been given to the question whether or not legacies should be funded. In opinion your directors are not unanimous. Some approve of a policy common to missionary bodies in America of spending all available funds when they are needed. Some would fund all substantial legacies immediately. All agree, however, that the General Fund should now be largely increased. They would also, if possible, immediately invest every dollar received from bequests; but, to reach this desirable end, it will be necessary largely to increase the receipts of the Association from churches. With this in view an important change has been made in the organization of the Association. In your list of officers to be voted upon to-day you find the name of George W. Stone, who has been nominated with the expectation of paying him such a salary that he may devote all his time to the financial interests of the Association. He was named by the committee which nominated the secretary, afterward enlarged by the addition of Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, Hon. Daniel L. Shorey, and Mr. Francis Cutting. If $50,000 could be added to the income of the Association during the coming year, all legacies could be funded, the regular work carried on, and new enterprises undertaken. Your directors believe that in these two years of financial distress your Association has passed with as much credit and as little disaster as will be found in the records of the banks, railroads, and other financial institutions of the country.

So much we have said with a backward look. Now as to the future. What is before us in the way of duty and opportunity?

First, and least conspicuous of all to the general public, but most important for the health and perpetuity of our work, is a solid substratum of drudgery. Nine-tenths of all the work that is done by your officers, superintendents, and missionaries, is and must be done with steady and plucky attention to the slow processes of consolidation and growth. It is the part of your representatives to be patient when others are restless; to be resolute when others falter; to supply sustained energy when in others the first flash of enthusiasm fades out; and, finally, to make the discipline of labor, anxiety, and patience generate new courage, hope, and enthusiasm.

We have five missionary departments. We do not need to urge our five superintendents to increased zeal or to the discovery of new fields. The burden of their daily complaint is that they are restrained and compelled single-handed to do the work which might properly occupy the time of many. The financial difficulties of the last two years have made the burden of supporting the new churches more difficult than before, especially in the two Western departments. Enterprises well begun and on the way to self-support have been suddenly thrown back into a confusion worse than the difficulties of the beginning. It would be folly to go forward to found a new church if the advance required the abandonment of an older and equally hopeful enterprise. Most of our business affairs are coming into a sound condition; but the burden of debt rests heavily upon St. Joseph, Mo., Chattanooga, Tenn., Ithaca, N.Y., San Diego, Cal., St. John, N.B., and the Third Church in Worcester. With the new prosperity which is certainly coming to our beloved country, we have no doubt that in the tenth part of our work, which is dramatic and attractive to the general public of our constituency, new enterprises will solicit us, while old churches will come to resurrection. Albany, N.Y., has dropped from the list of our churches: it now proposes to assert itself with power. At Farmington, Me., the church closed for three years is now thronged with eager worshippers. At Willimantic, Conn., a new church starts almost spontaneously. New Haven only waits for the touch of a master hand and the guarantee of temporary support. At Memphis, Tenn., a new church building is eagerly asked for. The reports of the various superintendents, which will be sent to all the churches, will tell the story at which we only hint in these brief notes. One thing seems to us certain. Without the patient services of the five superintendents in the field, these two years of financial distress would have destroyed churches in every department. It is their duty to save churches as well as to create them.

In the Middle West there has been for several years an unhappy condition of affairs, for which all parties concerned, including the American Unitarian Association, declined to accept the responsibility. The cry, now grown strangely and sadly familiar, has been, "But you do not understand us." Let us hope that we are at the beginning of a new era of cordial understanding, in which, with a united West and the churches working harmoniously together for the things which they hold in common, the Association may be able to draw nearer to all of them and in a more helpful way to assist in building up the institutions of morality and religion upon which the welfare of our country depends. It is too early to prophesy as to the exact method and result of the effort now making to bury and forget the discord of the past while we go forward to new and better work together.

Our mission to Japan still waits for the full approval and co-operation of our people. The expenses of the present year have been reduced to nearly $7,000. We had at one time a school for the instruction of native preachers, manned by five American professors. Three, Messrs. Droppers, Liscomb, and Wigmore, were largely supported by a native Japanese school. Messrs. MacCauley and Lawrence were supported out of our funds. Messrs. MacCauley and Droppers now remain our only representatives. With the aid of Japanese teachers, they are doing their best against great odds. Unless help can be sent them, the school must be dissolved and our headquarters in Tokio become a preaching station and a Post-office Mission. Of the six Americans engaged in this work, one chose other occupation, two were driven out of the country by ill health, and one has died. It is no holiday task that engages our brethren on that distant shore.

The ministry at large, in the missionary districts, commended at the annual meeting last year, has gone on in a quiet way. In a score of places, with the superintendent of the department in charge meetings have been held with the help of speakers brought from distant places for the purpose. The more extensive campaign, planned by Dr. Reynolds and Mr. Van Ness, was on account of the death of Dr. Reynolds and the lack of funds suspended. New plans, however, will be made, which, while not involving extensive travels on the part of any but the secretary and the superintendents, will bring together, at important points in each department, men and women enough to carry on meetings with power.

For the rest of our work a few sentences must suffice. Several ancient churches of renown must still be assisted until new local conditions renew their ancient vigor or until their case is hopeless. Young churches must be carried through the period of immaturity. New churches must be planted as rapidly as possible. Places must be made both for the young men whom we are preparing for the ministry and for men of ability in other churches who are looking toward us for a new opportunity. The unsectarian schools in which our boys and girls might be educated should be encouraged and strengthened. New literature for the new times must be provided. The permanent funds of the Association must be increased by funding legacies. The current income must be increased from the good will of the churches. New methods must be devised by which local responsibility may be developed, and the business methods of the Association made more elastic. The rush of new business that is certainly coming to us, if the plans of your directors are carried out, will require patience, energy, and sagacity on the part of all concerned.

The New World, which the Association assisted to found, is now published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. without our help. An organization has been formed to secure for it an ample endowment. In the opinion of excellent judges in Europe and America this is the best magazine of the kind in the world, and to its claims no thinking Unitarian can be indifferent. The Christian Register, now in the seventy-fourth year of its existence, was fondly cherished by our fathers, and is worthy of the widest circulation. Something must be done to make its future more secure and increase its value. If a sufficient guarantee fund could be raised, and the subscription price were reduced to two dollars, no single service to our country could be greater.

The Indian School in Montana will, without doubt, this year pass into the hands of the government, under circumstances which cause the friends of the school to hope and believe that, the same teachers being retained and the transfer made without any shock of transition, the work so well begun there will be carried on without interruption. We can no longer ask for aid from the government, and, asking, could not much longer receive it. The land already belongs to the government; the buildings will be transferred for a nominal sum; and the government pays $2,443.57 for the furniture, tools, etc. It is believed that the affairs of the Indian Commission may be wound up without a deficit.

The Church Building Loan Fund is in sound condition, but the list of delinquent churches has grown. Thus far not one of them has been sold. It is possible, however, that in one or two cases this may happen. Warned by the experience of the past two years, the Association will discourage any resort to the Loan Fund on the part of any churches which have not passed well on their way toward self-support. The fund now amounts to something less than $114,000.

We have united for several years with our English brethren to aid a Unitarian church at Budapest, Hungary, where, under the shadow of the Catholic State religion, but guarded by civil guarantees, Unitarianism has enjoyed special privileges for three hundred years. This year the appropriation, being no longer needed, will be reduced, and soon discontinued.

The early motto of the Unitarian Association was "Liberty, Holiness, Love." The objects of the Association, as declared by Channing and his great coworkers, were to secure religious liberty equal to the civil liberty enjoyed by American citizens; to raise men and women to better forms of living; to organize them for every good cause in civil and social life; to reduce ignorance, poverty, and crime; to increase the sum of human happiness; and for these ends to proclaim with power the truth which is mighty to save, uplift, and inspire.

Your directors would make ample and grateful acknowledgment of the inspiration and help that come from the labors of the Alliance and various other organizations through which the women of our churches are pouring new life into our local churches, conferences, and associations. Some of our Unitarian clubs of men, and notably the Unitarian Club of Boston, to which we owe our commodious headquarters, have done well. But, when the men of our parishes and conferences are as well organized, as enthusiastic, and as self-sacrificing as the women, then the day of great things will speedily come.

This report, written by the secretary and approved by the directors, is respectfully submitted.

GEORGE BATCHELOR, Secretary.

WESTERN CONFERENCE NOTES.

The reports of State conferences and mission work are always the note of encouragement and inspiration. To those who weary of ministering unto them who will not be ministered unto, of offering food to the over-fed, the men and women engaged in the mission work have always one bit of advice. They say: "Give up the old, renounce the sweet security of streets and an assured stipend. Risk a little yourself, O preacher. Give your best and do your best; and your life and strength will take on a fresh growth from the enthusiasm of the eager crowds that gather in farming districts, hungry for spiritual food."

The Western Unitarian Conference has long accustomed itself to living in a house spiritual without bars or bolts or locks or keys or latch-strings. The wind blowing in through the swinging-doors has at times proven a little bleak, so that the company have had to turn up their coat collars to keep from getting cold. Although their voices were occasionally a little rheumy, they have never ceased exclaiming with unabated cheerfulness: "Fine fresh air! Cool? Yes; but wholesome. Very wholesome." . . .

The visit of the wise men from the East inspired a feeling of cheer and hope all around. They were welcome to everybody. That the visitors were Messrs. Brown and Savage and Ellis suited everybody.

Mr. Brown spoke his word of cordial encouragement for the future acceptance of a working plan that should unite all forces. Mr. Savage stood on the platform of the church where he had first preached when he came among us; and he made eloquent acknowledgment of the liberty he had found under the Unitarian name,—a liberty that was as undogmatic in the American Unitarian Association as in the Free Religious Association. But he pleaded for a liberality which should work inside as well as outside,—that should be tolerant of the slowly developing thought within as well as without.

WHAT ONE MAN CAN DO.

BY REV. CHARLES A. ALLEN.

All history is a record of the influence of great personalities. "Every revolution," says Emerson, "was first a thought in one man's mind: every reform was once a private opinion." Every great advance in human progress has had some great leader, whose fervor has breathed a new enthusiasm into the world. It was Peter the hermit who created the tremendous fanaticism of the Great Crusades, which, with all their folly, yet won great blessings for Europe. It was Martin Luther who awakened Germany to the Great Reformation. It was Wesley who led the great religious reform of the last century, the influence of which has been powerfully felt by all the Protestant churches in England and America. It was Sam Adams of Boston who guided the resistance of the American colonies to the tyranny of England, and by his flaming zeal and consummate skill united the colonies and achieved independence. It was Dorothy Dix, a Unitarian, whose lifelong zealous labors and intensely earnest purpose and wonderful wisdom and Christ-like love of the suffering and neglected revolutionized throughout Christendom the treatment of the insane and opened a new era in the philanthropy of the world. It was Garrison who kindled the conscience of the North with indignation at the evil of slavery, and prepared the way for its final overthrow. Every great advance in history has been a record of what one man or one woman can do.

But these men were great men, we are tempted to say. They had their five talents, while we have but one talent, or a very small part of a talent, which is not worth counting; and, therefore, we can do nothing, because we have nothing to do with. The appeal to emulate these great men is useless, we think; but just consider this one simple question,—Is there any one so weak, so humble, so obscure, that he may not in God's providence have an opportunity, perhaps all unconsciously, of doing great things for God and humanity, if he is only in earnest? Do you think that the poor widow, who cast her two mites into the treasury-box at the temple, had any thought that she was doing anything but a very obscure and trivial act? Nobody knows her name. She has won no fame for herself. It is only the deed and the influence of it that have been perpetuated. But how vast and glorious has been the influence, through all the centuries since, of that trivial act of self-sacrifice, because it happened to catch the eye of one who saw its heroism and whose word has given it fame!

Probably John Bunyan, by his "Pilgrim's Progress," has had a wider and deeper religious influence in English-speaking countries than any man who ever spoke our tongue. But what converted John Bunyan? It was his chance overhearing some poor women talking together about their own religious experiences, when the earnestness of their words so touched his heart as to open to him a new life and make him a new man. He did not know who they were, and they

Well-made Tables.

When you are buying an expensive dining-table, you risk very little in your selection of a store, for your own artistic taste will decide your final choice; and the question of substantial construction is not open to doubt.

But, in proportion as you choose an inexpensive table, you should employ the greater care in its selection. If you want the most inexpensive of all tables, buy it only of a furniture manufacturer.

Fight shy of the cheaply constructed, badly framed dining tables which are sold as "bargains" in the furniture department of some large store. They soon become rickety, the legs are uneven, the castors drop out, the joints open; and such a table is expensive at any price.

There is really no lower price on dining tables in this city than we quote, and you are sure of the construction of every table. Our name and registered number stamped upon it guarantees its quality.

It is a safe rule: When buying low-priced furniture, buy it of the manufacturer always.

did not know that he had overheard them. They went to their graves, never for a moment suspecting that they had unconsciously kindled in the heart of an utter stranger a religious earnestness which would be felt as a mighty influence for centuries.

But there is a more important consideration which we should bear in mind. All intense feelings are contagious. They may seem ever so trivial at first; but, if they are intense, they spread. Even bad feelings spread in this way; for what is a mob but a crowd of men who have been blindly fired and crazed by some evil feeling which had spread by rapid contagion from one fanatic's flaming heart! And it is just so with good feelings. There is no man or woman or child who could not set a town or a State or a nation on fire with enthusiasm for some great duty by simply feeling it intensely himself. And so there is no man or woman or child who cannot do great things for God and man by simply being thoroughly in earnest and keeping it up. Sooner or later the fire will catch. Others will respect your earnestness, and then they will begin to sympathize with your earnestness, and then they will begin to feel a little interest in what you feel so warmly about, and then they, too, will begin to feel warmly. And, before they really know it, the hidden depths and latent capacities of earnest feeling,—those hidden depths that are often so wonderfully aroused in times of pestilence and famine, of national peril or shameful crime, and the nblaze out in generous beneficence or glowing patriotism or flaming wrath,—these will be all kindled with an enthusiasm like your own, and the little match has set a whole pile on fire. You know the story of Joan of Arc. Many and many a time has this happened, and this is what any man can do.

NEW SUNDAY-SCHOOL HYMN-BOOK.*

It is a genuine pleasure to be able to congratulate both the editor and the Sunday-schools on the admirable way in which the new "Book of Song and Service" has been prepared. To enter the field with a new hymn-book requires no little courage. To make so genuine a success of the attempt is a feat. Mr. Horton has succeeded. Too often the hymn-book for children has been a book for the sickly and weak-minded, provided with music that was either insufferably dull or a perpetual offence against every canon of a cultured musical taste. This little volume is bright in tone, healthy in sentiment, melodious without being vulgar, and, while not costly, is well printed and most artistically bound. It is pleasing to the eye, and will help to educate the ear while it elevates and fosters a bright and vigorous religious sentiment.

Ten short services for the opening of Sunday-school are followed by eight longer special services, indicating a general form of service and leaving the selection of the music to the choice of the school. The occasions chosen are Christmas, Easter, Flower Sunday, and Thanksgiving, in addition to services of Commemoration, Temperance, and Patriotism, with an Anniversary and an In Memoriam Service, and Mr. Savage's Service of Consecration. Five very brief services for the closing of school follow. Next come one hundred and fifty-six hymns and songs, arranged under general heads, appended to which are fifty-two festival carols of a somewhat more ambitious nature, and well fitted for use as part of the special services already mentioned. It will thus be seen that the book is arranged to meet the varied requirements of schools, and is far more than a mere hymn-book, while leaving the greatest possible liberty in its suggestions for the order of worship. It renders unnecessary the trouble involved in preparing or compiling material for occasions when the ordinary routine of the school is departed from.

It is, of course, impossible in the interests of humanity to please every one. "We believe that he shall come to be our judge" occurs in the modified "Te Deum" in the fifth service; while, on the other hand, those who feel that the language of the sixteenth century is best fitted to express the worship of the nineteenth may find fault with the lack of many phrases that have a religious sound from force of reiteration. Probably no one will find here all the hymns that he considers the best children's hymns in the language; and he who considers it essential to a good tune that it be familiar will pass judgment on himself in his criticism. On the whole, those who seek in this collection for many good things will find them. The old are not lacking. They gain by being set in goodly fellowship with the spirit and fervor of the new.

There are, of course, faults in the book. One of the most striking is that the "Te Deum" on pages 15 and 16 contains the words and music of the odd sentences on one page and those of the even ones on the reverse, necessitating the turning of the page twelve times whenever this service is used. In many cases, too, the name of the tune is given below the title of the hymn. In many others it is omitted, although given in the index. It is given, for instance, in Hymns 10 and 11, where it is of little value, and omitted in 9 and 12, where the titles "Aurelia" and "Eilers" would at once recall the tune to some unfamiliar with music. Moreover, Sir Arthur Sullivan's version of the latter tune is passed over in favor of the comparatively colorless harmonies of Hopkins's original. In many cases, too, hymns and tunes are not credited to their authors, where, if only for the sake of uniformity, the names ought to have been given. Where a hymn has been altered, the fact is, in most cases, very properly stated; but in others an author is, without remark, unduly credited with words which do not belong to him. Faber's "O Paradise" is a case in point.

While criticism as to the selection of hymns and tunes must rest largely on personal grounds, one cannot help regretting that Hatch's "Breathe on me, breath of God," and an abridged version of Adelaide Procter's "My God, I thank thee, who hast made the earth so bright," with some hymns like "Suppose the little cowslip" for the infant classes, have not found a place here. A larger proportion, too, of hymns having the splendid dignity and strength which mark Pierpont's "O Thou to whom in ancient times," for example, would have been a distinct gain. Many of them are at least as suitable for children's use as Newman's "Lead, kindly Light." Where, too, the "Te Deum" is used, why not have inserted a version set to the stately Gregorian chants? It is high praise to bring forward merely faults like these; for the pious wish, "Oh that mine adversary had written a book," for which King James's translators are responsible, gains new force in the case of a hymn-book.

It has been said that poetry is the strength of religion, song its inspiration, and dogma its coffin. Poetry and song are here; dogma is at a discount. An atmosphere of glad sincerity pervades the volume. The appreciation of a brighter and less barren service will be born of it. The joy of freedom and beauty and truth is its prevailing note. In helping our children to love these things, it will be of incalculable value to our Sunday-schools.

THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE. Collected and edited by Moncure Daniel Conway. Vol. III., 1791-1804. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The contents of Mr. Conway's third volume of Paine's Writings are much more miscellaneous than those of Volumes I. and II. They are, for the most part, less inviting for their intrinsic interest than in connection with Mr. Conway's Life of Paine, as illustrations of the several matters with which they deal. At first we have Paine's "Republican Proclamation" which he concocted with his friend Du Châtelet, and posted in the streets of Paris. A succession of letters and proclamations illustrates his relation to the French Revolution and to the English government while he was undergoing prosecution. A letter to Danton has received the praise of M. Taine, as producing the strongest effect by its practical good sense when compared with the speeches and writings of the time. His speeches pleading for the life of Louis XVI. are in evidence to show that his humanity was equal to his good sense. Everywhere we have the proof of a quick mind, a ready pen, an incisive style, a great love of argument and ability for it, and generally signs of that sense of his own importance that was of the essence of his personality. He had done much for American independence, if not as much as he thought; and he now conceived that the French Revolution was mainly committed to his charge. But soon he found himself another Phaëthon, vainly endeavoring to guide the plunging horses of the sun. It is to his credit that all of his sympathies were with the more rational and humane of the Republicans. Mr. Conway returns with great zeal to his charge against Gouverneur Morris as responsible for Paine's imprisonment and consenting to his death; and, if he does not convince his readers as completely as he is himself convinced, he leaves Morris's character in a most miserable condition. If Morris has any friends, they had better come to his rescue at once. Paine's famous letter to Washington in 1796 is at once the most important and the most painful document in the series. It would never have been written if Paine had known what Washington had done for his release from prison and what Morris had failed to do. But, even with this understanding, it is much more damaging to Paine than to Washington. It is mean-spirited, brutal, coarse, revengeful,—an expression of wounded vanity more than of righteous indignation. At the same time, though Morris did his best to frustrate Washington's good intentions, these were not so positive as Paine had a good right to expect, whatever he had done to forfeit his esteem by his aggressive vanity and general course of life before he left America in 1787, and to forfeit his American citizenship by accepting that of France, and in his enjoyment of it becoming a member of the convention of 1793. This volume completes the collection of Paine's political writings, Mr. Conway thinking it best to put the religious writings in a volume by themselves rather than to observe their chronological order.

THE SONS OF HAM. A Tale of the New South. By Louis Pendleton, author of "The Wedding Garment," etc. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—Anything very practical was not to be expected from the author of "The Wedding Garment," one of many anticipations of a future life that reconcile us to the fact that such a life is incapable of scientific demonstration. For any good that he can do, however, by such a book as this, the author would do better to confine himself to his ratiocinations of the life after death. He has written a novel with a purpose; and the purpose is disclosed in his dedication, which is "To the African Colonization Societies of the Future." That it is "hopelessly inscribed" to these seems not in perfect keeping with the average tenor of the book, which, while favorable to the colonization of the Negroes in Liberia, is not hopeful as to its accomplishment. The book is written with considerable rude vigor, and as if by one acquainted with the Southern situation. Its depreciation of the Negroes is almost universal; but the failure of lynch law to do justice to the victims of its haste is made sufficiently apparent. We cannot but feel that we have here much misdirected energy, and that the same amount devoted to the encouragement of justice and fraternity between the races would be much more serviceable to all concerned.

LISBETH WILSON: A DAUGHTER OF THE NEW HAMPSHIRE HILLS. By Eliza Nelson Blair. Boston: Lee & Shepard.—The same old story,—young love opposed by stern parental force, but, as usual, triumphant in the end. The suitor was a fine young fellow; but he was a Methodist in the days when Methodism was a new-comer and on trial. The value of the book, which is a very pleasant one, consists much less in the course of true love depicted than in the happy characterization of a New England community in a time of theological transition. Evidently, there is here a mine which never has been worked as it might have been. Mrs. Blair has done this part of her book with lively force and as one knowing whereof she speaks through personal interest in some local tradition. It was Mr. Beecher's idea that a sermon should have some dull places in it to rest the hearer's mind; and Mrs. Blair has either taken a hint from him or hit upon the same method independently for the construction of her novel.

SENATOR INTRIGUE AND INSPECTOR NOSEBY: A TALE OF SPOILS. By Frances Campbell Sparhawk. Red Letter Publishing Company.—This bright little book, with its scarlet cover, somehow puts us in mind of the old riddle about a newspaper, "First white, then black, then red all over." We hope that the latter part of the jest will be prophecy in this instance, and that the volume may be read all over within as without; for it is a vigorous, breezy onslaught upon the miserable, pernicious system of "spoils,"—upon that incredible stupidity in management which makes a man's political opinions the measure of his efficiency in practical service, and selects a person to conduct business where the interests of hundreds are concerned, not on account of his character and capacity, but because he holds certain views on the tariff or belongs to a "ring." The dramatic view of the subject taken here is striking and effective. It stirs the feeling as well as the intellect, and arouses that passionate hatred of injustice which is the foundation of noble reform.

THE PRINCESS ALINE. By Richard Harding Davis. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This is the longest story Mr. Davis has ever written; but it is still a long short story, and not a short novel. The structure is that of the short story. Gladly would the reader have it even longer than it is: it is so very pleasant! One surmises before it has proceeded far how it will turn out, but it would be an outrage for the writer of this or any other notice of the book to anticipate the reader's pleasure in Mr. Davis's development of his story. One is the more grateful for its purity and sweetness because Mr. Davis has shown June Weddings.

In the Cut Glass Department will be seen an extensive display of rich Cut Glass pieces, also complete table services, adapted to Wedding and Complimentary Gifts; and in the Art Pottery Rooms (3d floor) will be seen the newest things in China, from Mintons and the Royal Worcester Pottery, costing from $5 to $50 each.

In addition to the novelties now opening from Japan, in Cloisonne, Satsuma, and Makuzu ware, we have opened the new MOTTO CHINA from Staffordshire, consisting of fancy Trinket Trays, Flower Baskets, etc., with gilt edges, costing from 35 cts. to $2 each, in script letters inscribed, one motto to each piece, viz.:—

- "Nothing is troublesome that we do willingly."
- "The pleasure of doing good is the only one that never wears out."
- "Three things to be careful of: Health, Reputation, Money."
- "Early to bed and early to rise makes one healthy, wealthy, and wise."

This exhibit, together with the souvenir pieces, including Boston Views on old blue Wedgwood plates and pitchers, may be seen on Main Floor Tables.

On main floor tables will be seen the beautiful designs of Loving Cups opened the past week, costing from $5 to $15 each.

In the Dinner Set Department and Lamp Department will be seen an extensive stock to choose from; lowest market values for equal ware guaranteed always.

heretofore something of a predilection for the seamier side of life. And, withal, there is a profound ethical suggestion in the book, so many are the men and women who live in an unreal world, who walk in a vain show, playing they are in love, playing they are miserable, playing they are bad.

ROMAN LIFE IN LATIN PROSE AND VERSE. Selected and edited by Harry Thurston Peck and Robert Arrowsmith. American Book Company.—This book of selections from Latin authors provides an interesting and instructive course in sight-reading; and it affords practically an outline of Roman literature, as illustrated in the most characteristic and striking passages that have come down to us. Thus we have Roman folk-songs and popular rhymes, gladiatorial notices, lampoons, epitaphs, etc., that do much to make real the life of the times in which they were written, as well as a thoroughly representative collection of literary extracts, each complete in itself. Such a book is of great value, since it must help students to look at Latin as literature, not as material for drill in construction.

NEIGHBOR JACKWOOD. By J. T. Trowbridge. Boston: Lee & Shepard.—A new edition of the famous anti-slavery novel has been prepared from new plates; and in its neat binding and clear print it may perhaps enter upon a new lease of life, despite the changes that have come since its first appearance in 1857. An autobiographical chapter shows how the book came to be written, and tells once more the story of the Anthony Burns case. Some day Col. Higginson, also, will publish the recollections of that scene, in which he was a chief actor.

The Magazines.

The Century Magazine for June opens with an article on "The Comédie Française at Orange," by Thomas A. Janvier, with illustrations by Louis Loeb. The old Roman theatre founded by Marcus Aurelius seems destined to be the scene of periodic performances by actors from the Comédie Française, and last summer representations from the Greek drama were given with remarkable effect. Mr. Howells writes of "The Tribulations of a Cheerful Giver," and his confessions are occasionally touched with a gentle sarcasm. The instalment of the "Life of Napoleon Bonaparte" takes us through the battle of the Pyramids, and that of "Casa Braccio" brings the story to a crisis. John Muir describes his "Discovery of Glaciers" in 1879; Mrs. Van Rensselaer treats the artistic aspects of the new Boston Public Library; Dr. Newman Smith endeavors "to disclose the real friendliness to the household of believers of the so-called higher criticism" in a paper on "The New Old Testament"; and Mr. Josiah Flynt describes further some of his unique personal experiences while tramping through England and Scotland. Miss Julia Magruder's novelette, "The Princess Sonia," a story of the Paris Art Colony, is continued.

At last a magazine appears that is as easy to hold as a small book, with lines no longer than even a near-sighted eye can take in at a glance. The first number of the Bachelor of Arts shows what may be done with good paper, clear print, and convenient form. There are many mistakes in the proof-reading, which mar the fair appearance; but, for the most part, the new magazine is attractive from both points of view, inside and outside. The leading article tells of "Town and Gown Rows at Yale"; and Henry Howland contributes a spirited account of the "Riot of 1854," in which he took an active part. There are two stories, by Charles Stewart Davison and H. A. Winthrop, respectively; four poems; an article on "Kidd's Social Evolution," by B. A. Kant; and one of decided interest by John Corbin on "An American Collegian at Oxford." This monthly magazine is to be devoted to university interests and general literature, and is published at 15 Wall Street, New York. The athletic department is conducted by Walter Camp, and comments on university news will be furnished by E. S. Martin. John Seymour Wood is editor-in-chief; and there is a large advisory board, including distinguished graduates from twenty-five colleges.

Miscellaneous.

The new volume of Littell's Living Age includes the thirteen weekly issues of January, February, and March of this year; and with it this popular magazine completes its fifty-first year. It contains the usual interesting variety of articles, fiction, and poetry, and is neatly bound in black cloth.

Rev. John Fretwell continues his crusade in behalf of the poor Newfoundland fishermen by a small pamphlet entitled "Newfoundland and the Jingo," published by George H. Ellis. It is an appeal to England to relieve the suffering there; to press on the completion of the railroad and to subsidize a mail line between England and the American continent, by way of a Newfoundland port, holding the railway property as security; to modify the fiscal system; and to aid "the unfortunate victims of her Lord Clan-Rackrents" to find farms and holdings along parts of the French shore and the railroad.

Thomas Whittaker of New York publishes the Second Series of "Sermon Stuff," by S. D. McConnell, D.D., rector of St. Stephen's Church, Philadelphia. Dr. McConnell is known as one of the most effective preachers in Philadelphia; and the fact that a second series of this "Sermon Stuff" is issued is, no doubt, evidence that the first series proved acceptable to ministers. And it is only to ministers that the bare outlines of sermons can be of use. They need to be clothed in flesh and blood; and we would rather have one volume, or half a volume of sermons in full than a whole library of "Sermon Stuff." It is dangerous for a minister to accept and follow the outlines of another man's thought in the preparation of his sermon. He had better follow his own.

Literary Notes.

A pamphlet on "The Educational Test as a Means of Further Restricting Immigration" is published by the Immigration Restriction League.

The Jewish Publication Society of Philadelphia have published Emanuel Deutsch's famous essay on "The Talmud," with notes of two lectures by him on the same subject.

Nos. 73 and 74 of the Riverside Literature Series present, respectively, "Enoch Arden" and Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard," each edited with biographical sketch and explanatory note.

A series of papers by Robert S. Peabody, the well-known Boston architect, will begin in the July Atlantic. The first will be "A Holiday in England." A new novel by Miss Blanche Fearing of Chicago, the blind lawyer, is promised for immediate appearance.

Robert Grant's paper in Scribner's this month discusses the problem of how, in the pressure of modern life, a man or woman may select and reject what is most important, in order that life may cease to be a succession of small incidents and unsatisfactory in its details.

"Burke's Speech on Conciliation with the Colonies" reappears in two editions, as one of the Student Series of English Classics, published by Leach, Shewell & Sanborn, and in Heath's English Classics Series. The former is edited by L. Du Pont Lyle (Yale), and the other by A. J. George.

Summer Stories.

The Story of Christine Rochefort.

By HELEN CHOATE PRINCE. Third Edition. $1.25.

"Mrs. Prince, grand-daughter of Rufus Choate, has written a novel particularly strong in its well-knit style. . . . The personal touches, scenes, and conversations are delightful."—Chicago Times-Herald.

"The story throughout exhibits a sweetness and elevation of tone which is in charming contrast to the generality of novels."—Literary World.

"I like everything about it."—HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, LL.D.

A Soulless Singer.

By MARY CATHERINE LEE, author of "A Quaker Girl of Nantucket" and "In the Cheer-up Business." $1.25.

"How to awaken the soul of one who does not know that she lacks it, and who cannot without it attain to supreme excellence in song, is the problem which Mrs. Lee has set herself to solve. It is a very graceful and enjoyable story. There is singular delicacy in the handling of the heroine's qualities and peculiarities, and the contrasts of character are delightful."—Congregationalist, Boston.

"A daintier, prettier love-story than this it would be hard to find."—The Interior, Chicago.

Daughters of the Revolution.

By CHARLES CARLETON COFFIN, author of "The Drum-beat of the Nation," etc. With Illustrations. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

"Not only fills the promise that it should show woman's influence in forwarding and completing that great and hazardous political undertaking, but is a most entertaining picture of society at the time on both sides of the Atlantic, and contains portraits of nearly all the prominent people of either sex in Old or New England."—Brooklyn Eagle.

Under the Man-fig.

By M. E. M. DAVIS. 16mo, $1.25.

"A story of the old South by a writer who knows well how to use the rich material afforded by that picturesque time and people."—Nashville Banner.

"An exciting story and a strong study of character."—Portland Transcript.

"This novel is unlike anything now before the public, introducing fresh and interesting characters in a way that is decidedly artistic."—Rochester Herald.

Stories of the Foot-hills.

By MARGARET C. GRAHAM. 16mo, $1.25.

"The glimpses of manners and social usages of the Western foot-hills are, in our opinion, more irresistible than the weather-worn peculiarities of New England that have been dragged through so much of the storm and sun of modern fiction."—New York Times.

Philip and his Wife.

By Mrs. DELAND, author of "John Ward, Preacher," "The Old Garden," etc. Eighth Thousand. 16mo, $1.25.

"An interesting and absorbing romance, one of those rare creations in our slipshod era of a story as well written as it is interesting."—London Telegraph.

"A book of genuine originality and power."—New York Tribune.

The Story of Lawrence Garthe.

By Mrs. KIRK, author of "The Story of Margaret Kent," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"I have had a delightful feast, charming and absorbing from beginning to end. . . . It is all fascinating, and the plot is managed so admirably throughout."—HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, LL.D.

The Chase of St. Castin,

And Other Tales.

By Mrs. CATHERWOOD, author of "The Lady of Fort St. John," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"She is one of the few writers who can really project themselves into the remote past, and whose sympathies can find in the mustiest of records the palpitating life that most of us can find only in the memory of what we have personally known."—The Dial.

Sweet Clover.

By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM, author of "Dr. Latimer," "Miss Bagg's Secretary," etc. Ninth Thousand. 16mo, $1.25.

"Mrs. Burnham has laid the scene of her pleasant, pure-toned romance among the glories of the White City. It is delightful to have them reanimated in such a vivid manner."—Literary World.

Cœur d'Alene.

By MARY HALLOCK FOOTE, author of "John Bodewin's Testimony," "The Led Horse Claim," "In Exile," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"The movement of the story is rapid, the interest most intense, and the event almost tragic; but the narrative is interspersed with many a scene sparkling with humor and brilliant dialogue."—Books, Denver.

SUMMER READING.

A Child of Nature.

By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, 50 Cents.

Special gift edition, full gilt, $1.00.

Philadelphia To-day.—One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful.

Minneapolis Journal.—Dr. Shutter has a keen zest for Nature, and a mind to receive lasting impressions from her manifold moods in sky, water, cloud, leaf, grass, and flowers. He makes some charming applications and analogues in this volume, which will be prized by all who love homilies in stones and running brooks.

Toronto Week.—The ideas are so simply and so strikingly expressed that it is a pleasure to read it from cover to cover. The author strikes us as having eyes to see.

JACK.—A REMINISCENCE.

Were I an artist, I would try my hand
At sketching Jack, the Corporal. Understand
He was no kith of mine; a neighbor's lad.
But we all owned him! Every one was glad When the bright face and ringing voice went by:
He carried with him springtime and blue sky.

The war-cry burst. Those guns at Sumter took
Our drowsy town: like leaves from an old book
A puff of air has seized and flung about,
The wind of battle shook our sleepers out.
They braced up stiffly in the startled street,
As when a breeze blows back again bent wheat.

The love of country in a moment born
Rose to a passion in men's souls that morn:
My neighbor's lad threw his free boyhood back,
As 'twere a weight in the keen runner's track;
And mother arms refused to bind the feet
That pressed impatiently their goal to greet.

O Jack, my Corporal! how could I let go
Your clasping hands, so cruel was the foe?
While I, a cripple, barred my true estate,
Took the world's pulse through Fortune's welded gate,
Denied in valiant deeds all outward part,
With you I gave the life-blood of my heart.

At the last moment Jack to me had said,
Tossing the fair locks on his shapely head:
"Death is but glorious in the stirring fight:
To die of sickness as an alien might
Were to waste breath. But so I shall not die!"
The glowing cheek, the clear, undaunted eye
Strengthened denial more than words of cheer,
And left me comforted despite of fear.

There's a street corner where I often see
In Memory's glass a marching company
File through the ranks of proudly cheering friends
To a small station, where the vision ends
As the huge sinuous train goes thundering on Till waving hands and yearning looks are gone.

You read my tale? There was no fight for him
Save with the fever; senses all a-swim,
With broken speech of home; the tented plain,
Drifting and changing like the tides of pain;
Then the long sighing breath that told surcease,
The campaign ended, and the unsought peace.

Full thirty years ago! And they will lay
Wreaths on the mound as on your burial-day, When gathered comrades sang, "How sleep the brave,"

With voices strong as if across the grave
They heard still others from the fields of Light,
And knew our lad had won, not lost, the fight!
—Charlotte Mellen Packard, in the Youth's Companion.

TATTERS.

A TRUE SKETCH.

From the time he first came to us Tatters formed an important member of our family. In fact, he attracted every one. His bright little eyes shone through his long, silky white hair like two stars; and his cunning little tail, which would twist itself into a knot, made him irresistible to even those who do not care for dogs. And then he was so clever, and learned so fast that it was a pleasure to teach him.

I resolved immediately that he should be the educated dog Mother Goose sings about, who belongs to dear Dame Hubbard; and before many weeks had passed I had taught him to shake hands and sit up and beg.

When Tatters became a member of our household, I possessed as a pet a stray cat, that I had taken pity on some months before. She was jealous of my new plaything, and her reception of him was not the most welcome. She spitefully scratched him when his dinner was put before him, until he retired. Then she ate the tempting meal herself.

This, however, did not last, and they soon became fast friends; and often on a moonlight night you might have seen them chasing each other noiselessly around the yard. And now that Kitty is no more Tatters will prick up his ears the moment he hears her name, and wonders why strange cats hump up their backs at him.

Tatters has a sweet tooth. He loves sugar dearly,—maple-sugar especially, and peppermint candy. So I took advantage of this to teach him his tricks.

It took me scarcely three days to teach him to be a "dead dog"; and, when this was accomplished, he threw himself down on every occasion to show himself off, growling a little at first, and then going down very easily.

My next effort was to make him tell who the President was. This I succeeded in by making him understand that Harrison meant "speak" (which I had previously taught him). Then all I had to do was to repeat several of the names; and, when the right one was emphasized, he barked.

I also taught him easily to walk, dance, refrain from touching bread or sugar till ten is counted, shut the door, and jump. Tatters is very playful. At all times he has had something in the way of a ball, bone, or bundle to worry; but I think of all his things he liked his "bunny" the best. It was a gray canton-flannel rabbit made for my little brother; and Tatters loved it dearly. He pulled its ears off, its eyes out, and strewed the hair stuffing all over the floor. Each time it was sewed up the shape became more ludicrous, until at last the very mention of it convulsed us; and the ridiculous thing was finally disposed of.

When summer came, the question was what to do with Tatters. We could hardly take him with us, and to leave him with servants was not to be thought of. It was finally decided that, as we were to finish our summer in the country, he should be sent there immediately. So into the country he went.

He made friends everywhere. The little darky boys shared their meals with him,—not infrequently both boy and dog eating from the same piece of bread; and the pigs were his especial playmates. He chased the chickens till an old hen pecked him. He would sit up in the raspberry patch and eat the ripe fruit from the lower branches, and altogether enjoyed life.

The only time he is at all unhappy is when he has his bath; and then he is truly miserable, for he hates water like a cat.

He is a very sensitive dog, and is terrified if spoken to sharply, and cowed in a moment if you raise your hand; but he is most affectionate, making friends readily, and is a most excellent watch-dog.

One night during our stay in the country, when the clear moonlight shone into our room through a glass door that opens on our low porch, Tatters got up, shook himself, and looked out of the door. In a moment we heard him whine; and, as we were awake, we opened the door, and let him out. He went deliberately to the edge of the porch, where he could get a full view of the moon, and stood, apparently deeply absorbed in thought. For some time he gazed into the sky, and then gravely returned to our room, and settled himself for another nap.

The whole affair was so ludicrous, that we should be waked at night for Tatters to look at the moon, that we laughed heartily over it. I have often wondered what he was meditating on that night, but he has never told me.

BESSIE, THE PET BIRD.

It is well known by others, as well as ornithologists, that female birds will return year after year to the same home; but in the following account, true in every particular, of a pet bird, it is proved that the same couple of birds remain faithful to each other as long as both do live. The story also illustrates in a remarkable degree the power of kindness. Another fact is also brought out. Both the instinct of migration and the affection for mate and little ones have been overborne by attachment to a human friend.

We begin to hear the song-sparrow early in March; and in Pennsylvania, the scene of our story, it is the first of the singing-birds of spring. The song is a short one, but exquisitely beautiful, exceeded only by the melody of the wood robin. Sometimes they are so numerous about country gardens that in the early morning there will be a perfect ground-swell of melody,—probably one of the sweetest sounds this side the stars.

Now the pet of our lady friend was one of these little song-sparrows,—a tiny bird of very Quaker-like plumage, shades of brown and gray, but as trim and neat as any little bird could well be.

The winter when the incident happened was very cold. A young child, who was then living in the family of our informant, was coming home one evening, and found this little bird lying on a snowdrift, apparently frozen to death; but, holding it in his hands a few moments, he found there was a little fluttering motion of the heart. He ran upstairs to the parlor register, and by warmth and kindness brought it to. It was some days, however, before the bird recovered entirely. She was then turned loose in the conservatory, where she seemed perfectly happy, darting in and out among the flowers. At first the household heard only very timid, low notes from her; but, as she became accustomed to them, and knew she had nothing to fear, there was often one gush of melody after another.

In the spring the birds began to return to their summer homes,—birds of her own kind, as well as others; but she paid no heed to them for some time. However, one day the family were startled by a loud, long cry from her, so unusual that every one ran into the conservatory to see what had happened. A little bird was on the outside, trying to get in. The window was opened, she flew to meet him; and such a joyous meeting as it was! The meeting of human lovers after a long separation could not more plainly tell the story of affection. Soon a snow squall came up; and she was too tender to breast it, and tapped at the window to be taken in. She remained very contentedly until the weather was quite settled. Now came her trouble. He wanted the nest to be built in a cedar-tree some two hundred feet from the house: she would not go. He perched himself in the tree, and sang his most charming melodies; while she on top of the smoke-house near the house answered him just as sweetly. But she would not budge from the position she had taken. After the second day's manœuvring, he began to give in, little by little approaching the house. Finally, they compromised the matter by building the nest in a gooseberry bush near the smoke-house. This was not to her mind, but still it was better than the far-off cedar-tree.

In time four pretty little brown birds made their appearance. As soon as they were out of the nest, she coaxed them to the house, where her feed table and bath-tub were always ready for her. Such a pretty, happy little family they were!

The next nest was just where she wanted it,—in a jasmine-bush trained around one of the parlor windows. From this nest came three little birds.

Her table and bath-tubs were again brought into the conservatory, the flowers now being out of doors. The side sashes were always open, and she brought all the family to feed and bathe just as it pleased her; and, the glass doors into the parlor being also open, they would fly through and through the house as if it was out of doors.

Cold weather came once more, and the mate and young birds disappeared; but Bessie did not go. She tapped at the window, and was again warmly welcomed to her quarters among the flowers in the conservatory. Here she spent another gay, happy winter; and it was a constant source of pleasure to all the family and guests to watch her pretty, cunning ways, and listen to her sweet songs. In the next spring Bessie's owner moved away; and she fell into another lady's possession,—a very welcome legacy.

As before, the birds returned in the spring; but Bessie was quite indifferent to them all. But one day, while the new family were at the dinner-table, they heard what seemed to be a loud, wild scream of joy. With one accord all rushed upstairs to the conservatory; and there, sure enough, was the mate again. This was repeated every spring while she lived. Whenever the family heard that peculiar, wild, joyous commotion, they knew that her mate had come, and, going to see, always found him there.

One year they raised three broods of birds; and it was not an uncommon thing at that time to see the two parent birds and the twelve young ones all feeding at the same table,—the youngest yet so young as to be fed by the old ones.

This little pet was with them seven years. They never doubted her identity; but a clipped feather and a defective toe made this identity unmistakable.

The same great joy was manifested toward her mate at each annual return in the spring, but the last one it seemed almost beyond expression. It even attracted the attention of the neighbors. One day an uncle of the lady of the house called her and others to look at them. They would sing to each other, bow their heads, flap their wings, fly down on the ground, roll over and over. In short, they acted as if they were fairly crazy with happiness. Two or three days after this the lady of the house heard a fluttering in the conservatory; and, going to see what was the matter, she found her little pet lying in her feed basin in a spasm.

She took her up, stroked and petted her; and, as the fit passed off, she nestled down into her hand, and turned her head up to look at her mistress. The bright eyes were swollen and bloodshot. Soon she had another spasm, and another, and another. Then her little feet flew out, and she soon lay dead in her owner's hand.

It seemed as if a dear little pet child had been suddenly snatched from that household; and, as to the poor little mate, anything more heart-broken they never saw. There was no more dashing about through the house and out among the trees, no more gay songs; but, instead, he moped about, with now and then a little, low wail that seemed more like "Weep," "Weep," than anything else. In the fall he went away, as usual; and the family never saw him again to know him.

Bessie's conduct toward her mistress was often very amusing. Traits of character were manifested that instinct will not explain. If in the morning the lady should begin watering her plants, or other work, before she had attended to her wants, the bird pet would follow her about, scolding and darting down at her as if she intended to peck her eyes out; and this would be continued until the mistress would quit all else and attend to her. But after her breakfast she would come out to where the lady was, perch on the nearest tree or bush, and give her her pay in one of the sweetest songs that the throat of song-sparrow ever poured out upon the summer air.—George S. Griffith, in New York Observer.

BOBBY SHAFTOE.

One day I went out fishing with Uncle Will. I went, and Tom went, and auntie went. We fished from a boat. Auntie caught some fish, and uncle caught lots. Brother Tom tried to, but couldn't. I did not want to catch any, the poor things gasped so. What I liked was the sail and the picnic on the island under the trees.

I wanted to take my doll with me. I should have chosen Lucy Lee, for she has a yachting suit and a sailor hat to wear; but mamma said that I was certain to lose overboard any doll I took, because I always did, and really that is quite true,—I forget, and she slips,—but that, if I chose to take my little china boy, I might. I never seemed to care much for him.

My little china boy is a sailor, with a hat on one side of his head, and black curls, and a striped shirt, and an anchor on his necktie, and wide pantaloons, and slippers on his feet, and he is dancing a jig; and on his stand is printed in gold letters the name

LITTLE BOBBY SHAFTOE.

He was bought at a fair; and sometimes I forgot all about him for weeks, and sometimes I played with him every day.

When mamma spoke of him now, I went and looked for him. He was lying in a corner of my closet, all covered with dust; but I wiped him off, and, so I should be sure not to lose him, I tied a pink cord under his arms, and made a knot in the end. If I forgot my little sailor, I should feel the big knot slip through my fingers, and remember and pick him up.

Well, we had been fishing a long, long while, and uncle was rowing in to the island where we were to have lunch, when I thought I would give my sailor-boy a bath. So I let him down into the water, and he came up all bright and shining, as if he were newly painted and gilded, and I called to Tom to look, and let him down again; and Tom laughed when I pulled him up. And just once more I let him down, holding the knot tight, and this time something seemed to catch him and pull him away from me, and the cord slipped through my fingers, knot and all, and auntie says I'd have gone over the side of the boat if she had not caught my skirts.

"What is the matter?" she asked.

"My sailor-boy is drowned!" I said, and I told her how.

"Just as your mamma said!" said she.

"Well, you did not care much for him, so don't cry."

"I wouldn't have cared if he had been lost or been given away," I said, "but to see him drowned before my eyes is so different, just as he was so happy, too. He was fond of the sea. Oh, poor little Bobby Shaftoe!" And I cried quite hard.

"What your mother is going to do with such an imaginative child, I can't think," said auntie. "No one is drowned. You've lost a bit of painted china. Do be sensible."

I tried to be; and, on the whole, we had a very pleasant day. All mamma said when I told her about Bobby was,—

"Don't you feel glad you did not take your doll?"

People don't have much sympathy with us, I'm afraid. They were much more interested in the fish uncle and auntie had caught. One that he had pulled in just after I lost Bobby Shaftoe overboard was to be baked for dinner. Cook promised to clean and stuff it beautifully. Then auntie went to rest and lie down, and, when I had taken off my big apron and been washed and tidied, I sat down under a big tree with my crochet work; but I could only think of poor little Bobby Shaftoe dancing in the sun, and dipping into the water, and then gone.

"Only a bit of china," they told me. Somehow, when a "bit of china" has a pretty face, and arms and hands, and legs and feet, it will make you feel as if it was alive,—just a little,—and I was crying again, when I saw Jane, the upstairs girl, running down the garden path.

"Miss Kitty! Miss Kitty!" she was crying. "Do come! Cook wants to show you such a funny thing!"

Of course, I went with her at once. Auntie, mamma, and Tom were all in the kitchen, standing about a table. Cook had opened the fish and cleaned it, and made the stuffing; and now the fish lay shut up again in a nice clean towel.

"It's a big one, miss, isn't it?" asked cook.

"Yes," I said, not much interested.

"And it has a big mouth," said cook.

"Look till I open it for you."

Saying that, she opened, not the mouth, but the whole fish; and there, inside of it, lay something all blue and white and gilt and shiny,—my little Bobby Shaftoe, and nothing else, with the string tied to him yet!

"Just where I found him, miss," said cook; "and, as your ma says you lost him while you were out fishing, it's plain the fish swallowed him, and then swam around the boat, and let your uncle catch him. Sure, the crayther, I've no doubt, thought he was alive."

Then she lifted Bobby out of the fish, and washed him nicely for me, and dried him on the roller-towel; and everybody else laughed a great deal. But, as for me, I could not even speak, I was so astonished and thankful. I put Bobby on the mantel-piece in my room, and I keep him nicely dusted now. Tom always calls him Jonah; and it was a kind of a miracle, too, only not so solemn, that happened to Bobby Shaftoe.—New York Ledger.

HIGH TIDE AT GETTYSBURG.

A cloud possessed the hollow field,
The gathering battle's smoky shield:
Athwart the gloom the lightning flashed,
And through the cloud some horsemen dashed,
And from the heights the thunder pealed.

Far heard above the angry guns,
A cry across the tumult runs;
The voice that rang through Shiloh's woods,
And Chickamauga's solitudes;
The fierce South cheering on her sons.

"Once more in glory's van with me!"
Virginia cries to Tennessee:
"We two together, come what may,
Shall stand upon those works to-day!"
The reddest day in history.

But who shall break the guards that wait
Before the awful face of fate?
The tattered standards of the South
Were shrivelled at the cannon's mouth,
And all her hopes were desolate.

Above the bayonets mixed and crossed
Men saw a gray, gigantic ghost
Receding through the battle cloud,
And heard across the tempest loud
The death-cry of a nation lost!

They fell who lifted up a hand,
And bade the sun in heaven to stand;
They smote and fell who set the bars
Against the progress of the stars,
And stayed the march of Motherland.

They stood who saw the future come
On through the fight's delirium,
They smote and stood who held the hope
Of nations on that slippery slope,
Amid the cheers of Christendom!

God lives! He forged the iron will,
That clutched and held that trembling hill!
God lives and reigns! He built and lent
The heights for Freedom's battlement,
Where floats her flag in triumph still!

Fold up the banners! Smelt the guns!
Love rules. Her gentler purpose runs.
A mighty mother turns in tears
The pages of her battle years,
Lamenting all her fallen sons!

—San Francisco Argonaut.

A TULIP STORY.

Two tulip bulbs dropped from the old gardener's wheelbarrow as he walked across the alley on his way to the public square where handsome beds were being made for the spring. He heard them tumble from the top of his load, but was too tired to stop and pick them up. A few lost bulbs would not matter when he had hundreds.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" sighed the tulips: "what an awful accident. We have fallen into a dreary alley on a dirt-heap. Alas, we must die! How could we live separated from all our cousins, aunts, and friends?"

"And I was so pretty," moaned Variegated.

"I had the real gold color," answered Yellow.

"Oh, please do not die," begged the poor Dirt-heap. "I will do all I can to make you both comfortable and warm through the winter. A little way under I am moist and soft: try to sink down a few inches and fall asleep. You will be doing such a kindness if you will live, and let me care for you until the spring. I have always longed to be garden earth. It will cheer me through the long winter to hold such a lovely secret. Ah! how happy I shall be when two beautiful flowers bloom on my breast, perhaps on Easter Sunday! Do not die, but live,—only live."

"If we can be of use, even in this forlorn alley, why of course we must live," replied Yellow.

"And bloom," Variegated whispered. So they both sank down into the yielding earth, composing themselves for months of quiet sleep. The Dirt-heap was filled with thankfulness; and she rejoiced that, even in a small way, she was now garden earth.

At last winter came with howling winds, snow, sleet, and ice. No green thing showed its face to the sky. The ground hardened like iron. For weeks the dirt-heap lay a mound of snow,—white and chill. So much ice piled itself in the alley that only the milkman Ben ventured through its narrow limits.

But the bulbs knew nothing of all this. They lay warm and snug in the dirt-heap, dreaming of spring and the happy hour of blooming. After many weeks came Easter Sunday.

Early in the morning of that blessed day Ben, the milkman, to make a short cut home, turned his horse and wagon into the narrow alley. When he reached the dirt-heap, he pulled up in surprise; for there, in all their first beauty, bloomed two tulips, one of gold color, the other variegated. They seemed to be looking right up in the sky, the dreary alley forgotten. Warm sunlight fell about them, sweet air passed over them, and a soft rich earth held them secure. "Well, well, well," Ben mused: "this is a pretty sight, and takes me back to my boy days on the old farm. I will take these flowers home to my wife Sally as an Easter gift, and I'll bet she will show them to the baby the first thing." So he gathered the tulips, with a generous handful of earth round each bulb. Then he looked down upon the old dirt-heap, and spoke aloud his thoughts.

"I'll bring my wheelbarrow over in the morning, and haul this dirt to Sally. She will spread it all over her flower-beds: it's fine rich soil."

"Garden earth at last! Oh, how glad I am!" rejoiced the Dirt-heap.

"Sister," laughed Variegated, "we are going to be an Easter gift: only think, an Easter gift!"

Yellow nodded her pretty head of gold, and whispered, "A dear little baby is to look at us the first thing!"—Elizabeth Meredith Reese, in the Independent.

THE GREAT POWERS TO JAPAN.

Meekness is weakness;
Force is triumphant;
All through the world,
Still it is Thor's day.—Emerson.

Salve, Japan! We seven, the sovereign Powers,
Greet thee, compeer; inscroll thy name with ours,—
United States, Great Britain, Germany,
France, Russia, Austro-Hungary,
And Italy. Henceforth the world-estate
We share with thee, Japan,—Japan the Great.

For years on years thy marvel-working art,
Thy homage, leal and feal of hand and heart,
Have borne thy name to fame in many a land,
Procured thee largess, won thee wide command.
But not for these do we this equal place
Allow with us in lordship o'er man's race.
The meek are weak, triumphant yet is force,
The globe around the mastery still is Thor's.
The conquering hand that strikes to maim, to kill,
Insatiate greed, show Thor the world-god still.
These test a claim to wear the human crown,
When pitiless swayed are badge of true renown.
Commanding these, we scorned thy tranquil years,
We set at naught thy peaceful hopes and prayers.
But now these held by thee with ruthless might Prove thee our peer; the crown is thine by right.
America, thick strewn with Red Men dead;
India's wide plains, by Hindu blood washed red;
Hot Africa's jungles, trailed by dying slaves;
Great Asia's heights and ravines, foul with graves;
The isles of Southern seas, a gory prey;
The whole earth round, the aggressor's unstopped way,—
This we have wrought, we, world-compelling Powers.
Like having wrought, Japan, we hail thee ours.
Place for Japan! Our throne and rod of state
We share henceforth with thee, Japan, now Great.

So boast these haughty Potentates; and yet,
Amid their proud acclaims, none may forget
That o'er them each illumines the bannered word
Of Him whom they profess their Sovereign Lord,—
Word given for all men at the meek Christ's birth,
"Glory to God! Good will and peace on earth."

What Leads You

to use the imitations of Pearline? Some trifling prize, cheap prices, or because the grocer or peddler says "same as" or "as good as?" What do these amount to, if your things are ruined in the washing? They may be. And you can't see the damage that a dangerous washing compound is doing, until the damage is done; with the poorest, that takes some time. With these imitations that nobody knows about, you have to take your own risk. Be on the safe side, and use only the original—Pearline. Millions of women can tell about that. Ask some of them, and satisfy yourself. Get their experience.

MEXIOAN STORE-KEEPING.

Among the Mexicans every store and magazine bears a title: it used to amuse me to see that the Store of the Two Hemispheres was probably not over two yards square of our measurement, and that the Magazine of the Globe was carrying a stock worth not a cent more than twenty-five dollars at the outside; but one must accept each country as he finds it, and I am compelled to say that in the larger cities of Mexico there are numbers of finely stocked emporia of different classes of goods.

The position of clerk in one of these great mercantile establishments is much in demand, for what reason it would be hard to say, excepting that the comparative seclusion of the young women makes it somewhat difficult to meet them often, unless one be a special attendant in a dry-goods store, in which case conversation is allowed to flow unreservedly.

If the clerk be young, handsome, well-mannered, bright, and of good family, it generally takes about four hours for a young lady to buy a paper of pins. An intelligent clerk may have a great amount of information to impart upon the subject of pins if the intending customer have dove-like eyes, a gentle voice, tiny, soft hands, and a rich old daddy. There are long pins, short pins, black pins, white pins, American pins, English pins, French pins, and many other varieties, all of which I have heard described at length; but I never found it in my heart to grumble at the delay, and always have murmured, "Bless you, my children, bless you," leaving the more earnest expressions of disapproval to the cross old "dueñas," for whom my antagonism dates back to the days when I was a lieutenant in Arizona, ever so many years ago.

Sometimes one will enter into a gorgeous establishment and feel a vague sensation of distrust at seeing some such firm name as that of "Patricio O'Dowd Hijos" (Patrick O'Dowd's Sons, Monterey).

The original Patrick has long since been gathered to his fathers; but his prosperous business is energetically carried on by descendants of decidedly Castilian appearance, whose only sign of a Celtic derivation lies in their name. And so with the banking firms of MacManus in Chihuahua, and Milmo in Monterey, or MacElroy in Tamalipas, founded by enterprising, intelligent, quick-witted Irish and Scotch ancestors, who married among the natives and left influential families behind them.

In all these mercantile establishments there is the singular custom of pelon, which apparently counterbalances any attempt at overcharging on the part of the proprietors. When you become a regular customer, a tiny tin cylinder is provided and hung up in the store in full view of everybody, marked with your name and number. Every time that you make a purchase a bean is dropped down into the cylinder, and at stated times these are all counted; and for every sixteen or eighteen, depending upon the commercial generosity of the firm, you are allowed six cents in money or goods.

This custom must be one of great antiquity. The word "pelon" means a stone or other crude weight with which it was in ancient days customary to balance the scales used in the market.—Capt. J. G. Bourke, in Journal of American Folk-Lore.

Here and There.

The bread of Mexico is equal to any in the world. The "panaderias," or bakeries, are well patronized, very few families in the towns baking their own supply.

The sultan of Turkey is sending out Mohammedan missionaries to Africa at his own expense to check the Christian advance in that continent.—Presbyterian.

Probably the largest price ever asked for a new book is the $600 demanded for a yellow copy of the Chaucer folio now being printed. The copies printed on paper have already been bought.

The ship canal between the Baltic and Black Seas will be about one thousand miles long. There are no very formidable engineering difficulties. The estimated cost is £20,000,000, and the construction will occupy five years.

Corn-shucks, carefully dried and rubbed smooth, make the favorite wrapping for Mexican cigarettes. Corn-meal, parched with a trifle of "pelonce," or coarse brown sugar, is one of the staple Mexican foods. Without the sugar it was in use among the Aztecs.

A monumental fountain in honor of Heinrich Heine, designed by Herter of Berlin, costing about $35,000, was refused a place, for political reasons, at Düsseldorf, Heine's native town, and has been offered by a number of German societies to the city of New York.

Ancient as is the art of lace-making, the finer qualities do not appear before the fifteenth century. The most celebrated lace collections are those of the South Kensington Museum in London and the Bruges Museum, although the Cluny Museum in Paris contains inestimable specimens of antique lace.

It is said that singers, actors, and public speakers find that since the introduction of the electric light they have less trouble with their voices, they are less likely to catch cold, their throats are not so parched, and they feel better. This is due to the air being less vitiated and the temperature being more even.

The Coreans have no system of education or literature worthy of the name, the masses being unlearned even in their own tongue. The upper classes are lettered in a degree, but even with them reading and writing constitute education. Penmanship is an art much prized, and is widely practised, as in Japan.—American Educational Bulletin.

The flower market of the city of Mexico will suffer but little, if any, in comparison with that of the Madeleine in Paris or Covent Garden, London. There is always a fine display of Jacqueminots, Marshal Neils, tuberoses, mignonettes, pansies, "no me olvides" (forget-me-nots), orange-blossoms, and other beautiful and fragrant flowers, to be had at your own prices. For example, an irreproachable bouquet of all the above flowers made up sells for two bits in Mexican money, equivalent to about sixteen cents American.—J. G. Bourke.

The shops in Paris for the sale of fuel by retail are almost as numerous as the bakeries. They are always neat; and the wood, coal, and kindlings are arranged in a most artistic manner. The wood is piled so as to show the evenly sawed ends; the samples of coal are arranged in glass dishes; and in some of the shops, where orders are taken for the wholesale places, wood is arranged in the windows and decorated with growing moss and ferns. Indeed, the chief aim of the French shopkeeper is to make his shop attractive.—Ladies' Home Journal.

SPRING NO. 2.

In Chronic Dyspepsia and Stone of the Bladder.

A Person who Lived for Years on Tea and Crackers Eats Bacon, Cabbage and Turnips.

Case of Mr. James Covington, Halifax County, Va. Statement by himself, endorsed by Dr. JOHN C. COLEMAN, a Retired Surgeon of the U. S. Navy, Scottsburg, Va.

"For a number of years I was the victim of a most distressing form of Dyspepsia, unable to eat meat or vegetables, and lived entirely upon tea and crackers, bread and milk, and other similar articles. I was subject to nausea and vomiting after eating, and occasionally discharged from an empty stomach a yellow fluid. With my general health already greatly enfeebled, I was about two years ago attacked with a Calculus Affection of the Bladder. There were frequent severe paroxysms, and I was rarely free from suffering, which necessitated a resort to morphia for relief. This complication of maladies reduced me to such a condition that I had despaired of relief from any source, when six months ago, acting upon the suggestion of a neighbor, I commenced the use of BUFFALO LITHIA WATER, which soon so far alleviated my sufferings that I was able to dispense with the use of morphia, and there was a continued and gradual improvement until, at the expiration of some eight weeks, I had an attack of great severity, from which I was relieved by the passage of a Calculus, followed at short intervals by three other attacks, each resulting in a similar manner, the passage of Calculus, which proved to be the termination of this trouble. Not less remarkable and happy was the action of the water in my painful and long-standing Stomach disorder, which it entirely relieved, restoring perfect digestion. I now eat with impunity Bacon, Cabbage and Turnips, and whatever else I fancy, and am in vigorous general health, attending actively to my business affairs."

Dr. John C. Coleman, Surgeon (retired) U. S. Navy, Scottsburg, Va.

"I am not a Practicing Physician, and was not the attending Physician of Mr. Covington, but as a neighbor I knew of his condition, and suggested the use of BUFFALO-LITHIA WATER in his case, with the remarkable results above stated."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

THOMAS F. GOODE, Proprietor, BUFFALO LITHIA SPRINGS, VA. Springs open for guests from June 15th to October 1st.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

FILES OF "THE UNITARIAN."

I wish to say to persons desiring to obtain back numbers of the Unitarian in order to complete their sets, that they will need to attend to the matter between now and the 10th of June, or it will be too late. The present publisher, Mr. Geo. H. Ellis, can furnish back numbers since January, 1891, the time when the publication office was removed to Boston. But for the five years previous to that time back numbers can be obtained only from me. Most of the numbers of that period I can furnish; but I shall dispose of all before June 10, after which time it will be impossible for me to give aid to any in completing their early files.

Pleasantries.

Sheridan, once entering a committee-room and finding every seat occupied, said, "Will any one move that I may take the chair?"

"What do we mean by health?" asked the teacher. "Health," said a timid little voice, "is when you're real fat and have lots of skin!"—Youth's Companion.

A brilliant conversationalist was told by a lady, "Sir, there is really no end to your wit." "Heaven forbid," replied the humorist, "that I should be at my wit's end!"

"I went to Sunday-school yesterday," a little girl said to her aunt, "and the teacher asked me 'who made me.' So I just told her nobody made me. I wonder if she thought I was a paper doll!"

When Beau Nash was ill, the doctor asked him if he had followed his prescription. "No, doctor," said Nash. "If I had, I should have broken my neck; for I threw it out of the second-story window."

A contemporary contains an advertisement of a dog for sale. Among the good points of the animal are these: "He will eat anything, and is very fond of children."—Observer.

That was a bright girl in the street-car the other day who said to her companion, who was making the usual female search for her purse: "Let us divide this, Ethel. You fumble, and I'll pay."—Commercial Bulletin.

"It was awfully clever of baby," said a fond mother. "He had never been told what flowers were; but the moment he saw them he said, 'Bwobs!'" "Indeed! And what does 'bwobs' mean?" "Why, flowers, of course."—Harper's Bazar.

The postmaster's boy and the professor's boy were playing together. A question of precedence arose; and the professor's boy exclaimed: "You ought to let me go first! My father's an A.M." "Huh!" replied his companion. "That's nothing. My father's a P.M."—Harper's Young People.

An echo of the war between Japan and China is the statement that a Japanese scout fell into the hands of the Chinese. His captors went to the Chinese commander and said, "General, we have captured a Japanese spy." "What luck!" exclaimed the general. "Perhaps he can tell me where my army is!"—Youth's Companion.

"So Rev. Blank has nervous prostration?" "Yes, and I think it must date from his shock last summer. You know he was reading his favorite hymn in church; and just as he had read impressively,

'Through the harsh noises of our day
A low, sweet prelude finds its way,'

the low came indeed, but from a cow under the window!"

The London Christian World tells the following story: "A hoary-headed joke has repeated itself in connection with the Laud celebration. A North Country gentleman went to the celebration because, he told his friends, he thought Laud must have been a good man, or King David would never have commended him in the Hundredth Psalm, wherein, in the metrical version, he sang in the North nearly every Sunday, 'Praise Laud, and bless his name always!'"

Here is an anecdote told of Victorien Sardou, the French dramatist. He was invited to dinner by a banker friend. He failing to put in an appearance at the end of forty-five minutes past the appointed time, the family sat down to satisfy their appetites. At length Sardou arrived, the meal being half over. The banker was in no pleasant mood, and he asked Sardou sharply if he took his house for a hotel. The playwright, calmly seating himself, exclaimed: "Certainly not! If that had been the case, I should not be here." "Why?" "Because," he answered, "I never accept invitations to dinners in hotels."—Harper's Young People.

A DISCOUNT FOR THE PRAYER.

The following story is told in the Epworth Era of Rev. H. S. Thrall, one of the pioneers of Methodism in Texas: "In company with a number of itinerants who were on their way to Conference, Dr. Thrall stopped to spend the night with an old farmer. It was the custom then to settle the bill at night, so that they might rise about three o'clock in the morning and ride a good way before breakfast, and lie by in the heat of the day. Dr. Thrall, acting as spokesman of the party, said to the old farmer after supper: 'We are a company of Methodist preachers going to conference. If you will get the family together, we will have prayers with you.' After prayers one by one settled his bill. Dr. Thrall's turn came, and he asked for his bill. The old farmer replied: 'Well, pa'son, I charged the rest twenty-five cents; but, bein' as you prayed for us so good, I won't charge you but twenty cents.'"

Editorial.

THE recent death of Rev. Dr. Miles removes from us one of our oldest and most widely known ministers. He filled many places of responsibility, and rendered valuable service. After a long and faithful ministry at Lowell, Mass., he was chosen secretary of the American Unitarian Association, which office he held six years. On his resignation, he was called to the ministry of the Third Congregational Society of Hingham, where for many years, as pastor and preacher, he endeared himself to his people. He received the degree of D.D. from his Alma Mater; and, as a loyal son of Brown, he took an active interest in his college. The full details of his life and career we leave for future notice, and will only now allude to one or two features of his character. His was a constantly growing mind. His last days were his ripest. Those who heard his address a few years ago at the Berry Street Conference noted its vigor and freshness, and the evidence that he had kept himself in close touch with the newest thought. Not long since his speech at the commencement of Brown University roused his hearers to a high pitch of merriment from its wit and humor. His mind was active until the last, as is well known by the readers of the Register. As his years increased, so his faith grew in cheerfulness and strength. His old age was mellowed and brightened by a serene trust and with uplifted hope in the future. Surrounded by friends whose loving hands smoothed his pillow and closed his eyelids, he welcomed with a calm faith the coming of the death angel, with the assurance that, whether here or there, he could not drift beyond the Father's love and care.

WE are passing from the sentimental to the scientific treatment of social problems. The calcium light of investigation has been thrown upon the slums of great cities; and the vice, misery, and crime which have been revealed are startling. The question at once arises, What can be done to bring about a change? Hitherto the efforts have been largely guided by feeling. The first thought has been immediate alleviation of the evils. But experience shows that, if we are to make a permanent change, we must strike at the causes which produce poverty, vice, and crime. This is now so evident that attention is largely given to this aspect of the case. Colleges and theological schools have chairs of social science, and the whole subject of charity is receiving large treatment. Miss Dudley, the head of the Denison House College Settlement in Boston, asserts as the results of her experience that the working classes "cannot be helped fundamentally or primarily by charity or philanthropy, but by co-operation with them in the directions which they themselves think will aid them." This whole subject has been well treated in the papers and discussions at the recent National Conference of Charities at New Haven. The president, Hon. Robert Treat Paine, in his opening address, made it clear that the science of men's welfare involves some of the most difficult of problems. Charity in the past has made as well as helped paupers. The aid given to the unemployed has often increased the number of tramps, and the same is true of other efforts for reform. What is needed is an intelligent study of this whole subject; and the gathering of experts to report the results of their experience, observation, and study is full of promise. We fully indorse the words of Mr. Paine: "The time has come to put our sociological work and study on a worthier and more thorough basis of scientific knowledge."

THERE is an evident disposition on the part of many to paint dark pictures of the condition of the Sandwich Islands, and to give currency to false statements of the real condition of affairs which prevail there. If this was done only by irresponsible writers and newspapers, it would have little effect; but, when Mr. Thomas G. Shearman of Brooklyn enters the list, and the New York Evening Post declares: "Nothing that we know of in church annals can quite equal the dealings of the missionaries and their sons with the Hawaiians. They contain cant, hypocrisy, covetousness, unscrupulousness, fraud, deceit, and gross abuse of power in about equal proportions,"—when we read this, we are led to ask, What is the real truth about this whole matter? The Independent and the Congregationalist of May 30 contain two letters from residents which give us not only opinions, but also facts. Rev. Sereno E. Bishop, with the knowledge derived from a long experience, has tabulated the ages, occupations, and other data of every son of a missionary now residing in the Hawaiian Islands. We have not space to give these convincing details; but they clearly prove that, as a body, these men, representing three generations, stand exceptionally high in moral character, in education, and, in general capability. Rev. Thomas Gulich, also speaking from personal knowledge, assures us that great changes for the better have taken place under the influence of Christianity. When the first missionaries went there, the people were savages. "Now they nearly all live in comfortable houses, and are clothed in a civilized manner. None of them knew how to read and write. Now a larger percent. have a common-school education than the native-born population of any State in New England; and in a material point of view they are five times as well off, individually, as when the missionaries first came to the islands." Moreover, the necessity for the present revolution arose from the corrupting influences of the native rulers. We call our readers' attention to these two letters. The facts they give clearly show that the arraignments made by the Evening Post and others seem, to say the least, both indiscriminate and untrue.

A VERY exciting incident took place at one of the sessions of the Presbyterian Assembly. Dr. Gillespie, in a very earnest and impassioned speech, urged the claims of foreign missions, and at the close mentioned the fact that a graduate from a Western theological seminary stood ready, with a young woman to whom he was engaged, to go to Africa to take the place recently made vacant by death. "I blow the trumpet," said the secretary, "and ask the ladies of Pittsburg and Allegheny whether they will let the sun set to-day with the money uncontributed which the young couple, your children, need for their salary for the year." The appeal roused the audience to a high pitch of excitement, and it was proposed to raise the whole amount on the spot. The enthusiasm was so great that the entire sum was pledged in a few moments. The young candidate was called at the close of the meeting to give the benediction, and the audience went away with a thrill of delight. The zeal ran over into the next day, when the assembly proposed to raise a million of dollars to wipe out a debt of the Benevolent Board's. As an evidence of what had been done for missions, it was stated that during the last twenty-five years this body has raised for this object $47,000,000.

ANNIVERSARY WEEK.

"The glory of Anniversary Week has departed!" So says the oracle of the daily press, and it must be true. No doubt popular interest in this series of meetings has waned; and since, from the newspaper point of view, popular interest is not only glory, but the very breath of life, the editorial mind feels abundantly justified in its conclusion. There are various ways of accounting for the decline of general interest in these meetings. The growing complexity of life brings forward new objects to think about, and no single one can claim so much attention. It is now so easy at any season of the year to make a pilgrimage to the New England metropolis that what was formerly, for many people, the annual visit to Boston has lost its novelty and charm.

If, however, popular interest could always be retained by keeping up the standard of excellence in that which once attracted it, we might say that Anniversary Week ought still to command all the public notice it once received. At least, it is not an unreasonable assertion that in no series of meetings ever held among Unitarians have more good things been said, or more addresses made which it would profit the community to hear, than during the meetings of last week. If single essays or speeches might be selected from the record of the past more epoch-making or epoch-marking, yet, on the whole, the utterances of this year show no decline of intellectual strength, no weakening of the prophetic vision, no failing of the sources of fervor and zeal.

Meanwhile, though the sayings and doings of Anniversary Week do not immediately reach so large a circle of listeners and readers as in former times, they perhaps make even a deeper mark upon a limited class of minds than ever before. Abating nothing of our reverence for the fathers of our faith, there is yet much reason to believe that we are getting closer than they came in most of their discussions to the fundamental realities of the religious life. There is some ground for affirming that a polemic interest in the consideration of religious problems is yielding to the growth of a deeper spiritual interest; and, in so far as this is true, certainly our talk reaches farther into the springs of life and character. While the results of Anniversary Week now show less upon the surface, it may well be that these days of seed-sowing in the minds of our people plant the beginnings of a no less fruitful harvest. The value of these meetings to our ministers can hardly be overestimated; and, without doubt, many a thought quickened in their minds, as they take counsel together, is published by these living heralds throughout the year far more effectively than it could be promulgated by any printed word.

Where the whole banquet has been so very satisfactory, it is difficult to select any one course for special mention without seeming to do injustice to others. But we venture to express some regret that a larger audience was not present to hear the strong addresses given on Tuesday evening. These were so good that they ought to have been delivered to an assembly filling Music Hall to its utmost capacity. We also wish to suggest the query whether, in the attempt to provide a bill of fare for the members and guests of the American Unitarian Association which shall include a redundancy of good cheer, the officers of that Association may not be offering just a little too much for the average capacity. The civilized man is not equal to those physical feasts with which the savage gorges himself, and perhaps the mental palate that has learned to appreciate a daintier dish goes with a mental digestion less able to bear huge quantities of spiritual food. People of an earlier generation could sit through meetings of enormous length, and then, after a brief intermission, submit themselves fresh and smiling to another interminable discourse. Mr. Nordau might see in our inability to endure this strain another sign of degeneracy; but at least we have to reckon with conditions as they now exist, and three meetings in one day is perhaps a notch beyond the average limit of strength.

As to the indications of the spiritual state of the denomination which these meetings afford, we feel fully entitled to report progress. True, there are reasons for encouragement and for discouragement on either hand, so that, accordingly as one brings to his reading of the signs of the time a pre-disposed mood of hope or anxiety, he will find sufficient pretext for his feeling of elation or despondency. But, setting aside both the pessimism and the optimism which select facts to suit their requirements, the dispassionate mind may take note of changes that make on the whole toward a better and a stronger future.

Not only does this fellowship of thinkers and workers bearing the Unitarian name show an increasing sense of having a mission in the world, but there is more agreement and more definiteness in describing the nature of that mission. A clearer perception of the actual state of religion throughout the country has brought an increased feeling of obligation to preach the truth as we see it, and a stronger consciousness of ability to do a work that shall make its mark on religious history. It is seen that, whatever liberal tendencies may show themselves in older denominations, not only self-respect, but loyalty to the faith we cherish demands that we shall surrender our work into no other hands till the Christian world has fully acknowledged our rights as Christians, and consented to look upon us, not as the enemies, but as the friends of Christianity itself.

All statistics which show that our denominational growth fails to keep pace with the growth of population are somewhat beside the mark. We have never aimed to become great in point of numbers. But we are growing, and we mean to grow till that phase of Christianity which we represent has become an assured element of the spiritual life of the future. In order that we may reach this mark, plenty of earnest and inspiring work is cut out for us; and, whatever may lie beyond this mark, we will accept no invitations to our own funeral till so much is accomplished.

FAILURE.

Mr. Howells has recently written a few poems that are almost thrilling in their direct personal application of old principles. A new sense of the danger of prosperity, of the failure that is implied by complacency with one's attainments, sweeps over the mind with genuine conviction as one reads the single stanza wherein a man has a vision of himself, sees his own life with all his selfish dreams fulfilled, and cries in a moment of sudden insight and agony, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" If it is man's perdition to be safe when he ought to die for the truth, it is none the less his peril to be so protected from the sorrow and struggle of the world as to know nothing of the great depths of sorrow and disappointment. The lines of Mr. Howells are only a recognition of the truth that all joy is built on the foundations of pain. Progress itself is possible only through effort and loss. Buddha's word was, "What good thing have my brothers that did not come from search and strife and loving sacrifice?" and Jesus said, "He that findeth his life shall lose it." It seems a hard doctrine, but it is the eternal paradox of compensation.

It is beautiful to see around us those young "glad souls, without reproach or blot," who do each day's work as it comes, serving the needs of the world with gladness and reminding us of the flowers that blossom in beauty just because, somehow or other, they have come to the right time for blossoming, and it is the most natural thing in the world for them to do. But this blessed unconsciousness cannot last, even if it ever exists in the degree one may fancy when looking on from the outside. Sooner or later the responsibilities multiply, sorrow comes with sudden surprise, and every soul that thinks and feels and aspires must sooner or later face the hard conditions of real life and actual progress. When we are young, we have our ideals of personal happiness that seem wholly attainable. Happiness seems our birthright, the promise held out to us by the beautiful world in which we find ourselves, by the love that welcomes us, and by the opportunities for innocent pleasure that open on every side. We do not ask for happiness above our fellows. We ask such little, little things that seem almost within our reach. Sometimes we think that we have already made them our own, and only ask that life may never change. But it does change; and we stain our ideals with our desires, and we learn with trouble that we must set our longings higher. If we want real happiness, we must aim at something far above it. If we want love, we must deserve it. If we want our children to be good, we must be what we ask them to become. If we want to minister to the suffering world, we must forego the gratifications of the minute.

It is a hard thing for a man to be confronted in middle life with the fact that his life, viewed in the light of his early hopes, is a failure. Many of us have to face this; but, fortunately, the realization of it often comes so gradually that, when the whole truth dawns on us, our backs have already become accustomed to the unexpected burdens, and daily commonplace duties press on us with such imperative claim that we have no time to spend in sorrowing. Still the consciousness is there; and ever and again we go over the past, trying to think how we might have managed better, or wondering if we are really pawns on a chess-board, moved at the will of another.

Such a sense of failure has its own discouragements, sometimes more paralyzing than sorrow or trial; and it is not so easy to see that it, too, may lead us into something better than concern for our own fortunes. Sorrow we can bear if we must. It comes without our seeking. Its mystery awes and dignifies and transforms life's values. It is different with failure in our dearest plans. We have probably brought it on ourselves; and, what is worse, it has involved the misfortunes of others. Weakness, mistakes, folly, sin,—how can we bear these?

Then there is the suffering that comes from wider knowledge of the wrongs we cannot hinder. We read of the barbarities inflicted on helpless children and women in Armenia, or the horrible revelations forced upon us touching certain phases of life in our great cities, until every nerve in the body aches with actual pain. Life seems for the time worthless, if such things must go on and on while we are sitting safe in our sheltered homes, and lift no finger of help or resistance.

Here we must remember again the principle just stated, that all progress comes by defeat and loss. We must die to the lower life every time that we are born into a higher experience. It is better to be courageous than to escape all need of courage, better to suffer for an ideal than to rest content with lower satisfactions, better to achieve happiness indirectly by scorning personal aims than to receive it unearned and undeserved. We do not always see this in our own lives, and it is not necessary that we should. Only now and then are we permitted to stand on the heights, where we may look before and after and estimate influences and results. Enough for us if we have light sufficient for each day's needs, and an invincible faith that the final victory shall be worth all the failures that led to it.

Failure at the worst is only relative. To the man who has once learned to control his own inner kingdom there need come no sense of defeat in outward circumstance. To the true, brave soul there can come no real defeat. The stars in their courses fight for him, and the laws of the universe are on his side.

THE CONFERENCE OF CHARITIES.

The annual meeting of the National Conference of Charities and Correction which was held in New Haven, Conn., last week was marked by a spirit of progress which should come naturally enough to an organization which has reached its majority.

Only two of the little band that formed this association twenty-two years ago survive. But those two must rejoice in the strong and vigorous growth that has been made. Instead of a handful of people feeling their way doubtfully to the best method of rousing public attention to the causes they had at heart, they see a resolute and determined society of eight hundred members, and commanding such wide influence in the country that the best men count it an honor to serve as its officers.

The Conference is no longer a single organization. It is composite in structure, the various sections representing such subjects as care of the insane, the feeble-minded, the poor, the wayward, and the vicious. Experts on all these subjects discuss them at the general sessions and in section meetings. Among them all nothing demands and secures more skill and a better hearing than the subject of the Associated Charities.

This year there was an attempted amalgamation of science and philanthropy, New Haven being expressly chosen as a happy place for such fusion. The attempt met a success that was not unlooked for. Six or eight professors, representing Yale, Smith, and Columbia, read papers or took part freely in the meetings, and in turn listened patiently to the men and women who spoke from long experience with these social problems. One of them was overheard to say that such an exchange of thought was of greater value to the closet student than to the people who work day by day in the laboratory of living subjects.

The only apparent disadvantage was that the sociologists of the class-room were apt to use a vocabulary hardly understood by the plainer folk of the workshop and the farm. To make social science popular, it must be presented in the simplest and most intelligible language.

Another experiment is about to be tried by this energetic Conference, or rather by certain of its members. That is to formulate a plan by which the Charities' Review, which is at present devoted mainly to charity organization, shall be widened in its scope, so that all subjects referring to charities and correction shall find therein an opportunity for expression. It is not the intention to have an "organ" for the Conference, for that is opposed to the general policy of the association. It is a body for collecting and presenting facts and principles. To the public is left the task of adopting and applying them according as they shall commend themselves. Individual members may proclaim their own faith and creed with the utmost freedom; but the Conference, as a conference, has no creed, economic, social, or religious. It simply affords an arena where fair-minded and intelligent men and women may meet each other for frank discussion and unreserved exchange of ideas.

As a result of this simple method of conducting affairs, there are never acrimonious debates or painful personalities. The great charm of the Conference is the spirit of comradeship and friendliness.

New England furnished the president for this year, and is justified in wholesome pride in the man she chose, Robert Treat Paine. His opening address was so comprehensive and admirably adapted to educate a wise public sentiment that it was at once ordered to be printed, and copies by the thousand will find their way into the community.

The influence of gatherings like that in New Haven, bringing together hundreds of men and women who stand for a great deal in the thirty States from which they come, cannot be measured. Not to attend them means loss of inspiration for the hard work of the world, which, without such stimulus, is drudgery: with it that drudgery becomes divine.

Musings.

THINK of a village of seventeen hundred people moving along at the rate of twenty-two miles an hour,—beds and bedding, bags and baggage, houses and furniture, stores and store-rooms, kitchen and cupboards, pianos and libraries, barber-shop and doctor; a full complement of lawyers, ministers, bankers, mechanics, business men of every sort; a large number of young married couples; a whole troop of children; and uncounted babies; with, of course, the curse of most villages, the bar-room and the smoking-room. This village is named "Lucania." It has become detached from the United States, and will be annexed to England in a few days, wind and weather permitting. Baron Münchhausen's fiction of a floating island might be applied very well to this great mass of floating iron, though it is to be hoped that no successor of the arch liar will spike it to the ocean bed. But it seems more like some great monster, with mighty lungs and pulsing heart and slashing tail, which beats the ocean into foam. I suppose in no form of conveyance are the conditions of organized modern society so fully preserved as on a great ocean steamer. The relations of dependence, of trust, of mutual helpfulness, are all illustrated; and then there are the local and artificial relations which pertain to the aristocracy of wealth,—the luxury of the first cabin, the moderate comfort of the second, and the privation of the steerage. The aristocracy of intellect is differently distributed. There is certainly some of it in the first cabin, some in the second, and some of it in the steerage. My friend, the judge, whose judgments the State of Maryland has good reason to honor and respect, declares that the most stupid people on this voyage are in the first cabin. But this judgment certainly would not apply to the judge himself. For the first two or three days of an ocean trip stupidity is something which is not confined to any one class of passengers; and I am disposed to believe that a comatose state is one of the most desirable to attain, and I congratulate myself on having attained it.

ZEUS is dead, Hermes has become a telegraphic despatch, Hephaistos has been translated into the person of Edison, Athene has left the temples erected to her name; but Poseidon is still living, and is engaged in just the same sort of business he was when he stirred up the waves against Odysseus, overwhelmed Æneas, or shipwrecked Saint Paul. I have had more than one interview in my life with this god, and find it a practical necessity to keep on good terms with him. I have never found any ritual, whether Jewish or Christian, medical, mediatorial, or mitigant, which he would accept in lieu of the tribute that from time immemorial he has exacted from travellers of every race and age whom a special intervention of the gods has not protected from his demands. I have met him in different parts of the globe,—in New York Harbor; on Massachusetts Bay; on the Penobscot, the Atlantic; in the Bay of Naples, the English Channel, the Mediterranean, the Ægean, the Irish Sea. And, in his capacity as "earth-shaker" as well as sea-ruler, I have saluted him as a boy from the window of a Broadway omnibus or from a Baltimore & Ohio train. He has impaled me on the prongs of his trident, for he has always been a trinitarian in controversy; and his weapon, if it has not pierced the heart, has reached the liver. So I have met the old theistic salt on this trip, and the conflict between Christianity and Paganism has been renewed. The Paganism consists in the infliction; the Christianity, in the patience with which you endure it. I have wondered whether Christianity or science, or that decoction of the two misnamed Christian Science, would succeed in dethroning the tyrant. Christianity has been tried often enough, and has failed. Science has attempted it again and again without success. Christian Science has failed as completely as it has failed to supplant surgery, or has failed to reconcile the jargon of Mrs. Eddy's book with the canons of philosophy or common sense. And so I am almost, if not altogether, persuaded that the only perfect and absolute prevention is to smooth out the ocean with a flat-iron, if the flat-iron can only be found,—some such mythical soothing power as that which tied up the winds in the cave of Æolus or said to the winds and waves: "Peace! Be still!" And, if only about a hundred million Chinese, with a mountain of starch and a million square miles of American prairie for a flat-iron, could laundry the bosom of the ocean into absolute smoothness, I should say it would be the best indemnity that Japan could demand. But I must do the ocean justice; and to its credit be it said that it has never behaved with more dignified and merciful serenity than on this trip. Its rhythmic swell was felt soon after we left Sandy Hook, and we had our share of breakfast rolls the next morning; but for the two days succeeding we have had the "mill-pond" sea, and the weather has been as delightful and considerate as the most exacting land-lubber could ask. When I sail into American waters again, it will probably be when I cross the line between the United States and Canada in the steamer "Lady of the Lake" on Lake Memphremagog; but that dear old lake, if the breezes coy with it at all, can hardly be smoother than the ocean. Under these conditions the "Lucania" made to-day a run which no other ocean steamer except itself has made,—five hundred and twenty-four miles. As we are going so rapidly east, our day is no longer twenty-four hours long; and this run has been actually made in twenty-three hours and fourteen minutes.

Brebities.

Anniversary weather reached a beautiful climax on the Festival day, and the spirit of the occasion seemed to match the weather.

Lack of space compels us to defer the report of the Sunday School Society meeting as well as some anniversary addresses. They will not spoil in keeping. A good spirit is an excellent preservative.

A correspondent, referring to "Good Sense in Religion," by H. R. Rose, says,

"The issue of such lectures by the Universalist Publishing House marks the most radical and most hopeful departure in the history of Universalism."

The Boston Sunday Herald prints a picture of Mr. George W. Stone, and a sketch of him and of his proposed work. If Mr. Stone's modesty were not so prominent a characteristic, he might be almost tempted to "take heed" because so many are "speaking well" of him.

The editor writes that on the steamship "Lucania" there was a great deal of gambling on the speed of the vessel. One man won in a day $335. He adds, "I must say that I like the Salvation Army services which are held on the steerage deck better than the pool-selling in the cabin."

The "broom-stick train," as Dr. Holmes called the trolley cars, were made to do excellent duty in some cities on Memorial Day. A flag about three feet long was attached to the cord that controls the trolley, and it was a pretty sight to see them flying in the wind all up and down the streets. It is a legitimate spirit of patriotism that teaches love of the most beautiful flag that floats.

Rev. James De Normandie's interesting article on "The Roxbury Latin School," in the New England Magazine for June, and the deserved praise which he gives unstintedly to the master, Mr. William C. Collar, will be likely to make even more popular that famous old school; for, as he says, "It was Mr. Collar's remarkable gift of teaching which first attracted pupils from the neighboring towns."

New York is sometimes ungracious enough to speak slightly of New Haven, as a village in the woods. Well might any city covet the beautiful elms that make the "woods"; but it does give a feeling that New York is not entirely wrong in its classification to be waked in the small hours of the night in a city hotel by a voice that,

"Warmed with the new wine of the year, Tells all in his lusty crowing."

A correspondent on another page says that, "if Jesus and his disciples founded any church at all, it was the Roman Catholic Church." The Armenian Church, which, according to good authority, is historically older than the Roman Catholic Church, would resent such a claim. But it is the spirit of Christ, and not the authority of Jesus as a church founder, that it concerns us to find; and, happily, that may be found in all churches, in a measure.

It is almost impossible to reach the moslems of Turkey with Christian influence, in spite of the fact that the American Board has had missions there more than sixty years. The United Presbyterians seem to have been more successful in Egypt. Rev. G. R. Leavitt, D.D., after visiting the schools and church in Assiout, says: "One of the brightest features of the work is that it has so successfully reached Mohammedans. Of the eight thousand pupils in the mission schools, fifteen hundred are Mohammedans. Mohammedan boys send their boys to these schools in preference to the State schools. As many as seventy Mohammedans have been received into the churches. A book has been written in Syria for Mohammedans, giving the story of Christianity. This book has had a great sale in Egypt. It has just passed to its third edition. From ten to fifteen thousand copies of the Scriptures in Arabic are sold every year."

The subject of Christian unity formed the topic of discourse last Sunday in many of the pulpits of Chicago, New York, and other places. Prayers were made in the Roman Catholic churches for a larger union. One of the most notable sermons was that preached by Rev. Dr. Donald in Trinity Church, Boston. Those who heard his Lowell lectures are prepared to hear from him noble words on this subject. As printed in the Transcript, the rector of Trinity was clear and explicit in his language. The first step of Christian unity, he said, for Episcopalians, should be to disclaim, "once for all, and in words that cannot be misunderstood, that it is the authoritative teachings of our church that episcopal ordination is necessary in the constitution of a Christian church and a valid sacrament. Until this is done, all hopes of Christian unity, so far as we are to help create it, are of the substance of dreams." This position will, undoubtedly, be assailed by many of his brethren; but the spirit and purpose which prompt it mark a long step toward a true Christian unity.

The Anniversaries.

HYMN.

BY REV. EDWARD A. HORTON.

[Written for the Unitarian Festival.]

New visions burst upon our sight,
New duties bloom in glad surprise;
We ask for faith to greet the light,
And tread the path that onward lies.

If courage fail, the prophet's word
Shall perish on the lips of youth;
All silent, then, the song once heard
When hearts were dauntless for the truth.

Above the crumbling touch of change
Our cherished hopes and longings last;
Let progress come in ripening range
Of richer fruitage on the past.

Through starry space one plan we see;
O'er life below reigns ceaseless care;
O God, we would, in service free,
Help build thy kingdom everywhere.

THE UNITARIAN FESTIVAL.

The annual festival, when the Unitarian laity entertain the clergy with their wives and daughters, was held at Music Hall, May 30. The meeting was called to order by the chairman of the Festival Committee, Archibald Howe, Esq., who introduced the presiding officer, Hon. Carroll D. Wright.

ADDRESS OF HON. CARROLL D. WRIGHT.

This beautiful annual custom of the laity tendering a banquet to the clergy is as inspiring in its way as is that other custom which to-day finds its celebration wherever a loyal heart exists. By this festival the laymen of our Church testify to their loyalty to its grand precepts, and pledge anew their devotion to its cause and their support and encouragement to its faithful ministers. To their guests the occasion brings new inspiration and a renewal of the force which comes from appreciation, for the most faithful minister finds his efforts wearisome unless he can see the actual working of the spirit he brings to his labors. The unified force of the pulpit and the pews is as essential in all religious work as the consecration of the preachers; and the sustaining strength which comes not only from appreciation, but appreciation expressed, is an important element in all church work. The "well done" should find expression in individual cases, and the "well done" of the laity at large finds its expression to-night. If, however, the laymen, as a body, bring their good wishes to the clergy, and the inspiration to continued faithful and acceptable service, they feel they can be of positive assistance by their approval or disapproval of the thought which pervades clerical circles; and happy it is for the Unitarian denomination that the verdict is usually one of approval. The antagonistic lines which have at times caused unhappy controversial contests in religious bodies are not pronounced with us. Divergent thought ever converges at last, and brings to the body of our worshippers fresh and buoyant hope, a renewed faith in the religion we profess, and a strengthened purpose to perpetuate all the good of the older teachings and a determination to weigh well all new propositions.

It is our happy privilege to meet to-night under the influence of the new declaration of our National Conference, and, I trust, to ratify the invitation sent out from Saratoga. The Conference declared that the churches represented in it accept the religion of Jesus, holding, in accordance with his teachings, that practical religion is summed up in love to God and love to man.

Do we comprehend what this means? Can we, as laymen, read out of this the emphasis of a new faith, the call to a revival of a religion the beneficent elements of which the world is only now beginning to be conscious? Do we realize the coming of a new era, in which justice, morality, service to humanity, and thus to God, shall be more fully realized than at any previous period of the world's history? that humanity is coming to its heritage of control in its own interest, and thereto will seek the destruction of forces that are but the relics of man in his barbarous age?

The world is passing through a stage leading out of militancy into industrialism; yet on the eve of the birth of a new century we witness the struggles of the old spirit of war to perpetuate its power, but in the less bloody but equally unhappy contests for industrial and commercial supremacy. "In more venturesome times the hero was he who had slain his tens of thousands." Now the great general may be the man who has carried some magnificent business undertaking to gigantic proportions. The revival of pure religion, which is surely coming with the era of ethical judgment, will bring to the highest appreciation of their fellow-men those who achieve such greatness and yet comprehend their moral obligations to society, and who recognize and practise the power of justice in dealing with all human relations, and who understand that all business, all undertakings, must be prosecuted on the basis of the Decalogue, and that the same great law shall rule in all social relations.

We beseech our ministers to take into their lives a new consecration in the spirit of the new declaration. Let its power inspire you to help us laymen, in our daily work, to fight the battles of religion. Help us to be brave and courageous and true, and to seek our reward in the same verdict we bring to you to-night,—"Well done!" Help us to see the right, to consecrate our lives to the work of perfecting humanity,—the real service of God. Help us to bear obloquy, misunderstood motives, evil tongues, and all that comes of a true fight for eternal truth and principle. Bring to us the spirit of Channing, of Dewey, of Clarke, of the hosts of saints that have told the world that character is the basis of salvation. Unfold to us the new religion, which takes into its vitalizing force more than all creeds and more than all dogmas,—the religion which comes by service, by science, by art, by enthusiasm. Teach us the great fact—not the belief, but the great fact—of immortality; that the new religion welcomes all truths, all science, as its efficient coadjutors; and that every fact that science discloses only reveals a new flash of the divine Love, reveals again the face of the almighty Father.

The new era is coming in this spirit; and with it are coming new questions, which already tempt men to say that retrogression is the rule,—that degenerate days are upon us. It is only the stirring of the waters by the divine Spirit of Justice, bringing to the surface the selfishness, the ignorance, and the cupidity of men, who struggle for a power which can only be secured through industrial channels; and such struggles belong not to one side only, but to all sides of industrial contests. Power is sweet, its possession sweet, its effects too often bitter,—not only to the taste of the possessor, but to all in any way subjected to it. The thought of the coming era will consecrate power, as it has in the past the ugly forces of war, and teach its holders to exercise it wisely and ethically.

Shall we, as a body of Christians, seek to hasten this era,—seek to bring about this new revival? I believe we shall; and with our past to inspire us, and with our faces turned to the light, we shall be in the forefront of the good work when the battle of the new century is announced. We must have our lamps in order, and we shall be among the heralds to proclaim the new spirit. We shall work shoulder to shoulder with all the good and true men everywhere who are trying to replace all injustice, of whatever magnitude, with practical righteousness, and who believe that no human right can be trampled on with impunity, and that no man can trample on a single human being and still be superior to the one upon whom he tramples.

We have no superstitious fear of the prophetic cipher of a new century. To us it means new opportunities, new avenues of development, new inspiration. To us, clergy and laity, it means a realization of the religion our own Hedge so eloquently analyzed, when he wrote that the scope of religion is the measure of history. "It supplied the first rudiments of civil society: it forecasts the social destination of man. Wherever humanity is found at its highest, religion has been the motive power, leader in all progress, home guard of all stability, source of revolutions the most prevailing, champion and prize of the boldest adventures, pioneer more eager than commerce, explorer more patient than science. Religion is acknowledged the mother of arts. She reared the temples that make Egypt venerable, and shaped the marbles that made Greece renowned. She lighted the eyes of the Sistine virgin, and unrolled the 'Divina Commedia,' and inspired the strains of Handel and Bach. In private life she has been the authoritative teacher, comforter, lifting the soul above the dust, purifying the heart by faith, eliciting the spirit of self-sacrifice by which society subsists, cheering the sufferer in mortal pains, redeeming and renewing the world."

This grand definition reaches into the coming revival of a religion which shall hold in its power the church, industry, commerce, and the whole social fabric.

In the spirit of this work we pledge you our warm support; and, as a present earnest of that pledge, we welcome you to our festivities.

ADDRESS OF REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen,—I have, friends, an earnest word to bring to you. I shall let my younger friends, Mr. Batchelor, Dr. Hale, and others, furnish the frivolous part of the entertainment. I shall be very serious, but I trust that I shall not be so long that you will weary of it. Our friend, Mr. Alger, the other night, at the meeting of the Boston Association, said again what has been said so many times in the past, that Unitarianism started as a revolt, a protest, and that that protest had very largely run its course, and that, if we wished to continue in denominational power, we must gain some new impulse, some new motive for our being. I do not like that way of putting it. Unitarianism was not born a protest merely. If you choose to say that a grass-blade or a seed in springtime protests, revolts, against that which keeps it back and down, then well: I admit that kind of protest, I accept that definition of revolt. But Unitarianism meant, when it came among men, a new step in the age-long evolution of the religious life of man. [Applause.] It was born out of three great new forces: three great steps in advance did man take at that time.

In the first place, the human heart had grown so tender, so sympathetic, so touched with the sorrows of men, that it would no longer bear the cruel theories of religion that had dominated the world of the past. It meant, then, a great step forward on the part of the human heart. That step Whittier has indicated for us in those beautiful words from that most wonderful poem, "The Eternal Goodness,"—

"I trace your lines of argument,
Your logic linked and strong,
And weigh as one who dreads dissent
And fears a doubt as wrong.

"But still my human hands are weak
To hold your iron creeds.
Against the words you bid me speak
The heart within me pleads."

That is what Unitarianism meant, so far as the growth of the heart of man was concerned. It meant another step on the part of conscience. The conscience of the race had come to assert its right to judge as to what was right and wrong here, and to assert fearlessly that nothing in heaven could be right or wrong as related to humanity which contradicted the sense of right and wrong that God had planted in the conscience of man. [Applause.] Unitarianism meant a grand advance on the part of conscience in the civilized world.

It meant another thing, another step ahead in the intellect of man. Man at last came of age, and asserted his right to reject that which was manifestly unreasonable. Not that we claimed the right or the power to measure the universe: we have always been ready to admit that there are things beyond human reason, but we cannot accept that which is manifestly and palpably contradictory to human reason. Unitarianism, then, meant a grand growth of the heart, the conscience, and the intellect of man.

I do not think that our fathers, if I read history correctly, were engaged at that time, consciously, in a battle for liberty. But, in asserting their right to feel and think, they had of necessity thrown off the old bonds and found themselves free; and, finding themselves free, they were ready, as other bodies were not, to accept whatever light, whatever new truth, might "break forth out of God's Holy Word," or might break forth out of God's holy universe, or out of God's holy humanity. They were ready to accept the new universe, the new flood of light that has come to us as the result of modern philosophical thinking and modern scientific discovery.

Then what happened at Saratoga? We woke up at last to the logic of our position; and we were ready, putting aside the old-time emphasis on ceremonial, putting aside the old-time emphasis on creed,—we were ready to declare, by common consent, that, in our judgment, the central thing in religion is the heart. We said, "Practical religion is summed up in love to God and love to man,"—not in thoughts about it, not in beliefs about it.

I take it, friends, that no one will accuse me of underestimating the intellectual side; but I am thoroughly in accord with the position at Saratoga, which declares that the heart, that love, is the deepest thing in religion. We need the grandest intellectual development; but we need the intellect simply as the head-light of a locomotive, to shine on the track and tell us where we are going. We need the intellect, like the compass of the ship, like the man at the helm; but the compass and the man at the helm are nothing as compared with the precious freight and the passengers. The heart is the central thing in the religious life: the intellect is the leader, the guide. I sometimes hear the heart emphasized in such a way as makes me wonder that people need any brains at all in order to be religious.

I hear the heart spoken of sometimes as though brain might be thought to be an impertinence. No: brains as the leader; the heart, the love, the service, as the essential thing in the religious life.

Having attained this position, we, as Unitarians, are ready to stand with both our hands out, one of them reaching toward the right wing, and the other toward the left wing, and with frankness and sympathy and welcome in them both. I am ready, for one, to fight for the right of a parish to be just as conservative as it wants to be, and to have just as conservative a minister as it wishes. I am ready, on the other hand, to fight for the right of a parish to be just as radical as it wants to be, and to have just as radical a minister as it wishes. And I am ready to declare that, when either the right wing or the left wing rises up and kindly proposes to tolerate the other, it is not liberal: it is simply impertinent. [Applause.] I want no tolerance for my position: I simply assume it as a right, as a man, and as a child of God.

I am glad and grateful that there is a religious denomination that can frankly, cordially, lovingly, recognize both wings. There is liberty enough to go round, and they can cordially co-operate and work together. And, certainly, friends, if we believe that the heart, that character, is the essential thing, then, whether the intellect lead a man to the right wing or to the left wing, we shall love him just the same, and co-operate with him in all the noble work of the religious life. [Applause.]

Occupying now this position, there are two special things which we, as Unitarians, ought to attempt to accomplish,—two special movements waiting our service. First, we are fitted, as no other religious denomination in the world is fitted, to be the religious leaders of the intellectual leaders of the world. We have found out what most of the religionists of the world have not discovered,—that changes in philosophical theory, changes in scientific conceptions of the universe, not only do not endanger religion, but do not touch it. Religion lives through all these changes, as the sun shines just the same, whatever may be your theory of light. We are ready to preach, then, to the leading scientific and philosophical thinkers of the world the profound truth that religion lives through all changes of theory; and that because evolution has come, because any scientific theory has been accepted, that does not at all mean that we are outgrowing or leaving religion behind.

And, then, we are to minister in the other direction. There are thousands of people in the old churches who feel the burden of the creeds as Whittier felt them, who are chafed and hurt by the hard and unjust things in the old faiths, but who are not quite ready to come to us. And why? Because they are not yet persuaded that there is a warm, sympathetic, worshipful, religious life among us. They wonder whether they will be at home with us, whether they will not have to surrender certain sanctities, certain reverences, certain sentiments, which are dear to them, and which seem an essential part of the religious life. I believe, friends, there is a certain amount of ground for this suspicion. There are thousands of men who are Unitarians, for the simple reason that they are not anything else. They are Unitarians because they do not believe any longer in the infallibility of the Bible, they are Unitarians because they do not believe in hell, they are Unitarians because they have ceased to be orthodox; but they do not occupy any positive religious ground of their own. They are born out of the old, and not yet born into the new. [Applause.]

Friends, we ought to be able to teach the world that, along with the freest intellectual life, the open-eyed looking at every fact in the heaven above and the earth below, there can go the tender sympathies, the most reverent worship, the finest and sweetest sentiment of the religious life. If we have thrown these things away, we need to pick them up and cherish them, and make them a part of our religious life once more.

If we are able to minister to these two classes of people, then we are the prophets of what? I do not believe that we are living in the twilight of the gods. I do not believe that the old world is weary, and that we are approaching the evening-time of her history. I believe that only here and there has the rising sun touched a few of the highest mountain summits. It is hardly dawn as yet. The world is just beginning, here and there, to catch and reflect the light of civilization, civil freedom, religious liberty, industrial liberty, and justice, and all the finest and sweetest things of which the world has dreamed. It is morning; and ahead of us what? A religion grander than the world has ever known, a church more magnificent in its proportions, broad in its structure, inclusive in its sympathies, finer than humanity has ever dreamed of.

And what shall that church be called? Can we make our name "Unitarian" large enough, high enough, wide enough, to fit this dream? There are persons to-day in the old faiths who look, as I did, with suspicion upon the name "Unitarian." On the other hand, there are certain persons who are wondering whether any name is not a limitation, and want to get rid even of the name "Unitarian." Why, friends, we must, it seems to me, have some sort of name, if we are going to get our letters through the post-office! [Laughter and applause.] We must be called something. I wonder sometimes that these people name their children,—why they do not let them grow up, and choose a name for themselves. We must have a name. The only question is, What name is noblest and best? I was trained as a child to look with suspicion and fear upon Unitarianism. I have learned to love that word, as the grandest name in all the religious literature of the world. [Applause.] If it has not in the past meant enough, let us put into it meaning enough! [Applause.] Think what it may mean! We have found at last that we are living in a universe. Unity is the greatest work in the modern world,—unity of the universe, unity of God, unity of the forces of the universe. One of the most magnificent discoveries of modern science is called the conservation of energy. It means that all the diverse forces of the world are only diverse manifestations of one force. Unity of life, the unity of man, the unity of religion,—that profound thought that, under whatever name, in whatever clime, man has always been engaged in one religious search,—the search for God, the search for the secret of life. The unity, too, of humanity; the unity of human destiny,—the "One far-off divine event,

To which the whole creation moves."

I, friends, love and propose to stand by, I propose to work for, this Unitarianism of ours, and make it what, in promise and potency, it is,—the most magnificent name, as it is the most magnificent religious movement, that the world has ever known. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN A. TAYLOR.

This great assembly of Unitarians, to my mind, sir, means not alone a protest against the narrowing creeds and bigotries of the age which has preceded this; but it signifies and emphasizes a broadening and widening of the boundaries of our own denominational life. In other words, it expresses to the religious world at large that Unitarians are a growing, expansive religious body; that they are in this world to take a part in all its active hopes and aspirations, adapt themselves to the age in which they live, and open their doors to the living, feeling, acting men of the time. [Applause.] I want, in the few minutes which I shall occupy, to emphasize the relation of the governmental powers to-day and the problems of government to-day to the Unitarian denomination. If Unitarianism means anything, I believe that it means that it shall put into the heart and mind of its constituents the power and the inclination and the prompting to take a man's part in the current affairs of the world. [Applause.] I have no faith, sir, in any religion which is not ready to set on foot those activities which shall lift up the people and make them better. It was the standing charge against the old creeds that they had to do entirely with supernatural affairs. If Unitarianism is to achieve that splendid future which Mr. Savage has so beautifully put before us, it is to do it by becoming a part of the life-blood of the age in which it lives. It must incite to deeds of ethical justice, it must inform the heart and the conscience until they shall carry forward the action of the citizen in a commensurate way. It is one of the greatest needs of this age.

We have all noticed the centralization of government. Our cities are growing at the expense of the outside country, and the most stupendous problem which we have before us to-day is how wisely to govern these great masses of population. Now, I undertake to say that it cannot be done except by the uplifting of the moral status of the average citizen in our community. [Applause.] This day has been set apart for the nation's proffer of respect and esteem to those men who, almost a full generation ago, stood between the sea of battle and our homes,—stood beside their government amid storm, amid disaster, and never flinched for a moment in carrying the signal of their nation's honor to the triumph of the battle-field. Shall we sit quietly down in conventions like this, and shall we be content to say that the war-drum rolls no longer, and the fires of patriotism are burned out, and there is nothing for us to lay upon the altar of our country? I say, Mr. President, that the duties which are incumbent upon you and upon me, and upon every man and woman in this audience, are as sacred to-day as they were in the days of '65. [Applause.] The call to perform the duty of a juror, the call to accept and carry into action an officer of trust in the State, the call to exercise discreetly and wisely, even at personal discomfiture, the elective franchise,—this is as patriotic a call as is the call to battle. [Applause.] I hope that the Unitarian movement will find it a part of its duty to stir the blood of our Unitarian constituency into active, earnest, patriotic work in all these public duties. I want it to be seen and known over the world that, if a man is performing his full duty to the government, is an upright, loyal citizen, the chances are that he is brought up in the Unitarian faith. [Applause.]

The world may little know or care for these thronging crowds of May Anniversary Week; but that magnificent conception of American citizenship which our fathers framed is to draw to itself, all over the world, every honest citizen, and it is to grow in perfect form and radiant beauty according as it shall be accorded the nurture which comes from the great citadel of ethical inspiration,—the Church universal. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF REV. GEORGE BATCHELOR.

Mr. President, Friends, Brothers and Sisters All,—We are always happy to be here: we are happy just because we are here. And some who come, as our Brother Taylor, from places where Unitarians are few, come here, I fancy, with something like the feeling of the old woman who went to the shore of Scotland, and looked out upon the ocean, and said, "Thank God, there's something, for once, that there's enough of!" [Laughter.]

Our Brother Savage has remanded to us younger brethren the frivolous part of the entertainment. I would like to be amusing if I could. I have studied carefully all the rules for the amusing story-teller. I am told, for instance, that Artemas Ward or Mark Twain, when they tell a funny story, look solemn; and the more solemn they look, the more people laugh. Now I tried that. I told a story, and I looked solemn; and the more solemn I looked, the more solemn the audience looked! [Laughter.] I ventured once in England to make a joke [laughter], and the professor of the English language and literature in the ancient University of Koloszar was present. Two years afterward I met him in Chicago. At eleven o'clock at night, on a street corner, waiting for a grip, he said to me: "Mr. Batchelor, when we were in London together, at Lincoln's Inn you made a speech; and you told a story, and the Englishmen did laugh. But I did not understand what they were laughing at. Will you be kind enough to explain to me?"— [Laughter.] I have never ventured since to try to be funny.

I wish, in the briefest possible manner, to sum up what seem to me to be the things that we are set to do. We are set to discover the church of the living God. There are not many churches: there is one, but that church has not yet been revealed. The scaffolding still conceals it; and men are worshipping the scaffolding, the external forms. It is our part to reveal the Church of the living God, to take away everything that conceals it, and to make sure that we are a part of it; to take away the idols, in order that we may reveal the ideals. We are to seek for the truth which is bound up in every dogma, that we may set it free. If we have been by the truth made free, it is our part to set the truth free, that it may have full course and be glorified.

Our resources? I will not take your time to enumerate them. Thirty years ago I came here for the first time, and a pair of happy little fools sat over there by that pillar and thought we had come to heaven. I hope there are more of the same kind here to-night. [Laughter.] And I profess to you that, after thirty years' knowledge of this denomination, there was never a time—I have studied the records of the past, the annals of the great men—there never was a time when there were so many ministers under forty years of age who were equipped for their work with learning, intelligence, virtue, zeal, religion. There never was a time when the women of our organization were so well organized, so active, so enthusiastic, so faithful. There never was a time when we had so many laymen with so much money at our disposal. It will be our fault if we do not avail ourselves of these resources. And, as for the men who are past forty years of age, what shall I say of them? There are no old men. You know what Mr. Tree said at Harvard College the other day, "Whom the gods love die young, because whom the gods love never grow old." Dr. Martineau, Dr. Furness, and the rest of that glorious band have extended our expectation of life and activity by thirty years. We who are here expect to live and work till we are a hundred years old. [Applause.]

Friends, I congratulate you that on this Memorial Day, when so many of you have been doing your patriotic duty, so many have assembled here, that our ranks are full, and that we are full of the spirit of this occasion. The name of Lincoln stands as the name of one who gave to the American people a new ideal; and we who are here to-day, faithful to our religion and faithful to our country, shall help to make war impossible because justice shall rule in our land. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF REV. S. M. CROTHERS.

Mr. Chairman,—You have for a long time enjoyed a well-earned reputation for being sound on all financial questions, but I am very much afraid that to-night you imperil your reputation. If it is indeed true that speech is silver and silence is gold, then we are all cheap money people on Anniversary Week [laughter]; and all of us believe in the unlimited coinage of silver. And after the first days we give up all pretensions to keep up the standard of value, even at the rate of sixteen to one, or any other conceivable ratio. And now I fear that our chairman, in asking me to continue this flood of silver speech, has come to the last gasp of the financial heretic, when he attempts to coin a vacuum. [Laughter.]

I have been going about a good deal this week. I have been trying to be all things to all men, and to "keep up with the meetings." [Laughter.] Yet I have found certain gloomy Jeremiahs, old inhabitants of our Zion, who tell me that Anniversary Week is no longer what it was in the days of their youth. They say sadly that the former days were fuller than these [laughter], and that the visiting saint found earlier in the week that tired feeling which is the only sure reward of virtue. [Laughter.] They tell me in gloomy accents that they discern certain intervals between the meetings. They say that Anniversary Week no longer affords the same soul-satisfying foretaste of that blessed state "where congregations ne'er break up." [Laughter.] I do not know how that is, but I do not take so pessimistic a view of the situation. It seems to me that you who have learned, as you ought to have learned, as faithful Unitarians, to do each hour the meeting that lies next you [laughter] must feel that Anniversary Week still affords no slight opportunity to test the final perseverance of the saints. [Laughter.] For myself, I delight in these festivities; and, as I have gone from meeting to meeting, I have felt like joining in the happy song of the child in Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses,"

"The world is so full of a number of things,
I think we should all be as happy as kings."

The best thing about it all is that things are not so perfect but that they can be reformed, and the reformer never finds his occupation gone. So, in regard to Anniversary Week, I take this hopeful view. I was reading the other day the notice of a local fish-dealer, expressed in such sinewy, clear English that it stuck in my memory. The notice read thus, in words which Chaucer might have used, I suppose, if he had thought of them: "Don't go crying out that there ain't no lobsters. Uncle Si Perkins has piles of them." So I say to all visitors from abroad: "Don't go crying out that there are no meetings. Anniversary Week still has piles of them!" [Laughter.]

But, of all the meetings, to the true Unitarian this must be counted as the chief day of the feast. And I like to think of the present possibilities of Unitarianism and of its signs of new life. I can hardly look about me but to be convinced that we are still young in our spirit, and that our opportunities lie still around us. One Monday morning recently I took up a Boston paper, and I was struck at once by the picture which adorned the first page. It was an impressionist picture, done in the best style of newspaper art. [Laughter.] Under the branches of an umbrageous tree a crowd of citizens had gathered. One tall figure, with supplicating aspect, stood under a most suggestive bending bough. I have lived long enough in the West, and have been familiar enough with the free manners of a new civilization, to feel that I needed no key to that picture. I saw that this Vigilance Committee was evidently composed of the best citizens, and I hoped that the tall man under the tree at least "died game." [Laughter.] What was my surprise, on looking more closely at the headlines, to find that I had been completely mistaken, and that the picture represented Dr. Edward Everett Hale preaching on Boston Common. [Laughter.] I was perfectly sure that it was not a misprint which I read later on, that he was standing under a popular tree: I cannot conceive of any tree under which Dr. Hale chooses to preach being of any other kind. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, I have a very good reason for speaking thus in regard to these services. I was asked to preach under the tree some weeks ago, and was afraid to do it; but I have a most altruistic admiration for this new departure. It seems to me very significant that to-day Unitarianism is getting itself preached under popular trees. [Applause.] Indeed, it seems to me that one of the best things that might happen to Unitarianism hereabouts would be to be driven out of our sanctuaries occasionally, and have ministers and congregations turned out to grass. [Laughter.] You know the Free Church of Scotland, under the heroic leadership of Dr. Chalmers, had its first great successes in that way,—the glorious day when four hundred and seventy ministers of the Church of Scotland left their manse and their churches, and went out to preach the gospel on the hillside. Some of the limitations of our preaching and of our work may not be the fault of the ministers, who seem to be such admirable persons, nor the fault of the congregations, who seem admirable enough when they are not in congregations assembled, but in the meeting-houses. We are cabined, cribbed, confined, by the proprieties of the place. Perhaps, though I do not like to suggest it, one of the unfortunate things in our history was that famous Dedham decision that gave the old meeting-house into the hands of the Unitarians. I like the idea of getting rid of the merely conventional limitations. Why, just think how many of our problems would be solved if we all went out under the tree! Our free gospel is how often made of none effect by the traditions of the architects, the sextons, and the pew-holders! There are a great many architects who seem never to have read that Scripture saying that "faith cometh by hearing." [Laughter.] They seem to think that, somehow, hearing cometh by an act of faith. [Laughter.] And then, as to the sextons and the ushers of the churches, and those to whom have been given the right of regulating the ventilation,—how many good sermons are continually being spoiled by poor air! One of the greatest of our Unitarian ministers, Joseph Priestley, gained undying fame by discovering oxygen. That is more than most ministers are able to discover in their own churches. [Laughter.]

And, in this matter of the hospitality of the church, there is a conspiracy between the ushers and the pew-holders, who look upon the stranger as an intruder. I have sometimes gone into a church, and been so chilled by my first reception that no amount of preaching could bring up the temperature of my soul. No matter how eloquently the preacher discoursed on the brotherhood of man, I said, looking back to the usher who had greeted me with a freezing smile, "All this availeth me nothing, so long as this Mordecai standeth at the gate." [Laughter.] I cannot, therefore, fully sympathize, on all occasions, with the psalmist who said that he had rather be a door-keeper in the house of the Lord than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. [Laughter.] As I remember some of the door-keepers who admit me in the gate of the house of the Lord, and I think of the possibility of being like them, I had rather take my chances in the tents of wickedness. [Laughter.] As to the pew-holders who are not hospitable, I do not suppose there are any here; and I doubt if even preaching on the Common would particularly change them. I think they are past praying for. I believe that these people, if they did come to the Common, would bring with them little notices, "Keep off the grass!" [Laughter.]

So much for our work in its new possibilities. I want to say just a word in regard to the definite missionary work to which this Association is called. One of the most magnificent developments of our modern time is the development of a broad, inclusive charity. I feel that we have learned this lesson, are learning it well. We no longer feel that we are the people: we feel that we belong to a great army, we recognize the things which we hold in common with others; and all this has beautiful expression more and more, and must go on. But we also, at a time like this, must emphasize the fact that there are vast multitudes here in America who have already taken themselves out of the old influences. They are not in the old churches, they cannot believe in the old creeds, they have broken with the old conventions. And, when we go to a new place anywhere, I believe, on this continent, we are not weakening religious institutions: we are bringing help and strength to those who, without us, or without some word of rational religion, would be without religious institutions altogether. While we welcome the work that others are doing, we must clearly recognize the work which we have to do,—the work for those who have broken with the past and are waiting for new light to guide them in the future.

Since I came to Cambridge, I have not found that I had the time to investigate the libraries, which I have no doubt are excellent, in that town. Like most suburban ministers, a great deal of my time is spent in the cars of the West End Electric Railway. [Laughter.] But I have made very good use of my advantages there in the way of reading the literature which is furnished the patrons of the line. I have liked to see how men seeking trade are wiser in their generation than the children of light, how they give us line upon line and precept upon precept, till the dullest intelligence is convinced and convicted. I like particularly the good, strong way in which that Shaksperian manufacturer in Pittsburg brings to your eyes the advantage of the best lamp-chimney. His argument seems to be absolutely convincing. I wish our gospel could be preached as clearly, as continuously, as his. This child of light says this: "Do your lamp-chimneys break? You have not the right kind." [Laughter.] Now, that is what our missionaries are doing through the country. They have no quarrel with the light of other denominations: the children of the light are one. But they have criticisms in regard to the lamp-chimneys which are smoking, which are breaking. And so we come to men who say that their creeds have broken, their rituals have broken, the intellectual forms in which their light has been shining have broken; and we say, most modestly, but most persistently, "You have not the right kind." [Applause.] And I believe, when we wake to the meaning of the freer statement and expression of religious life, we will be able more and more to bring to the men who need it to-day the right kind of expression of that religion which already exists in large measure in the hearts of the American people. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF REV. MERLE ST. CROIX WRIGHT.

In the Saratoga Conference we professed our belief and conviction in "the religion of Jesus," which, we said, consists in love to God and in love to man. I most heartily believe in Jesus, and in this great current of life that has come from him and comes to us. But we ought to draw a distinction between that religion of which Jesus was the object, as has been said, and that religion of which Jesus was the subject, between the religion which professes Jesus and that religion which Jesus professed, between the principle of Christianity and the person of Jesus. We should understand the person, in all our reverence, to be but an illustration of the principle, and the principle to be the ideal significance of the person. It seems to me, if we keep these things clear, and yet always keep them together, we have the two sides of religion.

For there are many on the borders of the land, many so-called "unchurched," many who have not known what it is to worship, who yet have in them the spirit, though it sleepeth, of sonship to the Most High. And our mission should go out to them also; and it must go through truth, and not through sentiment. It cannot go through the old phrases: it must be translated into modern terms. It is said to-day that the problem is no longer to save men, but to save God. Men are asking: "Is morality essential, or is it merely phenomenal? Are right and wrong merely words for our likes and dislikes, or do they lie at the very root of things?" There is danger that we sit complacently with our ears deaf to that call from without.

Yet, while I consider truth the first thing, it is not the last. Truth is the great path-finder, but we are not in this universe merely to know. Not truth, but goodness, is the ultimate; that is, the assimilation of truth into life, lifting life up to the vision of the ideal. Let us emphasize truth with our might; but let us always keep with it what Jesus so insisted on,—the emphasis upon goodness, upon manly and womanly life.

It is not for our church to consider whether it will be a broad church or a high church: the great question is whether it shall be a dead church or a live church. Let us make it a live church! [Applause.] Let the fires of our affection and our aspiration flame through it; but let it be understood that fires of emotion can only be fed by truth,—truth won by severest sacrifice, truth gained by strenuous toil. And thus shall arise the new Christianity,—the Church that is to come, the Church of Jesus, to which he gave all the strength of his life. Then the light shall dawn upon us, then the horizon shall widen until all parties and divisions shall pass away, and, as children together, we stand in the presence of the one reality which we all strive to profess and to express in our separate ways. Then we shall find that the great Father has his lodgment in every heart, and, though men may worship him in different ways, that we are, after all, of one household. [Applause.]

The last speaker of the evening was Rev. Albert Lazenby of Glasgow, Scotland, who was already familiar to those who had heard his admirable address on Tuesday afternoon (given on another page). He was warmly greeted and heartily applauded. Mr. Lazenby brought greetings from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which met with quick response.

The Festival closed with a hymn and the benediction.

Tuesday Afternoon Meeting.

ADDRESS OF HON. GEORGE S. HALE.

It is now eight years since you did me the honor to invite me to the office I now resign. It may not be out of place to compare the condition of the denomination at that time and this, although its power and influence and the work it has accomplished are not measured by statistics. The goal is always in advance, and it is well to note who still carry the flag and keep step to the music of advancing reform. Your body of life members then counted 1,564 persons: in 1895 it is 2,114 persons. The societies entitled to send delegates to our meetings were 189: to-day they are 269. The number of ministers recorded was 454: it is now 511. We had then 361 societies, and now 451. The annual receipts, including those for the Church Building Loan Fund, in 1886-87 were $220,829.45, or, deducting loans, etc., not treated as new receipts, about $110,000. The annual receipts in 1894-95 are $267,112.66, or, deducting about $100,000, say $167,000. The Church Building Loan Fund, organized two years before (in 1885), had then a fund of $46,741.99. That fund is now $113,795.42. Besides the National Conference, there were then 58 subordinate Unitarian conferences, societies, or associations, now 81. Then, as now, there were two schools at Cambridge and Meadville, to which we may add three schools or academies. The pupils in the first named were then 20, now 50. Its fund, including Building Fund, $29,131.51, for the library then was $401,391.60, now $434,781.38. At Meadville the number of pupils were then 31, now 40. Funds then, $212,274, now $417,096. The periodicals were 6, now 10. Included in the above was then one Unitarian Club, of which there are now 12.

Among the new agencies of greatest importance I may note the Women's Auxiliary Conference, organized in 1880 with one associate, the Women's Western Unitarian Conference, organized in 1882, now represented by the National Alliance of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women; and five other organizations, with members whose work has been most faithful, valuable, and effective.

In 1886 the noble building on which our activities are now largely centred was dedicated to its wide-spread uses, and has since been the temple to which our people gathered from the whole country. Every year has added to the list of noble men and women who have left to us their names, their influence and example. It would be sad, though profitable, to recall these names and their services. Of those who formed this board in 1887, three have passed away to whom especial tributes of honor and appreciation are due from us,—George William Curtis, the president of the Conference and the vice-president of the Association, whose name is sufficient eulogy; Rev. Grindall Reynolds, whose praise is fresh from our lips; Daniel S. Richardson, a faithful, useful, and efficient servant of the cause we honor.

Then our missionary agencies were not organized as they now are, by five distinct, separate districts,—New England, the Middle, Southern, Western, and Pacific.

These are the dry bones, but it devolves on you to put and keep life in them. The work of the Association and its various agencies is not known, understood, or appreciated by its constituents. This work cannot live by hands alone: it must have bread. Our contributions are not in proportion to our work and our means, but meagre and insufficient. If we do not show ourselves men, this work must come to naught. When I consider the success in the world of activity and business which our denomination represents, it is not wholly creditable to us that this success is not more generously applied to support the moral, religious, and intellectual needs and advancement of the faith which so many saints have delivered to us.

God helps those who help themselves is as true in the work of the Church as in that of the world,—perhaps more true. He giveth the increase; but we must select the ground, and sow the seed, and watch its growth. No board of directors, no officials or superintendents, can work successfully without the encouragement and stimulus of your personal interest, your enthusiasm, your suggestive criticism. Money is needed, but not money alone. The word of watchful sympathy which shows that faithful work is not unobserved and not unappreciated has a value not measured by silver or gold. To turn for a moment to a more practical attempt to awaken and promote such contributions, it seems to me that it would be wise to communicate to all our congregations more frequent and fuller information of the work and needs of your Association and of its various agencies, that your officers should from time to time send out to all our churches, to be read from their pulpits, I will not say an "encyclical" letter, but some simple story of the opportunities and the demands which present themselves, of the resources we have to meet them, and should tell them frankly where the soil invites the seed, where it has fallen by the wayside, been smothered by hostile growth, or has withered away. If such a story, by an earnest worker, full of zeal and hope, like that of Reynolds, or even with the appeal of doubt and anxiety, can be told to our churches, I cannot doubt its good effect.

You have to-day at your service a band of faithful workers. We mourn the dead and lost: we welcome the living whom we have found, who come with fresh zeal and energy, with the lessons of experience. It will be our fault rather than theirs if this zeal and energy and experience do not bear their ripened and abundant fruit.

LIBERAL FAITH AND DEMOCRACY.

BY REV. ANNA GARLIN SPENCER.

Friends of the Liberal Faith.—When I was asked to speak this afternoon upon the topic, "How to commend the Liberal Form of Religion to a Thinking Democracy," I asked leave to turn the topic about, and phrase it thus, "What can the Liberal Church do toward Developing a Thinking and an Ethical Democracy?" I take it, if the thinking and the ethical democracy had arrived, there would be no longer a problem how to commend the liberal faith to it. For we at least believe that the heart of the movement toward the perfect realization of human brotherhood in social organization is in our own liberal faith; that we, above all other religious believers, have found ourselves—not of our own purpose, but according to the election of the divine guidance which we revere—sensitive to the new currents of thought and life.

What, then, do we mean by democracy? We have lost the eighteenth-century faith in it as a sort of magic to conjure with; but two things, at least, we may claim for it. First, democracy enables us to take a more accurate and more oft-recurring mental and moral diagnosis of a people than any other form. And, secondly, democracy liberates hitherto imprisoned human force. The ideal democracy must be precisely the ideal aristocracy, the rule of the best. But we are no longer limited to a certain class or condition: we have a chance for an incursion of fresh life from below, as race after race and class after class are brought under more and more elevating conditions.

These are the advantages of democracy, solid and substantial. What is the chief danger of democracy? Not the superficial ones about which we hear so much. The chief danger of democracy is that, in escaping the rule of certain classes and certain prescribed standards, we come under the despotism of the majority,—that we lose that power of leadership which comes from superiority. Our danger to-day in education is that we measure so accurately the need of the average child that we do injustice to the finer development of those children born to be leaders. The danger is that we commercialize and vulgarize our art and literature to suit the common and undeveloped taste. The danger is that, in our great and virtuous desire to make equality of rights translate itself in all directions, we forget that still, as of old, we must look toward something higher than ourselves, and have some ideal beyond our present achievement, to "Wait ever to invite us while we climb."

Now, what is it that can come into our political life, our social life,—into our whole democratic constitution and order,—to qualify that chiefest danger of our time? Nothing but some power capable of idealizing, of introducing anew into this order the old enthusiasm, but in a broader and deeper current. And here, I believe, lies pre-eminently the worth and use of our liberal faith. Here it is that we stand with our faces set toward the morning, glad of the new bottles into which to pour the new wine, glad that we live in a time when it is possible and proper to change, knowing that "he who sails with God is safe indeed." We ought to have a deeper trust, a higher and warmer worship, a stronger faith in our kind, than any other religious communion. And, if we have these, then these, of all forces, make for the very thing we are after,—the development of a truer and nobler leadership in every direction.

How, then, shall we manifest this if it is indeed our calling? In the first place, the pulpit of the liberal church should take for its guide the rule that it should "Nothing human alien feel,

Nor disesteem man's meanest claim."

It should make itself absolutely free from any traditional timidity about the topics upon which it should speak. I believe that the time has come when religion is—not is to be—translatable into every human relationship. I believe the time has come when the great world outside the church—but not, thank Heaven, outside God's influence—says, in the language of the street, but truly and with not an irreverent heart, "The church that has nothing to do with human interests we have no use for." Why is it that in labor meetings and others you shall hear the Christian Church hissed when its name is mentioned, but the name of Jesus applauded? It is because the preaching of the Christian Church is not as practical and ethical, is not so close to human relationships, as was the preaching of Jesus. It is because we have accepted a false standard of sacredness. The pulpit of the liberal church is especially called upon at this very hour to touch upon every human interest that is surging in the hearts of the people. But how? Its second rule must be to hold the pulpit above everything partisan, special, and exclusive; to treat every question as it arises from religion's own standpoint, which must combine two things,—the exceeding necessity of personal character as the absolute essential in carrying every method of reform to a successful issue and an absolutely unbounded love of all humankind.

Again, if the church, from its pulpit, shall hold itself so close to the heart of humanity that, whatever is in the thoughts of man upon the street, whatever is in the trembling heart of woman, as she looks with dread upon some movement which she does not understand, shall be held as its own to touch and transform with its own spirit, then how shall it do in its practical activity? We hear a great deal about "institutional churches." I am afraid of the word, lest it become a mechanical element in church life, which attempts to do all things that are being done by other agencies. If a church of the living God finds itself in a locality deficient in any form of human helpfulness, and it is better fitted than any other agency there in existence to show, by type and suggestion, a better ideal, that is its place to do, whether it is giving free baths or physical culture classes, building a gymnasium, opening a kindergarten or an evening school. But the instant that the church finds that it has generated enthusiasm along these lines, and that there is a chance to create a civic movement which will embrace these agencies of helpfulness, that instant let it take its hand off: let it not stand in the way of the larger movement. In short, I believe that the activities of a church along these lines which may become specialized and civic should be like the winged motion of a bird,—to touch, to show the way, and then be off to "fresh woods and pastures new." I want to say one word more. I believe the liberal church, both inside and outside the Unitarian denomination,—all whose faces are toward the forward march, —is now on its way toward organization as never before. Let us remember that danger of organization, that we shall lose a little of our ideal in order to increase our numbers. Let us remember that, if we are the pioneers, we must tent in the open, and not stay too long to build enduring mansions. Let us not be like that solitary prophet who is so far ahead that the road cannot be seen by those behind him; and, on the other hand, let us be quite sure that our steps are made in the spirit of a true understanding of our own work and use, and not according to some ideal of some other religious denomination. If there is any use at all in the Unitarian denomination, it lies in this: that we, more than others, or with a different emphasis, hold to a higher ideal of religion. I would rather use the word "radical" than "liberal": we have no monopoly of the liberal spirit. Our brother Christians and our sister churches of other names are at work with us, shoulder to shoulder, hand in hand. But, if we have any mission, it is to be clearer in our religious thought, to be more fundamental in the making-up of our ethical standards; to be more spiritual, less ecclesiastical, in the expression of our religious sentiment. And for this office we have no right to barter any of our heritage, even for a wider constituency.

SPEAKING WITH AUTHORITY.

BY REV. IDA C. HULTIN.

When I was asked to speak along the line of the personal equation in spiritual influence and growth and life, I thought of that sentence, "And he spoke as one having authority, and not as the scribes." And I thought over again, as I have often thought before, that that power of authority came because he spoke of things that he had seen and felt and known, not of what he had read in the records that had come to him, but of that which he had lived out of his own life. And so, if I am to speak of the personal equation in the ministry of the Unitarian Church, and how they shall try to help other souls to understand the broadness and the spiritual insight of that which is to them the best of religion, I must say that they will speak with authority who speak of that which they have felt and known and seen. They may take science, they may take philosophy with its questions and answers, they may take the records of the past and of the schools, of those who have gone before them; but, unless they transform them in their own lives, and speak from the depths of their own consciousness, they cannot speak with authority.

When in the spring the lilies began to grow, there was something within them that knew how to call out to the infinite spaces; and those atoms came trooping to take their place in leaf and bud and blossom. We do not understand the mystery yet; but we do know that it brings its messages from the infinite Source of life, and that not only is this universe full of order and purpose, but of a moral purpose,—the lily never tries to tell the story of the rose, or to give the message of the oak. Each one after his kind tells his own story, each taking from the centre and the source, and moulding it into the message which the Eternal has given him to speak. It seems to me that for each of us it is not needed that we shall tell the story of the prophet, that we shall speak the message of the old Bible; but we are to take them and use them, that they shall bring us nearer in contact with the souls that have lived before, and then gather from the secret centre and heart of the universe the food that shall make us grow, and speak our message for our kind. It may not be the message that another speaks,—it may not be so grand, so beautiful, so transcendent; but it shall be our message, our word of God, and, be it ever so gracious and great, if it is not ours, we are not speaking with authority. Books are good teachers, philosophies are good teachers, to acquaint us with ourselves and with our relationship with one another and the universe. But, if we use them as our message for humanity, then they can do us no good. The last new book we read,—shall that be our message to some starving soul? Or shall we not take the message which it had for us, and transform it; and, if it had no message for us, shall we dare to repeat it to them?

It is not enough, friends, for us liberal people to prove that there is one God. What we want to do is to prove that we have been in vital relationship with God,—to prove, as the lily tells the story of the almighty life which it has felt, that we have felt that life beating in us. Some of us have gotten our philosophy and poetry first-hand from life, from experience, from the woods and the flowers and the weeds and farmer-folk. We wanted the philosophy of the schools, but we find that it only confirms the philosophy and poetry that we have learned in the commonplaces of the every-day. And they who learn it in the schools and do not confirm it in their own lives have it for naught. It must come to them with a power to touch their souls, and fuse them into an alliance with the eternal meaning, else there is no authority.

You may have read of mountains, and looked the guide-book over, and dreamed of what might be on the mountain summits, and read stories of the vision from some peak; but, until you went and stood on that mountain summit for yourself and felt the glory and saw the vision,—not until then did you know it in its fulness nor speak with authority of what it might mean to you. And so, until we climb the mountain-tops of our experience, until we go into the Gethsemanes where we must feel ourselves alone, we cannot speak from experience.

You remember him who said, "I and the Father are one." Ah! friends, when out of life's experience we feel our at-one-ment with the infinite Spirit of the universe, and are able to spend and be spent for it, then we, too, can say those words, and with no irreverence. Then we can speak with authority, not of the God of the philosophies and theologies, but of the God who has spoken unto our souls, and has asked us to come up higher into the atmosphere of his own blessed influence. Sympathy means pain; and we need not think that we can speak with authority of fellowship unless we ourselves are willing to have our hearts wrung as our brothers' hearts bleed. If we shirk this, we shall never speak with authority those things which comfort hearts. There is a story in the Norseland that one day the dwarfs were mixing honey for the gods to drink, and they felt that something was lacking. Then there came toward them one who was part man, but also part god; and, slaying him, they took his blood and mixed it with the honey, and then it was fit for the gods to drink. Like them, until we mix our honey with our own heart's blood, until we put into it the experience of our own lives, until we merge it into the feeling that it is ours and not another's, that the infinite and eternal Source of Life speaks and is through us,—not until then can we speak with authority that shall make men to know that we believe in God because we have seen him.

OUR LITERARY LEADERS.

BY REV. EDWARD E. HALE, D.D.

I was touched by Dr. Martineau's reference in his letter to the early tracts of the Association. In those good old days of the beginning, when the expenses of the Association were a thousandth part of what they are now, the tracts looked very much as they still do; and they put them around in the pews of the churches, as I wish they did now. Children always like to do what they are not expected to do; and so, though there was first-rate preaching in the pulpit, we liked to sit and read "Saint Peter a Unitarian," or something of Mrs. Barbauld's. I have been looking over to-day those four or five first volumes of tracts; and in the few minutes you give me I would like to speak of the foundation that was then laid, and of the way in which the foundation has been built, as this Unitarian Church of ours has outgrown its cradle and swaddling-bands, and has dared to call itself, not the Unitarian Church of Boston nor of Eastern Massachusetts, but of the world.

There are plenty of people, as those years went by, who have been disposed to be a little satirical because the progress was so slow; but it is easy to see that the foundations were well laid. We began—the tracts all begin—with the simple determination to compel people to read the Gospels, and to find out what is in them. Now, the four Gospels are pitilessly unecclesiastical, pitilessly Unitarian. They do not give the slightest foothold for any of the five points of Calvinism. So that there is almost an element of humor in the way in which these early tracts say: "You mean to build your religion on the Bible? Go to. Then show us where is the Trinity in the Gospel of Matthew, show us where is the fall of man in the Gospel of John, show us where is the vicarious atonement in the Gospel of Mark." Year in, year out, they flung that defiance in the face of their antagonist. The antagonists did what was wise: they declined controversy. Year after year they declined controversy, and now we have got round to that far better stage when they accept our doctrine and fit their words to match it.

But you see what this involves. If we are to sit in judgment on two manuscripts, there must be an arbiter behind the letter. It is the child of God. And out of this painful discussion of the letter, which was so distasteful to many a young man, there grew up, by an absolute necessity, the consciousness that the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, and the high idealism of the Unitarian Church asserted itself; and from being the church of the interpretation of the letter it became what it is now, the church of the Holy Spirit.

In the course of that progress those of us who can recollect fifty years have seen a great many coquetries between the Unitarian organization here and other organizations. There was another body which relied upon the written word, the great Christian body of the West, allied with the Campbellites and the Disciples of the West. When our people found that there was anything the other side of the Hudson River,—which very few Boston people know to this day,—they discovered these three denominations; and we attempted this and that conjunction with them. All that failed, and is forgotten by everybody except Mr. Batchelor and me. On the other hand, nobody approached the Hicksite Quakers, the people who believe in the present God as we believe; but without any negotiations we were one, and are one to this day. Then here in Boston—among friends we may say it—we were gentlefolk. Our people were aristocratic, and used excellent good English. We published our works on nice paper, and published them a little behind the time. And there were those nice English people who brought their service-book over here. Couldn't we have a service-book a little like theirs, and couldn't we be as respectable as they were? We tried. We have tried it a great many times; and it never has worked, because we are democrats of the democrats, children of the Puritan. But, on the other hand, here is this magnificent Methodist communion, which sings so gloriously, "We know salvation's free." They were Arminians as we were Arminians. They were born to believe that every man can seek his God, and so were we. And so our relations with them have always been genuine and real, for our gospel is really their gospel.

And so I come back to my text: we have gained just in proportion as we have been willing to accept the prophecies of all the other prophets, no matter what their name. I spoke of the early tracts. There is another collection, now very rare, which Mr. Sparks made in Baltimore, for the purpose of showing—let us be frank—that pretty much everybody who has ever been good for anything in modern English literature or science has been on our side, has been a heretic,—dear old Isaac Watts, who came out all right at last, believing in universal salvation; John Milton, who wrote things so heretical that nobody dared print them in England till within the lifetime of every person who is before me; Jonathan Edwards, whose latest writings were so heretical that Andover has never dared to print them to this hour; John Locke, whom everybody then thought the first of philosophers, and who turned out to be an old-line Unitarian. All of them, it seemed, for two or three hundred years before our denomination had any name, had been saying the things that we were saying. Just in proportion as we have listened to every voice of God which God has spoken to any of his children, in that proportion have we become the Church of the living God, and our oracles have been received everywhere. I believe that James Martineau's words are read in every theological school in the United States, even those of the Church of Rome. I know that this is true of those of the Protestant Episcopal Church. I believe that they are read with an enthusiasm not surpassed by the enthusiasm with which they are read at Meadville and at Cambridge. And that, let me say, is the work we have to do,—to be so sure that our word is prompt and true and clear that all men may know what pure and undefiled religion is. And with that word I will close. We have just been celebrating the birthday of Emerson. You know what Stanley said of the religious services which he attended in America, "Wherever I went, the preacher was always Ralph Waldo Emerson." That is perfectly true. It is true in places where nobody ever heard his name, where the preacher did not know whose was the inspiration which was upon him. Ralph Waldo Emerson had spoken the word which had opened out life to those who had trained the men who stood in the different pulpits. His influence has gone everywhere,—the sense of the real presence of God that is religion. And, when you find the young artist, who has even lost the Testament his mother gave him, sitting before he goes to bed and reading his Emerson; when you call on your dying friend, and she smiles upon you and lays aside her well-handled Emerson; when you read the leading article in the newspaper, and before you are half-way down catch the echo from some utterance of Emerson,—then you do not need to ask who is the religious leader of English-speaking people to-day.

Tuesday Evening Addresses.

THE CHANGES THAT HAVE COME.

BY REV. ALBERT LAZENBY, OF GLASGOW, SCOTLAND.

I did not need, Mr. President, the hearty welcome you have just given me to assure me of the good feeling of this Association. I have been now for several weeks in this country, and from the moment I landed down to the very present you have made me feel that I was among friends. Whether it is the kinship of race—and we English delight to feel that you Americans are one with us in blood—or whether it is the communion of faith—and notwithstanding the absence of bonds, nay, because of the absence of bonds,—I have been made welcome to all you had to give. I cannot express the pleasure and inspiration this visit has been to me.

But I have to thank you on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. My instructions were to express to you their kindest greeting and heartiest good wishes,—and that I have much pleasure in doing. It is the greeting of fellow-workers in the task of liberalizing and humanizing the religious thought of the world. It is a pity the work should need to be done in this nineteenth century,—but so it does; and I think I may venture to say that our churches, our Associations,—you in the New World, and we in the Old,—have done something to humanize men's thoughts of God and men's feelings toward each other. Look down through the threescore years and ten that our Associations have been in existence, and has not the world changed? Have not men's thoughts widened as with the process of the suns? Have not the churches become more tolerant, more liberal, more rational? And in that work have we not had our share? Is it sectarian narrowness or pharisaic conceit to ask: Would the churches have been as liberal to-day, had it not been for your Channing and Parker and Emerson, and our Martineau? How much the world owes to those great teachers it is, perhaps, impossible to say. Dr. Martineau has told us, with that childlike humility of his, how much he was indebted to your New England teachers for inspiration and guidance; and I venture to think that there are thousands outside the ranks of our church who could make the same confession,—tens of thousands more who have felt the touch, but have not seen the hand. And what Martineau has received he has given back a hundred-fold. He has become himself the source of inspiration to thousands seeking the eternal light; and the honor the world has recently rendered him measures but a fraction of his influence. The church may well be proud that has among its prophets a man so clear in vision, so pure in heart, so childlike in spirit, so saintly in soul. He has lived a charmed life. The world has failed to touch him, and even time seems helpless to impair the vigor of that noble mind.

But sometimes a church's influence is best seen by the amount of opposition it calls out. In this country, or, at least, in this part of it, where Unitarianism is so prosperous, you do not know that you are born. But in our country, where we are used to more abuse than kindness, we have a pretty lively sense that we have not only been born, but are actually living. It seems as if our friends liked to take that method of showing they were afraid of us. A case in point happened recently in London. One of the best bits of work the British and Foreign Association has done this last year or two has been the support it gave to the stand made against the priestly party on the London School Board. The sacerdotalists had been alarmed at the spread of what they called Unitarianism in the teaching given by the School Board, and they foisted a syllabus of religious instruction upon the teachers. The teachers were required to teach the doctrine of the creeds,—the holy doctrine of the Trinity, the immaculate birth, the redemption from sin, etc. It is to the honor of the Unitarians that they were the first to see the bearing of this syllabus. Mr. Bowie, the secretary of the British and Foreign Association, who is a member of the School Board, was the first to point out that this was an attempt to capture a national system of education in the interests of a sect,—and that the narrowest sect, the sacerdotalists. For a time he was the voice of one crying in the wilderness. Still he kept crying. The Association backed up the cry, and at last the Congregationalists and Baptists and Methodists and—to their honor—the Broad Churchmen awakened to the importance of the matter. They banded together to resist the invasion. And, when the election was over, the majority of the priestly party was reduced from fifteen to three; and in the place of one or two Unitarians on the Board we now have five. But how finely were we abused! I wonder your ears did not burn in America. Ours did in Scotland. Mr. Bowie was likened to Caiaphas and Judas and Ananias and the scarlet woman, and all those other beautiful characters of the New Testament. Bills were put out, telling the parents to "vote for Bowie and send their children to hell." Even Dr. Herford, who did valiant service in the fight, came in for his share of the good things. Some church visitor called on an old lady to solicit her vote for the Church candidate. "No, indeed!" said the faithful soul. "I shall vote for the Progressionist." "What church do you go to?" asked the visitor. "Dr. Herford's," was the reply. "Oh, really! How sad! Don't you know that, if you go to that church, you will go to hell?"

Fancy Dr. Herford—with that sweet, genial, winning smile of his—being an emissary of the devil, set there to lure folk to hell, and that in cultured, refined, intellectual London! Here you gave him his good things. There, I fear, he is coming in for his evil things.

But, fortunately, London is not Britain. It is not even Scotland. You must not think that all England and Scotland are as far behind as London. In Scotland we look on England in general, and London in particular as a long way behind us in intelligence and civilization. I can assure you God has given the Scot a good conceit of himself; and the next best thing to being born an American would be to be born a Scotchman,—if we had the choice. At any rate, Scotland is proving itself a

Deaths.

30th ult., Charles Bowers, formerly Captain of Company G, 32d Regiment, M. V. M., aged 83 yrs. 1 m.

9th ult., Mrs. Alfred Brookes, aged 82.

Mrs. Brookes's sudden death was a shock and a grief to multitudes of friends. She was not only one of the few who had lived the greater part of this century, but she was a woman whose rare personal character endeared her with unusual strength of affection to all who knew her. She was born in Burlington, Vt., in March, 1813, and was the daughter of Unitarian parents, in whose day and generation to be a Unitarian meant to possess, in no small degree, intellectual independence and a force of religious convictions, strong to endure the adverse criticism and prejudices of the more orthodox faiths.

Her husband was the son of Joshua Brookes, whose interest in the establishment of our Theological School at Meadville is remembered by all connected with it. Her grandfather, Col. Chipman, was the founder of Middlebury, Vt., and served with Ethan Allen when he took Ticonderoga. Mrs. Brookes inherited the New England energy which characterized those early days. Several times when placed in circumstances of peril, and those about her were intimidated by the danger which seemed imminent, she would say: "Don't worry, unnecessarily perhaps. I don't intend to die but once." And this brave and blessed soul, as far as human consciousness goes, did not "suffer death" even the once, she was so gently and so quickly taken. Mrs. Brookes's peculiar characteristic was her boundless sympathy, the natural outcome of her large-heartedness, and her absolute unselfishness of nature. In all her long life, her children cannot recall one selfish or impatient or unkind word or deed. Her thoughtfulness for others' pleasure and of others' feelings made her universally beloved by all who knew her; and her kindly interest in all that went to make the joy or the sorrow in others' lives was so sincerely and so generously given that she was the friend, the confidante, and the helper of old and young, rich and poor alike. During her active life, the record of which is simply, "She went about doing good," her experience was often that of most of us in New York, where cases of deception and ingratitude constitute a part of it; but her faith in human nature was not in the slightest impaired, nor were her efforts ever lessened in consequence. None were "unworthy" in her eyes, and she gave her time and strength to every call of need with that readiness and cheerfulness of spirit that made her service a joy to herself and to others. During the Civil War she served daily for months at the New England Rooms in New York; and, when there was an urgent call for havelocks for Duryea's Zouaves, just starting South as the warm weather approached, she rallied friends, sewing-machines, and material at her own home in the city, and in one day made, finished, and despatched havelocks for the entire regiment. But her deeds were chiefly of that quality of love and mercy, daily, hourly dispensed, which "dropped like the gentle rain from heaven." She was as immovable as a rock in all matters of principle and duty wherever loyalty and courage were demanded, but most tender, most gentle, in all that concerned others, filled with Christian charity for every one, judging all at his or her best, thinking no evil of any.

She and her husband were among Henry Ware's congregation in New York, after Dr. Dewey's and Dr. Bellows's, later of Dr. Osgood's, of L. G. Ware's in Burlington, and she lastly of Rev. Robert Collyer's. In the Employment Society for Poor Women connected with All Souls' Church she gave her services for forty-five years.

Hers was a life of unpretentious goodness, and she would disclaim all praise; but it was a life too full as an example of righteousness not to have a last loving tribute, which is far from adequate, laid on its grave,—a life whose influence and memory will be lasting to all who had the privilege of knowing her. At her funeral at the Church of the Messiah, Sunday, May 12, Mr. Collyer quoted these lines, beautifully appropriate to the spirit which was hers:—

"Life! we've been long together
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather.
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear:
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear.
Then steal away, give little warning,
Say not 'Good night,' but in some brighter clime Bid me 'Good morning!'"

rich field for the liberal thought. The heaven is working, and working so rapidly that one can scarce keep pace with its advance. I am not a prophet, sir, nor the son of a prophet; but I venture to say that Scotland is going to shape the religious thought of the immediate future; if all her children had only the spirit and courage of their ancestors, the Covenanters, they might lead the new reformation. What country,—and I mention these as showing the trend of thought,—what country has produced so many books during the last decade, each of which would be an epoch-making book if it stood by itself? Read the Gifford lectures of Max Müller and Pfeiderer and Caird and Wallace, and see how the liberal thought for which we have stood is seating itself in the chairs of learning. Nay, enter the very doors of the churches themselves, and read Prof. Bruce on “The Kingdom of God,” and Mackintosh on “The Natural History of Christianity,” and Prof. Drummond on “The Ascent of Man,” and you may well ask, Are these Presbyterian teachers? And, by the way, I don’t know what you did to Prof. Drummond when he was over here. Whether it was your genial hospitality or the invigorating effects of your New England atmosphere, I don’t know; but you managed to win his secret from him, and to induce him to deliver his soul as he has never delivered it before. And thereby hangs a tale. You have got him into nice trouble. Before I left home, several Presbyterians had transmitted overtures to the Assembly, asking its judgment on Prof. Drummond’s book. In their opinion it is subversive of the faith. The Assembly, I expect, will consider the matter this week; and, if it only considers it as it ought to consider it, we are likely to have one of the jolliest heresy hunts we have had in recent times. My blood is tingling for the fight.

But it is of no use. These men have changed, but they only reflect the change that has come into men’s hearts. The pulpit is the mirror of the pew. Do not think that even the rank and file of Scotchmen are under thrall to Calvinism. They are not. Here and there you may find it in some out-of-the-way place. You may hear a man declare, as a man did declare in a Highland church last year, that “every child that is born is born with its back to Christ and its face to hell”; but you must not think that is representative. It is not. It finds no response in men’s hearts. If you want to know the faith that is coming into men’s hearts, read Ian Maclaren’s “Bonnie Brier Bush.” It is written by a Presbyterian minister, a Scotchman, and about Scotch men and women. Take the conversation of the poor sick student with his mother:—

“Div ye mind the nicht, mither, that I called for ye, and ye gave me the gospel aboot God? There had been a revival man here, and he was preaching on hell. As it grew dark, a candle was lighted; and he looked down at us laddies in the front, and asked us if we knew what like hell was. We were that terrified that none of us could speak, but I whispered, ‘No.’

“Then he rolled a piece of paper, and held it in the flame; and we saw it burn, and glow, and shrivel up, and fall in black dust.

“‘Think,’ said he,—and he leaned over the desk and spoke in a gruesome whisper which made the cold run down our backs,—‘think that yon paper was your finger,—one finger only of your hand; and it burned like that forever and ever. And think of your hand and your arm and your whole body all on fire, never to go out. That is hell, and that is where any laddie will go who does not repent and believe.’

“He blew out the candle; and we crept to the door, trembling, not able to say a word. That nicht I could not sleep, for I thought I might be in the fire before morning. I was only a wee laddie, and I did what we all do in trouble: I cried for my mither. Aye, and ye kissed me, mither; and ye said, ‘Ye’re safe with me.’ And ye telt me that God might punish me to mak me better if I was bad, but that he wud never torture ony puir soul; for that cud dae nae guid, and was the devil’s wark. Ye asked me, ‘Am I a guid mither tae ye?’ And, when I could dae naethin’ but hold, ye said, ‘Be sure God maun be a hantle kinder.’”

And so it is. Men are coming to feel that “God maun be a hantle kinder” than the church’s creeds have shown him to be. And we rejoice in this. The broadening sun has risen. The living power of truth is widening its rays, and scattering clouds and mists and darkness. The heresies of yesterday are fast becoming the orthodoxies of to-day, and we glory in it. It is a testimony to us that the doctrines we have been teaching are true. I do not claim a monopoly of these truths: they are in all religions. The truth of God reveals itself through other channels besides ours. But I do affirm that we have recognized its power when other churches have passed it by. Not because we were up earlier than our neighbors did we see the rising sun, but because we looked eastward, while they looked westward.

But,—and here may I add a word, sir?—while this grand work of liberalizing and humanizing men’s faith is progressing so rapidly, and is perhaps the supreme work before us, there is another movement going on in which I am convinced it is our duty—and shall I say our privilege?—to take a part. I refer to the great social movements of the day. In the old country—and I think, from what I have seen, in this—the foundations of society are being moved as they have never been moved before. What is our duty? Is it for us to stand aloof, and say, “It is none of my business: ‘am I my brother’s keeper?’” Shall we pass by on the other side? Are we to content ourselves simply with our churches and their services? I confess that I am sick—sick as unto death—of what Ruskin has called the dawn service and twilight revival,—the gas-lighted and gas-inspired Christianity. And I am convinced—with the strength of divine conviction—that the Church has a duty in respect to this matter.

“Ah,” you say, “but these movements are so coarse, so rough, so rude in their men and methods.” Well, whose fault is that? It is said of your Channing that for a time he stood aloof from the anti-slavery movement. When he was appealed to to throw in his lot with the Abolitionists, he excused himself on the ground that the men were so extreme and the methods so rough. “Yes,” was the reply: “that is because you and such as you stand aloof.” The great preacher felt rebuked, and from that time never ceased by word and pen to plead the cause of the slave. So now a movement no less momentous than the anti-slavery movement is going on around us, and we are standing aloof. We may not like the methods, we may not like the leaders; and, when “brutes with the rights of men set wrong to balance wrong and physic human woes,” there is sure to be some ugly work. But, then, all the more need for enlisting all the moral, all the intellectual, all the spiritual forces of the world in the work of guiding, directing, refining these powers that are shaping the future. I like that incident told by Dean Stubbs in the London Dock strike some few years ago. One of the leaders was telling his audience of the Man of Nazareth. He grew earnest and eloquent as he spoke to them of the love and sympathy and justice and unselfishness and kindness of the carpenter’s son. At last one of the crowd could restrain himself no longer, and he cried out: “That is the man for me. Three cheers for the Man of Nazareth! He is the best man of whom we have ever heard.” And immediately thousands of heads were uncovered, and thousands of voices joined in ringing cheers for the Man of Nazareth.

And that is true. Christ is the man for us. He made himself one with the toiling, struggling, seething mass of humanity around him. He may not have given us any ready-made scheme of a perfect society: he was not a politician as we understand politics; but he was a social emancipator. He did not look upon the happiness of humanity as coming from favorable conditions alone, but he did teach a religion which bore directly on this present life. He sought to infuse a new spirit into it,—a spirit of mutual concession, a spirit of frank justice between man and man, a spirit of love and self-control. And, believe me, that is the spirit that we need. The social movements of the day need—demand—this spirit. They must have the spirit of justice and helpfulness. The gospel of labor needs strong men and true men, and men good and brave, who will sacrifice themselves to help the weak and the frail, and who will consecrate the best they have to a whole-hearted endeavor to put new life into the enfeebled hearts of the men and women who are born the thrall of inherited passion, and developed vice, and national error, and social injustice, and political crime.

“God give us men! A time like this demands Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands: Men whom the lust of office does not kill, Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy, Men who possess opinions and a will, Men who have honor, men who will not lie, Men who can stand before a demagogue And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking,— Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog In public duty and in private thinking; For, while the rabble, with their thumb-worn creeds, Their large professions and their little deeds, Mingle in selfish strife, lo, Freedom weeps, Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps.”

God give us men!

THE STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM.

BY REV. WILLIAM M. BRUNDAGE.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen,—At the close of our service last Sunday evening a gentleman leaving the hall was heard to say to his companion, “This is the happiest lot of people I have seen for a long time”; and he wondered what was the explanation of it. The fact is, in a city of a hundred thousand people, that congregation was the only congregation absolutely pledged to liberty in thought, which accepted unhesitatingly, unqualifiedly, the religion of Jesus as the only basis of its fellowship. No wonder we were a happy people! Most of us had just finished the struggle, and had come out into the open.

I suppose that most of you were born free. Then, much as you appreciate your freedom, you are unable to appreciate the peculiar blessedness of coming out of struggle into freedom. We have one hundred and fourteen members in our little church in Albany. There are thirteen Unitarians born out of the number. Twenty-five of the rest, with the pastor, came from the Methodist Episcopal Church, seven of them came from the Presbyterian Church, six from the Roman Catholic Church, six from the Baptist Church, one of them is from the orthodox Congregational Church, one from the Lutheran; and I think there are other bodies represented. About fifty have never been associated with any church. [Applause.] Is there any reason why that little band of men and women should not be happy? They are free!

If you will bear with me, I want to give you a word of personal experience, that will illustrate the point I desire to make. I was born and brought up a Methodist. My father was a clergyman in that church, and I have been preaching in the church thirteen years. I entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church because I felt that it emphasized the spiritual life, made little of dogma, little of ritual. My brother ministers criticised me sometimes as a heretic; but I felt that I was in substantial agreement with my church—that word “substantial” carries a great deal these days—until, about a year ago, I began to question seriously my right as an honest man to remain any longer. Last fall it was my privilege to hear Rev. Minot Savage preach on the duty of a liberal in religion. He seemed to speak directly to me. On the next Sunday I had to ask this question of candidates for admission to my church: “Do you believe in the doctrines of Holy Scripture as contained in the articles of religion of the Methodist Episcopal Church?” And they said, very devoutly, “We do.” I suppose you have had this experience, of doing a certain thing in good conscience, without much question, until some day you look at it in a new light; and never thereafter can you do it again. It was so with that question. I said, “All these years I have been idealizing and spiritualizing away the dogmas of the Methodist Episcopal Church, until my conception is as far as the East is from the West from the conception these young people have.” But where should I go? I went to your Conference at Saratoga, and there I felt that I had found the fellowship with which I wished to connect myself. Here was a church open to all who “accept the religion of Jesus,” to all who are seeking the truth and seeking to live the ideal life. My friends, the one hundred Unitarians in Albany are in the Unitarian Church to-day because of your action at Saratoga last September, because you so generously, so unanimously adopted that basis of fellowship.

A man came up to me at the close of the second public meeting that we held,—a follower of Robert Ingersoll, whom I had known well, and who would have no association whatever with any Christian church,—and said to me, with tears in his eyes: “I can sympathize for the first time in my life with my orthodox Christian friends, for I know something of what religion may be. I never thought I could be a religious man; but the ideals presented here, the ideals of the Unitarian fellowship, are the ideals that have won me.” My friends, that is the gospel that is winning the men and women of our city to our fellowship. It is the gospel of Jesus. We understand that, in order to understand the spirit of Jesus, in order to live the life that he lived, we must share the visions of Jesus. We must share his vision of God: we must believe that the symbol “Father” does, though inadequately and imperfectly, represent something that is true concerning the infinite and eternal Energy from which all things proceed. We seek to share his vision concerning humanity, that all men are sons of God; and we are seeking to share with him the vision of the redeemed humanity that is to be, when the spirit of Jesus shall become the spirit of all God’s sons, and selfish greed shall forever pass away. It is because we are beginning to share the visions of Jesus that we are beginning to realize as never before what the religion of Jesus means.

I heard a distinguished Unitarian speak yesterday. I was dazzled by the brilliancy of his language and his thought, but there was one statement he made to which I must take exception. He said that the message of Channing and Parker, and the other founders of Unitarianism in America, has become assimilated by the other churches of America; and, therefore, the mission of Unitarianism, in the old sense, has come to an end. That may be true of Boston churches, but the gentleman who made that statement does not understand the city of Albany or the State of New York. It is true an Episcopal rector in the city of Albany said the other day: “There was no need of Mr. Brundage establishing a liberal church. We are all liberal. I think practically what he thinks.” The Episcopal Church just as liberal,—in the face of the pastoral letter of the bishops? Five years ago Dr. Brooks told me that he would not advise any young man to come in search of freedom into the Episcopal Church, and a few weeks before his death he said the same thing to a personal friend of mine. Shall we go to the Presbyterian Church for liberty, when the other day the Union Theological Seminary was boycotted by more than a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly, because the seminary persisted in teaching some of the results of the higher criticism? These great organized churches stand for much that is good; and yet they do not stand for what I understand the Unitarians at Saratoga stood for,—for liberty and the religion of Jesus, without dogma, without creed subscription.

Your message, as I understand it, is a positive message. You have a gospel for this time. Multitudes of men and women are longing for it. What will you do about it? I believe that the work of the Unitarian Church, instead of being practically ended, has only just begun. [Applause.] If you will sustain the little bands of men and women gathering together in almost every city in this land; if you will send to them a man with a burning message, a man who will not preach formal creeds, who will not preach ritual, a man who will stand aggressively and positively for this gospel of Jesus,—then indeed, in the immediate future, there will be an opportunity for fulfilling the destiny of the Unitarian Church. Channing was needed a hundred years ago: he is needed a hundred times more to-day,—the Channing spirit. Parker was needed fifty years ago: he is needed a thousand times more to-day,—the Parker spirit. The Channing and the Parker spirit, as I have understood it, are incarnated in your platform at Saratoga. [Applause.]

THE FEAR OF WORDS.

BY REV. W. W. FENN.

There are certain words in every denomination of which that denomination is afraid. One of these with us is that very word "denomination." I do not quite know why it is that we are so afraid to be called a denomination. How often we hear it said: "We are not a denomination. We are a movement." We are apt to chide our friends in other churches for using words without meaning, and it is only proper that we should ask ourselves sometimes whether we are not falling into the same pit. Precisely what do we mean by the distinction that we draw? Can there be a movement unless there is something which moves? What we need is to have more than we have now of the denominational spirit. It is not opposed to religious progress. It is one of the chief means by which religious progress can be carried forward. For in all organic life progress depends upon two things: first, the rise of variations; and, second, the selection and preservation of such as are fitted to survive. Now, in the insistence upon individual freedom, which is one of our chief characteristics, we have in our churches the possibility of the rise of religious variations. How shall they be preserved? They must be tested ultimately by the conditions of universal thought and experience. Nevertheless, it is in the Church that the chief battle-ground is to be found; and therefore is it essential that we should have a fellowship large and inclusive enough to represent as well as possible the conditions of universal thought and universal life. And the larger the fellowship, provided it keeps its freedom, the greater will be the possibilities of religious progress in that denomination and in the world.

Our Western churches are facing a set of conditions different from those which are met by the Eastern churches. We are thankful for a Unitarian fellowship large enough to include us all. Out of a fellowship so large as that there can come religious progress. We can all live together and think together and work together, and the thought of one can be balanced by the thought of the other; and out of all our individual notions there may be a selection of that which shall abide and which shall help forward the religious movement.

Because, therefore, we believe in religious progress, we ought to lay more stress than we do on denominational life. When I began work in the West, I began as a pretty strong anti-denominationalist. I should have been amazed at myself to think I should ever have said the words I have said here to-night. But the work in the West has taught me better. I see that what our little churches scattered all through the West need more than anything else is to feel that they are parts of one great organic life. Our Western fellowships are very tender and very intimate. Mr. Crothers used to say that he never came to one of our State conferences without thinking of that line in Edward Lear's "Nonsense Book,"—

"Far and few, far and few,
Are the lands where the Jumbles live."

There are only a few of our churches; and, when we come together in conference, then the minister who has been working all the year, seeing only half a dozen times another Unitarian minister, finds in that fellowship a strength and a power which he greatly needs. Our motto might be that of the scientific charity. We need "not alms, but a friend": we need to feel that we belong to a fellowship in which we believe, and which trusts us.

I wonder if you have ever heard the story of Mr. Owen of Arcadia, who came out of the orthodox Congregational Church a few years ago, and joined the Unitarian Church. He said: "I had been trying to read, but I could not tell what were the best books. Still, I read the Chicago Advance; and, whenever I found a book that was pitched into by the Chicago Advance, I went and bought it. And in that way I managed to get together a pretty good library. We made our church an independent church. But then somebody said to me that there was a man down in Madison who thought about as we did,—a man named Crooker. I went down, and had an all-day talk with him; and, when I came back, I said to my people: 'Here we thought we were a poor, lonesome little congregation, flocking all alone by ourselves up here in Wisconsin; but there are a lot of people all over the country who think just as we think. We are somebody, after all!'" That sense of fellowship with the larger denomination we need, not only for the sake of religious progress, but also for the sake of our missionary work.

But is not that sectarianism, and is not sectarianism a horrible thing? But the difference between denominationalism and sectarianism is just this: that the sectarian says that all truth has been given to him, to preach it to all people; but the Unitarian denominationalist says that, in the great order of religious progress there has been given to him a truth which belongs at a certain stage in religious evolution, and it is his duty to preach that truth with all the energy and fervor of his nature, never for one instant thinking that it is the whole truth, or dreaming that to him have been committed the oracles of God. Sectarianism we have nothing to do with, but we may be pronounced denominationalists in spite of that.

There is another word of which we are a trifle afraid, and that is the word "dogma." And I am inclined to believe that one of our needs is a little more dogma and a little more dogmatism. For the word carries two ideas: first, intellectual conviction; and, second, the desire to impress and enforce that upon other people. Now, the second part is bad, but the intellectual conviction is desirable; and, instead of that conviction,—clear, close thinking,—we are degenerating in all our liberal bodies into a sort of limp sentimentalism. In our abhorrence of creed and dogma, we are throwing away the intellectual conviction. One of the chief dangers of the religious life to-day is exactly that limp, nerveless sentimentalism.

I had a capital illustration of that the other day. A little girl was playing about the room; and her father heard her say, "That square is blue." Dr. Johnson says, "If your child says he looked out of this window when he looked out of that, flog him." It did not seem to be a case requiring such harsh measures; and the father said, "No, that is red." The little child thought a moment, and said, "That red square is blue." Dr. Johnson's dictum seemed to be coming dangerously near the application; and the father said, sternly: "What do you mean by that? A thing cannot be both red and blue." The child pondered a moment, and then threw herself at her father, and said, "O father, how I love you!" That is a parable of a great deal of our religious thinking in these days. We say, "That square is red." "No," somebody says: "that square is blue." And then, forthwith, we "rise to our larger unity" and our great, high statements, and include a self-contradiction, and then say, "Well, love is the greatest thing in the world." Is it not true that everywhere in our churches we do need clear, hard, close thinking and positive instruction?

But how can we have this, and still believe in progress? How can I teach positively anything which seems to me to be true, when I know that in the course of religious progress it may not always seem to me to be true? What does the teacher do in any other science, in any of our schools? If he is a wise man, he knows perfectly well that the conclusions of his science are open to revision. He knows there may be a discovery to-day, to-morrow, or the next day, which will force him to revise them. And yet he does not hesitate for one instant to teach his classes clear and definite statements. He knows that only by putting his pupils in the road and opening their interest in the science can they be prepared to receive the new thought when it comes. Now it is precisely the same method which we have to use in our religious instruction. The word which we are speaking to-day may be corrected by the ripper thought of next year, but those who have been trained by the clearness and definiteness of our preaching will be ready to respond to the new thought when it comes.

That brings me to the last thought, which is this: we have come to the position which holds that religion is natural, that religious life comes as a process of education. It is a marvellous advance over the thought of the past, and it has presented to the Unitarian Church of America its supreme problem. That problem is this: understanding that religion is natural, that it is developed in the human soul by natural processes and according to discoverable laws, how shall we find out those laws and apply them, so that in ourselves, and in those who come to our churches, the religious life may be developed? The old notion of the supernatural origin of religion still survives in our methods of religious instruction. We expect that, somehow, our children will drift into religious culture. We expect that, somehow,—we do not know how,—they are going to get to ripeness of spiritual manhood and womanhood by themselves. We are not so foolish in other departments of knowledge. We need, holding our new thought of religion, to approach the question of religious training from that point of view. That is our great problem,—to discover the laws of the unfolding of the human soul, and then to apply those laws, that there may be that religious evolution in ourselves and in our children.

I know of no greater task than that which rests upon us as a Unitarian Church. It is a great deal to say that religion is natural: it is infinitely more to make religious nature, in ourselves and in our children.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BUSINESS RECORD.

The American Unitarian Association held its seventieth annual meeting at Music Hall on Tuesday, May 28. The meeting was called to order at 9.30 by the president, Hon. George S. Hale; and prayer was offered by Rev. Charles T. Billings of Hingham. The reading of the records of the last meeting was omitted; and the president, after briefly welcoming the body of delegates, introduced Mr. H. F. Miller of the Nominating Committee, who presented its report. This report was accepted, and the committee discharged. A committee to receive and count votes was appointed by the president, as follows: Dr. H. H. Filoon of Brockton, Rev. B. F. McDaniel of Newton, Charles H. Burrage of Boston, Rev. Frank L. Phalen of Concord, and Daniel H. Varney of Salem. A recess of ten minutes was taken for voting, and it was voted that the polls be kept open until twelve o'clock. At the conclusion of the recess the treasurer's report was presented in print, and was accepted.

The report of the directors was then presented by their secretary, Rev. George Batchelor, but was set aside for the moment upon the arrival of his Excellency, Gov. Greenhalge, who made the following address of welcome:—

ADDRESS OF GOV. GREENHALGE.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen,—It is a great pleasure to be with you for a moment, and to extend the welcome of the Commonwealth to one of the brigades of its ecclesiastical militia. [Laughter.] I understand that you are not so bellicose as this description might seem to suggest, but even the works of peace require a certain spirit of aggressiveness. I do not attend my pastor's church as often as I ought, and yet I have learned something of the tenets of the Unitarian denomination; and I understand that your faith is intended to be rather utilitarian than ornamental. Some people take the position of the London shop-keeper, who, when the customer brought back the umbrella, said, in astonishment, "Why, sir, you've been having it out in the rain!" The Unitarian umbrella may not always look as fresh and bright and new as that of somebody else, but it can be said of it that it has been out in the storm of every-day life. [Applause.] Religion is of the utmost importance to every individual: the Unitarian, as I understand his faith, means that he shall have no more of it than he can actually make use of. [Laughter.] To speak in a journalistic way, it is a daily, intended to be published every day in the week. As the architect would say, his religion is intended to enter into the construction of his nature, and not to be merely a superficial or outside ornament. So to-day you look back upon the past with that satisfaction that good workers always feel. It seems to me not mere egotism, not mere vain-glory, if your denomination claims some portion of the great work of liberalization which is manifest in every church of Christ, of any kind or sect or faith, in the world to-day. At the same time I always find it necessary to caution the Unitarian about that absence of humility which has always characterized him. We do not want to be too partial to ourselves, and good works done in the past are only a warrant and inspiration to better works in the future.

In the name of the Commonwealth, I welcome you, because this is a Christian Commonwealth, and the light and the encouragement which you give to it are of the utmost value. If we find that with liberty, political or spiritual, comes a spirit of law and order, then we realize what liberty well ordered must mean. Even the waves of the Atlantic are controlled by law; and the free wind, that bloweth where it listeth, still proclaims an almighty and controlling Master. So every impulse of mind and heart must, under wise leadership, show that discipline and that order which always mark freedom and liberty in the disciples of him whose service is perfect freedom. [Applause.]

At the conclusion of the governor's address the report of the directors was resumed. This report being unanimously accepted, the secretary presented a letter of congratulation from the president of the Delegation of Liberal Reformed Churches in France, which will hold a triennial session at Nimes on the 11th of June. "In spite of the difference which separates us," he wrote, "we know that we can count upon your Christian sympathy. It has been to us infinitely precious in the past, and we ask you to renew and consolidate

ONLY $29.

There are a dozen names for it,—Invalid Chair, Chimney Corner Chair, Fire Chair, Draught Screen Chair, Great Comfort Chair, Winged Sleeping Chair, etc.

But, by whatever name it is called, there is only one name for the result,—luxurious comfort.

It is a chair that is delightful to an aged person or invalid. Protected from all draughts of air, enabled to rest in either corner or to lean against the back, enjoying a cushioned seat that is at least 30 inches wide in the front and 28 inches deep, with cushioned arms, back, and sides, it is not strange that one is able to sleep, read, converse, eat, write, or doze in this chair with immense enjoyment.

Only five years ago these winged chairs were very expensive. To-day we are selling fine patterns, in full size, at only $29. No person over 50 years of age can afford to be without one of these delightful chairs.

the bonds which unite us. We send to you the profound expression of our fraternal sentiment."

The president then introduced Rev. Albert Lazenby as a delegate from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

MR. LAZENBY expressed his pleasure in bringing the hearty greeting of that association, and also of the Scottish Unitarian Association.

REV. J. W. CHADWICK moved the appointment of a committee by the chair who should prepare some expression of the sense of loss in the death of Mr. Reynolds, such resolution to be presented at the afternoon meeting. The committee was appointed as follows: Rev. J. W. Chadwick, Rev. Edward Hale, and Mrs. Robert H. Davis.

An address was then made by Mrs. B. Ward Dix, president of the National Alliance. She recalled earlier anniversary meetings which she had attended in the past,—beginning with that of 1844, from which came to her the first idea of missionary work,—expressed appreciation of the recognition and encouragement women had received from the Association, and spoke briefly of the work and aims of the Alliance.

The report of the committee appointed at the last annual meeting to consider the proposed changes in the by-laws, and to report upon the whole question of the representation of the churches in the Association, was presented by the chairman, Mr. John Mason Little of Boston. Mr. Little read a letter from Mr. Reynolds, stating the origin of the system of life membership and the action taken by the Association at different times. He stated that Rev. S. J. Barrows, originally a member of the committee, resigned some time since, and had no responsibility for its conclusions. He presented the following as the unanimous report of the other members:—

First.—That life members now existing cannot legally be deprived of their votes.

Second.—That any action calculated to deprive life members created hereafter of their votes is undesirable.

Third.—That it was never intended by the present by-laws that churches should, by the medium of their contributions to the support of the Association, create life members; and in future such action is undesirable.

Fourth.—That the system of delegate membership is desirable, provided that such delegates represent churches which are not in debt to the Association or to the Church Building Loan Fund.

Fifth.—They recommend the following changes in the by-laws, in order that they may conform to the foregoing views.

First.—Insert in Article II. of the by-laws, after the word "dollars" and before the word "shall," the words "when made by an individual."

Second.—Insert in Article III. of the by-laws, after the word "standing" and before the word "shall," the words "not being indebted to the American Unitarian Association or the Church Building Loan Fund."

So that these articles shall read as follows:—

ARTICLE II. A subscription of fifty dollars, when made by an individual, shall constitute a person a member of this Association for life.

ARTICLE III.—Those contributing to the funds of this Association shall be entitled to representation under the following conditions, namely:—

Any church or missionary association of at least two years' standing not being in debt to the American Unitarian Association or the Church Building Loan Fund shall, upon sending a contribution for missionary uses to the treasurer of the Association for two successive years, be entitled to representation at all business meetings of the Association by the persons of its minister or president and two additional lay delegates, provided that such contributions shall be placed in the hands of the officers of the Association on or before May 1, to entitle a church to be represented in the following annual meeting.

Respectfully submitted,
JOHN MASON LITTLE, Chairman.
THOMAS J. MORRIS.
MRS. BRADLEY GILMAN.
THOMAS R. SLICER.

The report was accepted, and the committee discharged. Discussion followed upon the adoption of the proposed changes, and much difference of opinion was developed. On motion of Rev. M. J. Savage, it was then voted unanimously to lay the whole matter upon the table for one year, that members might have more time for consideration and more careful discussion.

DR. H. H. FILOON of Brockton presented the report of the committee appointed to receive and count votes for officers. From this report it appeared that the following officers had been chosen, who were then declared elected: president, Hon. John D. Long; vice-presidents, Hon. Horace G. Wadlin, Hon. Joseph W. Simonds, Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, Judge Thomas J. Morris, Hon. Daniel L. Shorey, Hon. Horace Davis; secretary, Rev. George Batchelor; assistant secretary, George W. Fox; treasurer, George W. Stone; directors, Mrs. Stephen H. Bullard, Rev. Ellery C. Butler, John Mason Little, Arthur T. Lyman, Henry B. Wells, Rev. William W. Fenn.

"Voted, That the president should appoint two auditors."

REV. CHARLES F. DOLE presented a resolution, already printed in the Register, requesting the Board of Directors to take such action as to make the free system the rule for churches which have the benefit of the missionary money of the Association. Mr. Dole spoke briefly in explanation of this resolution, which was also supported by Rev. W. I. Nichols of Philadelphia and Rev. Edward Hale of Orange, and was criticised by Rev. James C. Hodgins of Philadelphia, Rev. Lyman Clark of Andover, and Rev. J. W. Chadwick of Brooklyn. With some modification, it was then passed in this form:—

"Whereas the free system of sittings in church is best suited to efficient missionary work,

"Voted, That the Board of Directors are requested to take action, with due reference to special conditions and the time required for change of method, to recommend the free system for the use of the churches which have the benefit of the missionary money of the Association."

REV. B. F. MCDANIEL offered the following resolution, which was referred to the directors:—

"Resolved, That books be opened by this Association for the creation of a fund for the relief of ministers of our body temporarily in need of pecuniary aid, said fund to be administered by such officer or agency as the directors of this Association shall appoint."

REV. HENRY POWERS offered the following resolution on good citizenship, which was referred to the directors:—

"Whereas the people of this country who believe in its characteristic principles and institutions, and desire to preserve and promote them, have become seriously alarmed at the wide-spread indifference to these principles and institutions, and the many forms of corruption that result therefrom among our native population, and at the persistent and hurtful attacks upon them that are made by certain portions of our foreign population; and

"Whereas a deep revival of patriotic feeling, provoked by this alarm, is now rapidly extending itself through all the industrial, social, political, moral, and religious circles and societies of our common country, therefore

"Resolved, That the officers of the American Unitarian Association be urgently requested to devise and promulgate some plan whereby the ministers and laymen of the Unitarian denomination may express their patriotic feeling in both word and action, and so may take their part in this revival and do their share of its work."

The Association then adjourned until 2.30 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Association was again called to order at 2.30 by the president. Addresses were made by Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer of Providence, on "What can the liberal Church do toward Developing a Thinking and an Ethical Democracy?" and by Rev. Ida C. Hultin of Moline, Ill., on "The Personal Equation in Spiritual Influence and Growth." The secretary, Rev. George Batchelor, presented the following communication from Rev. Charles G. Ames:—

"Hon. George S. Hale has declined a re-nomination to the presidency of the American Unitarian Association after eight successive elections. He has held that office for a longer period than any of his predecessors, and has performed its duties with eminent ability, fidelity, and constancy. No contribution to our treasury can represent such solid value as the willing gift of time and thoughtful service taken out of the busy life of a professional man; and the members of the Association desire to join with the board of directors in grateful acknowledgment of this service, and in a testimonial of affectionate respect for our retiring president."

This resolution was unanimously adopted with hearty applause, to which Mr. Hale responded with thanks. (His address will be found in another column.)

MR. BATCHELOR read letters from Rev. Samuel May of Leicester, who is eighty-five years old; Rev. James Martineau, ninety years old; Rev. William H. Furness, ninety-three years old; and Rev. Thomas T. Stone of Bolton, ninety-five years old. He then called upon Rev. Edward E. Hale, who spoke upon the literary work of the founders of the Unitarian Church.

REV. J. W. CHADWICK, as chairman of the committee appointed at the morning session, presented the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:—

"Seeing that this meeting of the Association is the first since the death of Dr. Reynolds, it seems good, 'in order that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed,' to place upon our records some testimony of our affection for his person and our reverence for his memory. Therefore,—

"Resolved, That the months which have elapsed since his death have only tended to confirm our sense of the fidelity with which he gave himself to the work of the Association, and the wisdom and sobriety of his management of its practical affairs; that we remember with interest and gratitude the ideals of usefulness and progress which he cherished for the Unitarian denomination, and the enthusiasm with which he summoned others to their proper tasks, infusing into them something of his own abounding cheerfulness and hope; that the graces and nobilities of his daily walk and conversation are an inheritance that we cannot prize too much; and that we will do our best to keep his memory green by carrying on the work he loved so well in the spirit of his unwearied devotion to all truth and righteousness."

Resolutions thanking Mr. Thomas Gaffield and Mr. Arthur Lincoln for their faithful and valuable service to the interests of the Association were presented by Mr. Batchelor and Mr. William Howell Reed, respectively, and were unanimously adopted. On motion the Association adjourned until the evening session.

EVENING SESSION.

The Association was called to order at 7.30 by the new president, Hon. John D. Long. Prayer was offered by Rev. Rush R. Shippen of Washington. Mr. Long then said:—

These successive returns of Anniversary Week are in some respects like the returns which those of us who were born in a rural neighborhood make every summer to our birthplaces. They grow sweeter and attach us a little closer every year. We feel that contact with the familiar soil is a renewal of our youth, and so of our life; and we spring from it fitter for harder work than ever. We are among our neighbors and kinsfolk. In the burying-ground are lying some of those whom we met only a year ago. But their faces, their voices,—ah! yes, the faces and voices of all, back even to infancy,—are with us again; and we seem almost to see and to hear them. It is home, the one spot on the earth that has the permanence of the early impression.

So to-day we gather here in this fold of our household of faith, we look back with loving appreciation on all that has been done and on all who have done it; and for that very reason we look forward to the future with renewed resolution and hope. It seems to me that the doctrine of the survival of the fittest is not more true of physical life than it is of our religious philosophy. If some of the forms and expressions have disappeared, it is because it was better they should go. We may be assured that whatever remains is the best, and remains only because it is the best. If there be little, it is because there was little that was good enough to bear the test; and, if much, then because there was much, that was good. If there were giants in the ancient times, there will be greater giants in the time to come. If good work has been done, there is better work to do. If the field has been broad and liberal, it must be broader and more liberal still. It may be that there is cause for lament because we have not done more, especially because we are not doing more; but the greatest cause of lament certainly would be if there were not always more to be done than we can do. Our work is always greater than our equipment for it, and therein lies the secret of the fact that the greatest of all honors is service.

In this spirit we meet to-day, and, meeting, part again, after this glad reunion, to which all the tribes of our Israel have come up. You have done me the honor, which I very much appreciate, of making me the head of your Association. But I am modest enough and sensible enough to know that, far different from the case of my predecessors, it is only a figure-head. Our working forces—our secretary and treasurer and our other officials—are in themselves the best assurance of their great helpfulness. Rallying behind them, as they lead the way and lift the banner, let us move forward to the coming year.

Addresses were then made by Rev. W. M. Brundage of Albany, Rev. Albert Lazenby of Glasgow, and Rev. William W. Fenn of Chicago, at the close of which Rev. Francis Tiffany pronounced a benediction, and the Association adjourned.

Spiritual Life.

Only a deeper vitality, a richer filling of our spirits with the Spirit of God, an assurance of the possible divineness of the human life by an experience of how richly it may be filled with divinity,—only this can make us be to our brethren, and make them be to us, all that God designed.—Phillips Brooks.

What we are really doing on the steep slopes of life is to prop the wheels of the spiritual chariots of victory, so that, if they do not ascend higher just yet, they shall not at least fall back. So stand fast in all faithfulness, and oppose yourself to the all-too-strong downward tendencies.—Letters from an Unknown Friend.

Whatever task is set you to do, do it cheerfully, that your memory of it may be sweet. For, if a thing must be done, we shall like to remember that we did it with a whole heart and ungrudgingly, since that which is done grudgingly availeth little, and is not the deed of the inner man at all, and that which is done heartily groweth light in the doing.—Letters from an Unknown Friend.

But it has been customary to take no account of the bodily senses in spiritual perception. This is a sad blindness and serious disability. In the faith of the future the senses, as accessories of the soul, must play a vaster part, so that the mortal faculties may be trained to immortality. Directly cognizant as it is of the divine, what were the soul without the miracles of sense-perception?—Mozoomdar.

When, by nobler culture, by purer experience, by breathing the air of a higher duty, vitality at length creeps into the soul, the instincts of immortality will wake within us. The word of hope will speak to us a language no longer strange. We shall feel like the captive bird carried accidentally to its own lands, when, hearing for the first time the burst of kindred song, it beats instinctively the bars of its cage.—James Martineau.

THE CONFEDERATE MONUMENT.

The dedication of the monument to the Confederate dead in Chicago was one of the most conspicuous events of Memorial Day. A number of the leading officers, such as General Longstreet and Wade Hampton, gathered on the occasion. The city of Chicago received its guests with a very cordial hospitality. At the banquet given them they had a hearty welcome from the mayor, and the citizens crowded to the general reception to shake hands with their visitors. A very cordial spirit prevailed all round. The Southerners were deeply touched by the aid which the Northerners had given in raising the money for the monument as well as for their warm reception. In their addresses there was a very earnest national and fraternal feeling expressed by the Confederates; and, while they lauded the valor, devotion, and heroism of their comrades in arms, they were equally earnest in their desire to bury all the bitter animosities of the past. The speakers, with one opinion, asserted that this meeting was the crowning act which cemented the nation and buried all old hatreds. That such a gathering should have taken place, with the assertion on both sides of an intense national feeling, and the readiness expressed on the part of the Southerners to rush to the defence of the Union against both foreign and inter-

China Bedroom Sets.

We have recently landed many new shapes and decorations of English, German, and Canton Toilet Sets, also the best styles of American.

The display consists of upwards of 180 shapes and decorations, costing from $2 to $50 per set; designs adapted to seashore and country cottages, also the finer grades adapted to modern interior decorations.

The Dinner Set Department has an extensive line of Decorated China Sets at from $20 up to $500, including 200 patterns to choose from, many of which are stock patterns. The finer services are special decorations, not to be duplicated. Besides the China Sets are the English Earthenware Decorated Sets, at much less value. The Lamp Department and the Art Pottery Room, with novelties for Wedding Gifts, were never so replete and complete at this season of the year.

nal foes, proves that time has wrought its most beneficent influences. The treatment by Grant of Confederates when Lee surrendered at Appomattox took away much of the sting of bitterness. So now a generous trust and magnanimity will bury all hatreds and heal old wounds. The spirit alike of patriotism and religion enforces the injunction, Let the past bury the past; but go ye forth, both gray and blue, to build up the future American republic, so "that this nation shall, under God, have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish forever from the earth."

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

CAMBRIDGE ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS. The final meeting of the season will be held at Framingham, with Rev. E. C. Smith, on June 10. Hosts and dates for the season of 1895-96 as follows: Rev. C. W. Heizer, Wayland, October; Rev. M. O. Simons, Billerica, November; Rev. W. H. Johnson, Cambridge, December; Rev. S. M. Crothers, Cambridge, January; Rev. B. F. Bailey, Malden, February; Rev. Francis Tiffany, Cambridge, March; Rev. W. H. Pierson, Somerville, April; Rev. J. H. Whitmore, Stoneham, May; Rev. George W. Cooke, East Lexington, June.

The Meadville Alumni Association had a social reunion with a dinner at the United States Hotel in Boston on May 29. Forty-seven members were present, and a pleasant occasion was enjoyed. At the business meeting that followed the following officers were chosen: for president, Rev. E. A. Horton; vice-presidents, Rev. Rush R. Shippen, Rev. Jenkin L. Jones; secretary and treasurer, Rev. W. L. Chaffin; directors, Rev. George Batchelor, Rev. Frank L. Phalen, Rev. George H. Hosmer. Addresses were made by President Horton, Rev. George Batchelor, and others. Rev. Mr. Phalen and Rev. Mr. Hoagland spoke feelingly of Rev. Walter C. Moore, who recently died. It was voted to have a dinner next year, and also that an annual address should be given.

BOSTON.—Ministers' Monday Club: June 10, 10.30 A.M. Rev. C. T. Canfield will preside. Rev. E. C. Headle will read a sermon, to be followed by criticisms.

DOVER, N.H.—The Unitarian church has issued a warrant for a meeting to be held this week, to extend a call to Rev. Duren Ward.

GARDNER, MASS.—The Unitarian church is interested in Mr. W. C. Brown, who leaves the Harvard Divinity School this June.

HOULTON, ME.—Persons who wish to attend the Unitarian conference at Houlton, Me., on June 25, 26, and 27, are requested to send their names to O. K. Crosby, Box 148, Houlton, Me., as early as possible, that cards may be sent to them, telling them where they will be entertained.

HYDE PARK, MASS.—Rev. A. G. Pettengill of Yarmouth, Me., has accepted the call extended to him by the Unitarian society.

PRESQUE ISLE, ME.—The Unitarian church has published for free distribution an excellent sermon by Rev. W. E. Lane on "Conservative Development."

WEST ROXBURY, MASS.—The First Parish of West Roxbury has extended a call to Alfred Rodman Hussey of the Harvard Divinity School, and has received his acceptance.

WILLIMANTIC, CONN.—The movement here is prospering beyond anticipation. Rev. S. R. Free has already begun services, and at his first meeting had about four hundred listeners.

NORTH MIDDLESEX CONFERENCE.—The semi-annual meeting of the conference will occur at Nashua, N.H., on Thursday, June 13. Rev. George Batchelor, Rev. W. F. Greenman, Rev. George Herbert Hosmer, and a lady from the Women's Alliance will be among the speakers. Collation at noon. All friends of the conference invited.

NORFOLK CONFERENCE.—The Norfolk Conference will hold its summer meeting with the First Congregational Parish of Canton on Thursday, June 20. The principal addresses of the day will be given by Rev. Roderick Stebbins of Milton and Rev. Edward A. Horton of Boston. Rev. Benjamin A. Goodridge of Dorchester is to conduct the devotional service. Full details will appear in next week's Register.

THE SOUTH MIDDLESEX CONFERENCE.—The eighty-eighth regular session of the South Middlesex Conference will be held on Wednesday, June 12, in the Unitarian church at Bedford. Order of exercises: 10.45 A.M., devotional service conducted by Rev. Minot O. Simons of Billerica. 11.15 A.M., reports of committees, election of officers, and miscellaneous business. Address by Rev. S. M. Crothers of Cambridge, on "The Utilization of Spiritual Power." 12.20 P.M., collection for current expenses of the conference. 12.30 P.M., box-lunch, the society at Bedford providing tea and coffee. Lunch can be had at the Bedford House, adjoining the church, for 35 cents. Those desiring such lunch will please notify proprietor by Monday, June 10. 2 P.M., roll-call of the churches. Discussion of the morning subject, opened by Rev. Hilary Bygrave of Belmont. 3 P.M., brief address by Rev. G. W. Cooke, in the interest of the Unitarian Temperance Society. Trains from Union Station, Boston, at 8.05 and 10 A.M. Return, 12.42, 3.35, and 4.15. Ten-ride tickets, $2.60. Henry C. Parker, Secretary.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE.—The sixth annual session of the Rocky Mountain Conference of Liberal Christian Churches met at Denver May 4, 5, and 6. The conference covers a wide field, from Montana to New Mexico; and but eight organized societies are embraced within it, only three of which have church buildings. Exchanges are not frequent when ministers are from fifty to five hundred miles apart, and our yearly conference means a great deal to us. This last meeting has been no less interesting and inspiring than previous ones. The meetings opened Saturday evening by a pleasant reception to the delegates, followed by a "Word of Welcome" from Rev. N. A. Haskell of the Denver church and an address by Rev. T. B. Forbush on the "Raison d'être of the Liberal Church." Sunday morning Rev. J. H. Crocker of Helena preached the conference sermon, on "The Thought of God." Sunday afternoon was devoted to an interesting discussion of Sunday-school work. In the evening Rev. T. B. Forbush read a paper written by Rev. W. R. G. Mellen on "The Higher Criticism." Monday afternoon was in charge of the ladies of the conference. Papers were read by Mrs. L. W. Bassett, on "Unitarianism in the Household"; by Mrs. Mina S. Gabriel, on "Unitarians in the Charitable Movement"; and by Dr. Sarah J. Fearing, on "Where and How Unitarianism has Grown." In the evening Prof. Krauss of Colorado Springs spoke on "Science and Unitarianism," Rev. C. E. Montague of Cañon City on "Importance of Religion to Society," Rev. J. H. Crocker on "The Ideal Church," and Rev. T. B. Forbush on "The Religious Attitude of the Unitarian Church." With the exception of Helena and Greeley the reports from the various churches were more hopeful than encouraging. The harvest is plentiful: the reapers are few. But we trust that the outlook in the fall will drive our fears away, and that another May will bring us once more together, readier than ever to carry on the work so much needed here. C. Howard Wilson, Secretary.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

Selected Essays of James Darmesteter.

Translated from the French by HELEN B. JASTROW. Edited with an Introduction by MORRIS JASTROW, JR., Professor in the University of Pennsylvania. 12mo, $1.50.

CONTENTS: The Religions of the Future; The Prophets of Israel; Afghan Life in Afghan Songs; Race and Tradition; Ernest Renan; An Essay on the History of the Jews; The Supreme God in the Indo-European Mythology.

"In a volume of such surpassing interest as that which Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have just published, containing a select series of papers by the late Prof. James Darmesteter, whose untimely death a few months since was even a greater loss to critical scholarship than that of Prof. Romanes to natural science, it is invidious to single out any particular paper; and, if we were reviewing the book, we should not permit ourselves to do so. In that case we should certainly call attention to the splendid tribute to Renan, whose mantle fell on Prof. Darmesteter as upon no other, and to the remarkable papers on 'The Religions of the Future,' 'The Prophets of Israel,' and 'The History of the Jews'; but our present purpose is not that of the reviewer. It is to call attention to a particular chapter, 'Race and Tradition,' the drift of which is very interesting and important."—JOHN W. CHADWICK, in the Brooklyn Standard-Union.

"Her work is fresh, stimulating, and strong. Miss Scudder shows how great powers have guided the development of modern poetry. Science, democracy, and a new appreciation of the past have shaped it in its quest for truth."—Literary World.

"The interpretation it gives of the tendencies of modern English poetry is thoughtful and stimulating."—New York Tribune.

"A volume which is sure to be read with pleasure by every lover of the best in Victorian verse."—Boston Beacon.

Latin Poetry.

By R. Y. TYRRELL, Professor in the University of Dublin. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

"The volume ranks in interest and value with the preceding lectures by Mr. Stedman on the 'Nature and Elements of Poetry' and on 'Greek Poetry' by Professor Jebb. These chapters are delightful examples of literary analysis and criticism."—Literary World.

Russian Rambles.

By ISABEL F. HAPGOOD. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

"Miss Hapgood's observations take a wide range, and she was particularly fortunate in seeing a side of Russian life not usually accessible to the foreigner, who seeks only for the diversions of travel. One gets from this book a very definite idea of what every-day life in Russia really is, and gets it in a most attractive manner."—Boston Beacon.

"During the years she passed in the Empire she learned and observed so much, which she tells so well, that she has given us a volume of distinctly exceptional merit."—New York Evening Post.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

[From The New Unity, May 2, 1895.]

The selection we give in another column from "The House Beautiful"—one of Mr. Gannett's uplifting studies which James H. West has just published—was not made because it was the most inspiring word the pamphlet contains. Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on "The dear Togetherness" is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. But this extract was selected simply because it was the shortest that could be made to stand by itself. By sending its publisher fifteen cents our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so.

Bright gold, the god of many minds,
Arduently eager for your gain,
The saintly soul your value finds

And, like the spirit host above,
Finds serving God is sweetest grace.

MARTHA'S PRAYER.

"Martha, Martha," called Mrs. Wright from the broad stone doorstep.

Martha, a little girl of ten years, nearly hidden by a great gingham sun-bonnet, was weeding her small flower garden. She straightened her chubby form at once, and, pushing back the bonnet from the warm, rosy face, ran to her mother.

"Deacon Scott has just been here to say that old Mrs. Jenkins, down at the farms, is very low," said Mrs. Wright, looking thoughtfully at her little daughter. "She has expressed a great desire, not only to have your father come and pray with her, but to see me. You know it is a long drive down there, so you must come in and help me with the work; for we must have dinner at twelve and get an early start."

"And may I go with you and hold Betsy while you are in the house?" asked Martha, pulling off the sun-bonnet and shaking out a mass of bright golden curls as she followed her mother into the kitchen.

"No, Martha, it is not best this time," answered Mrs. Wright; and she shut her lips after the words, as if there were no more to be said.

The child's deep blue eyes grew a shade deeper, and the dimples stopped playing in her cheeks, but she did not ask why; for this little Martha was a minister's daughter of fifty years ago. She washed her hands, and went about putting a snowy cloth on the dinner-table in the roomy kitchen, in a deft, housewifely way that was pleasant to see.

Mrs. Wright went back to the buttery and mixed a Johnny-cake; and it was not until it was placed in just the right position before the fire to bake that she spoke again.

"I am sorry, my daughter, that we must leave you alone this afternoon; but I know you can easily keep so busy as not to be lonely, and William will get home before dark. You can finish weeding your garden when the dishes are done. Then there is your Latin lesson to be prepared, and your knitting."

"You don't care if I play with my dolls just for company, do you, mother?" asked Martha, her lips quivering a little.

"Oh, no, of course I don't," said her mother. "Play all you like, only don't neglect your lesson, and remember to feed the chickens; and, if we shouldn't be back before dark, strain the milk very carefully."

Martha said, "Yes, ma'am," very soberly, and went to the cupboard to get the knives and forks. It took but a minute or two; but, when she got back to the table, the blue eyes and the dimples were dancing together. "O mother," she said, dropping her hand-ful with a gentle little clatter, "can't I have Jinny come over and spend the afternoon, and we play dress up and go visiting?"

"Why, yes, you can," answered her mother, thoughtfully sticking a fork into the potatoes to see if they were done. "Now finish laying the table, and then run to the study and tell your father dinner is nearly ready. Go quietly, for he is writing old Elder George's funeral sermon."

The little girl tripped blithely to and fro until her first task was done, then opened the door into the old-fashioned parlor with its great mahogany chairs standing as prim and solemn as if there were no gay-colored store carpet under them and no muslin curtains at the windows. But her small feet danced merrily over the red figures; for was not Jinny Douglas coming to spend the afternoon? Further on, across the hall, she knocked lightly at a door into another room. A pleasant voice answered dreamily; and Martha opened the door to meet a pair of blue eyes just like her own, looking gravely around the corner of a high cherry desk. But the grave eyes smiled gently upon her; and father answered her message with, "Presently, daughter."

While they were putting dinner on the table, Mrs. Wright said, "While your father is getting up the horse, Martha, you may go over and ask Jinny's mother if she can spare her this afternoon," and "Yes, you may play in the spare bedroom, only don't litter it up, nor muss the new bed curtains."

How long dinner seemed! But at last, in what was really a short space of time, it was over. Martha put on her sun-bonnet, and ran out into the June sunshine.

The roomy old parsonage was on a farm; and it was a quarter of a mile to the nearest neighbors, who were Jinny, her father, mother, and two "big" brothers.

Martha skipped all the way. She was warm, and her bonnet was slipping down on her shoulders when she arrived at the Douglas back door; but she said modestly and sweetly: "Good afternoon, Mrs. Douglas. Please, do you think you could spare Jinny this afternoon? Father and mother are going away; and mother said, if you were willing, Jinny might come over to play with me."

Mrs. Douglas was willing, and said that Jinny might come as soon as she had done her dishes and "got cleaned up."

Back home rushed Martha, just in time to see her father drive Betsy up to the door. Mother stepped out in her best black bombazine dress and green poke bonnet, with her shawl on her arm, gave her little daughter a loving kiss and many cautions not to scald or burn herself, not to forget to water the rose-bush, and to feed the chickens, give William a good supper, and strain the milk carefully. Then she stepped into the chaise, and Betsy went jogging along the solitary road and out of sight.

Martha gazed after the chaise for a minute or two, then ran into the house, and went cheerfully to work. In half an hour the dishes were standing in shining rows on the dresser, the white cloth was folded, the hearth was brushed, and sticks were laid in the fireplace ready for boiling the kettle at tea-time.

Jinny came in good season, and the girls repaired to the spare bedroom. The visitor had brought her children, two rag dolls with blue bead eyes and berry-stain lips, and one with a wooden head. Martha introduced her family, which was quite numerous, owing to her ingenuity in the construction of rag, paper, and cob dolls.

"I have so many," began the little hostess, "I can let you take Hannah and Rachel and Rebecca, and I'll have Miriam and Esther and Ruth and Methusaleh and Keren-Happuch and Tuzy Ann. We'll have lots of children, and play they run away and have to be put to bed without any supper. Mother said we mustn't play on the bed; but you can have your house in the closet, because you are company. I'll have mine in this corner."

Jinny assented, and suggested a braided rug for carpeting her house.

The house was carpeted, and furnished with two small chairs which nearly filled it; and then Martha went on with a little air of importance, "Now I'm going to show you my treasures."

"Treasures! What's that?" interrupted Jinny.

"They are all in here," said Martha, gravely laying her hand on a brown hair-covered trunk. "They belong to my beautiful Aunt Martha; and now they are mine, because I'm named after her."

The trunk was not locked—nothing ever was in the parsonage, not even the doors,—and the girls pulled it open easily.

"Oh, my! oh, my! Ain't they beautiful?" cried Jinny, as Martha drew out before her admiring gaze two or three rich brocade silk dresses, an India shawl, a velvet jacket, a fur cape that suggested the arctic regions, and various bright crêpe scarfs, with, to crown all, a great pink silk bonnet.

When Jinny had admired these to Martha's satisfaction, and suggested that they were clothes, not treasures, the girls chose each a dress, with which to make herself a fine lady. Jinny, gorgeously arrayed in a bright blue silk, dark green velvet jacket, and a purple scarf, repaired to the closet with Hannah and Rachel and Rebecca, to set up housekeeping. Martha, having set her house in order in the corner, donned the fur cape and pink silk bonnet, and set out with Methusaleh to pay her friend a visit. Calls were pleasantly exchanged for a while, family cares discussed, the dolls duly lectured, chastised, and put to bed.

"I'm tired," said Martha, at last. "Let's sit still in here and rest awhile. I don't know what will become of Methusaleh when he gets older: he wears me out now."

"Let's have it dark, and play it's night," said Jinny, rising and pulling the door gently toward her.

There was a latch on the outside of the door, but the thumb-piece by which it might be opened from the inside was broken off. A breeze blew in at the open window opposite the door. It was just strong enough to finish Jinny's work. It blew the door shut, and the latch fell.

"Oh, dear, what shall we do?" cried Martha: "we can't get out."

"Oh, oh, oh!" screamed Jinny, beginning to pound on the door.

Martha knew it was of no use; but she must do something, and began to pound, too.

"Whew! I'm awful hot," she said, stopping to struggle with her fur cape, "Jinny Douglas, whatever made you shut that door?"

"I didn't, either," sobbed Jinny. "Oh, oh, oh! We shall roast alive, and melt down into grease spots, and die!"

"Don't cry," said Martha, bravely, suddenly remembering that Jinny was company, and must be treated accordingly. "Let's holler as loud as we can, and may be somebody will go by and hear us."

"What shall we holler?" asked Jinny, rubbing her velvet sleeves over her wet eyes.

"Help, help! Come and let us out!" screamed Martha, for reply.

Jinny echoed the cry, and for five minutes both called at the top of their voices. But no one heard, no one came.

"I can't holler any more," said Jinny, mingling tears and perspiration together, as she began to sob again.

Martha dropped down in one of the chairs, and said miserably: "Brother William is going to run errands for Mr. Mix after school, so he won't get home till six o'clock. I know we shall be dead and suffocated by that time, and mother will find the room all littered up."

Jinny stopped crying from very terror, and the children were silent for two or three minutes. The air in the closet was becoming exhausted, and the darkness grew more oppressive every minute. Suddenly Martha said reverently, "Let us pray."

Jinny bowed her head on her knees, without a word.

"O Lord," said Martha, "thou seest how we are shut up in this dark closet and can't get out. Please send somebody to let us out. Amen."

As Martha rose from her knees, she stumbled against a splint basket that her mother had put in the closet only the day before. A thought came to her like an inspiration. She pulled out and broke off a strong, flat splint. It would just slip through the crack of the door. She thrust it through, pushed it up to the latch, and pried. The latch yielded, and the door flew open. Two tired, faint, very sober little girls crept out.

"How quickly God answered my prayer!" said Martha, as the children sat fanning themselves by the window a few minutes later.

"I don't know," answered Jinny, doubtfully. "You prayed for somebody to come and let us out, but nobody came. We just got out ourselves."

"But we got out just the same, and that was what we wanted," said Martha. "Anyhow, I'll ask mother. Now, let's put the things away and go outdoors."

When Mr. and Mrs. Wright drove into the yard at sunset, the rose-bush was watered, the chickens were fed, the milk was carefully strained, and William and Martha were sitting on the doorstep, poring over a Latin grammar. Inside the snowy cloth was laid, the fire was blazing, and tea was ready.

"Mother," said Martha, as she prepared for bed after evening prayers, "Jinny and I got fastened in the spare-room closet this afternoon; and I prayed for somebody to come and let us out. Nobody came, but I pushed up the latch with a splint. Jinny says that wasn't our prayer being answered, but just getting out ourselves. Was it, mother?"

Martha could not understand why her mother suddenly clasped her tightly and kissed her, and was a full minute getting ready to reply. "Yes, daughter," she said, smoothing the golden hair, "it was answer to your prayer. God's best way of answering our prayers is giving us the power to answer them ourselves."—Mary Redfield Potter, in the Examiner.

THE OLD VIOLIN.

A LITTLE SERMON TO CHILDREN.

BY REV. WILLIAM BIRCH, D.D.

I wish to tell you a tale which I heard in Genoa, Italy, about an old fiddle.

In the year 1831, at an auction in London, England, which drew a small crowd of wealthy, fashionable people, was a black and greasy violin said to be an ancient Cremona, one hundred and twenty years old, and supposed to have been made by the famous Antonio Stradivari.

When the violin was lifted from its case and given to the auctioneer, he held it gently as if he were afraid it might break in pieces, or perhaps he thought it a sacred thing. Having described its supposed history, he handed it to a well-known professional player to show its sweetness and power; but, though the musician no doubt did his best, the tones were not specially fine, and did not seem better than those of a high-class modern fiddle. The people looked disappointed; and with a long face, but trying to speak cheerfully, the auctioneer called for bids.

After much coaxing, he began with an offer of a guinea, and gradually worked the people up to six guineas, beyond which it seemed impossible to move. "A real, grand, original, genuine Antonio Stradivari!" he cried. Some one said, "It does not bear his name," but the auctioneer explained that some of the violins which bore the name were shams, the name having been added in modern times to increase the value; and, as no one denied it, he triumphantly held up the case bearing the fiddle like a baby in its cradle, crying, "See the sweet little beauty, gentlemen!" He levered the bids up to ten guineas, where the fiddle seemed to stick, notwithstanding the beads of sweat which stood on the auctioneer's forehead and ran along his nose, and were flitted off with the back of his hand. "Only ten guineas for an instrument worth its weight in gold! Ten guineas—going! going! Only ten guineas!"

At this point a middle-aged Italian, in a velvet coat, entered, and, when he saw the fiddle, as if drawn by a magnet, gently pushed his way to the front. Taking the case, he lifted out the violin, keenly examined it, putting it to his ear and listening as if he thought something inside might speak to him, and handling it as if it were a very little child. He stretched his hand for the bow; and when, in the almost breathless silence, he turned his full face to the crowd, some of them recognized him and whispered, "Paganini!"

The first three or four notes thrilled every one. In another moment many were in tears. Soon their feet moved as if they wished to dance, one of them exclaiming, "It is divine!" They again wept; and, when Nicolo Paganini reverently kissed the violin and tenderly placed it in the case, some one, cried, "Fifty guineas!" another, "Sixty!" others, "Seventy!" "Eighty!" "Ninety!" and so on, until, followed by great cheering, the fiddle was knocked down to the famous artist for one hundred guineas. At Drury Lane that night Paganini stood before a packed house with that old fiddle in his hand; and, while enthusiastic applause often came from the people, a mighty sob was uttered when, with unequalled pathos, he breathed himself into "Home, Sweet Home" on the G string he so much loved.

Little folks, we may seem poor and feeble, and some persons, perhaps, despise us, but we are all children of the heavenly Father, sparks from the anvil of God; and, if he take us into his hands, he will bring out of us the music of courage and truth. As the old grimy violin yielded itself to Nicolo Paganini, let us in loving obedience yield ourselves to God, and our daily lives will seem as a melody divine.

THE CAGED THRUSH.

Alas for the bird who was born to sing!
They have made him a cage; they have clipped his wing;

They have shut him up in a dingy street,
And they praise his singing and call it sweet.
But his heart and his song are saddened and filled
With the woods and the nest he never will build,
And the wild young dawn coming into the tree,
And the mate that never his mate will be;
And day by day, when his notes are heard,
They freshen the street, but—alas for the bird!

JACK AND THE LILY.

It was a lovely lily, every one said so. One tall, slender stem, crowned by three of the most perfect white blossoms.

Mrs. Elwyn was very proud of it. "I think that, if it does not take a prize at the flower show, Thomas, it will at least be highly commended," she said to her gardener one morning.

Jack stood by his mother's side, listening. He reached out one chubby hand, and clasped it about the lily's stem.

"Don't touch it, my boy," said his mother, quickly. "It is very tender, and a rough pull would snap it off."

Three days passed away. It was the evening before the flower show, and Jack was in the garden all by himself. "I will just go and look at the lily," he thought. It had now come to perfection: never were such huge snow-white petals seen before. As the little boy looked, a great wish seized him to draw it closer. He clasped his fingers about the pale green stock, and drew it toward him. Ah! it was almost on a level with his face, when crack went the slender stem, and the beautiful, proud lily could hold its head erect no longer. The little boy's face went all crimson, and tears rushed into his great honest blue eyes.

"Run away, run away, before any one sees you," something whispered. "Mother will think a dog came into the garden, and brushed past it."

"No, no, no; for it would not be true!" cried little Jack; and he ran indoors as fast as his short, sturdy legs would carry him.

Mother looked up with a smile as he entered the room. Then she held out her arms, and said, "Come here, and tell me what is the matter, sonny."

"O mother, mother!" sobbed the little boy, with his curly head on her shoulder. "I have been very—very—n-n-naughty. I touched the lily, and it is broken. O mother, please forgive me, but punish me first. Whip me hard, if you like."

Mother smiled. It was such an absurd ending to the speech, and she never had whipped Jack in all the five years of his life. "There, there, darling," she said, patting his curly head: "let us go and look at the lily. Perhaps it is not so bad, after all."

Nor was it. The stem had snapped just in the right place, mother said, exactly where she had intended to cut it.

And—O joy!—the lily took the prize at the flower show, after all. But mother said, as she kissed Jack's little sunshiny face the night after the flower show, there was something she valued far more than the prize; and that was a little son who was brave enough to speak the truth.—Selected.

SNOW-BALL.

I had a little kitten. It was as white as cotton-batting and had a spot upon it. One of its eyes was blue, and the other green; and it had such a pink little mouth. It loved me very much, and at night it slept on my arm just like a baby. I had ribbons of all colors for its neck; and auntie worked its name on every one,— "Snow-ball."

All winter it never went out of the house; but, when spring came and the windows were open, it used to sit on the window-sill, looking out. I left it there one day when I went to lunch, and when I came upstairs again it was gone. My Snow-ball gone! I could not believe it was true: it seemed too cruel.

I cried and screamed, and mamma was so sorry; and Bridget, the girl, ran up and down the street, looking for it. And after a while an old man, who was sweeping the street, told her that he saw a boy run up our porch, and take a white kitten off the window-sill.

Papa advertised in the paper, offering a reward if he would bring it back; but nothing came of it, and I began to know that I should never see Snow-ball again. Everybody said it was foolish to care so much for a cat; but, if you do care, how can you help it?

I worried so that I grew thin, and the doctor ordered me cod-liver oil.

Opposite our house there is a little park where all the children go to roll their hoops or jump rope or play games. It is very pretty and nice, and a big policeman walks about, and no tramps are allowed to come in. In warm weather I often go there to play, and one day I went there. But somehow I got to thinking of Snow-ball, and wanted to cry; and I went and sat on a bench alone, and maybe I should have cried really, only all of a sudden I heard some one say: "Oh, my! What shall I do now?" And there, close beside me, was the nicest old lady,—a real grandmother-looking one,—and what had happened was this: she was taking home some cherries in a paper bag, and the bag had burst, and there were all the cherries on the grass. There was another bag, too, with ginger-nuts in it that the same thing had happened to.

"These grocers tie things up with such worthless strings," she said, "that there is no getting them home. What I'm to do I don't know."

"Do you live near by, ma'am?" I asked.

"Yes, child, just over there," she said, pointing to a nice little white house just opposite the park. "There is my little grandson looking out for his good things."

"If you'll let me, I'll put them in my apron and carry them home for you," said I. "What a good child!" said she. "But suppose the cherries should stain your apron? They are nice and firm, though, so I guess they won't."

Then she spread the bits of paper all over my apron and laid the cherries upon it, and piled the ginger-nuts up neatly; and away we went.

When we got to the house, a little boy opened the door for us; and the old lady took me into such a pretty little dining-room, and put the cherries into one dish and the ginger-nuts into another.

"I'm happy to say there isn't a spot on your apron," she said. "Now go and sit down with my Willie, and have some of this fruit you've saved for me. I haven't seen such a polite little girl for years!"

"Thank you, ma'am," I said. "I'll eat a few cherries; but I must not stay long, because mamma would be frightened if she did not see me in the park."

Just as I said that, I heard a little mew—just like Snow-ball's mew—and another and another; and out of the shiny little kitchen behind the dining-room a kitten came rushing, scrambled up my skirt, and lay down in my lap. I stared at it, and then I gave a scream.

"It is Snow-ball! It is Snow-ball!" I said. "Oh, please, ma'am, where did you find him? It is my Snow-ball that I never thought I should see again!"

"Sure enough, 'Snow-ball' was worked on the red ribbon the poor little creature had on its neck when I rescued him," said the old lady. "I've got the ribbon here," and she took from a basket a very dirty piece, and held it up by her thumb and finger. "The poor creature was as black as that," she said, "when I took him away from the most dreadful boy who was torturing him. He was lying in the mud; and the little brute was just going to crush him with a great stone, when I flew out of my door, caught him—the boy, I mean—by the collar, and shook him until his teeth chattered. Then I brought pussy into the house. He was muddy and bloody, and I thought he must die; but you see he is as well and pretty as ever, and I am so glad to give him back to you, my dear."

"I am so glad to get him!" I said. "But I am afraid you'll miss him very much, ma'am."

The old lady laughed.

"To tell the truth, pets are a little trouble to me," she said; "for I am a nurse, and go out to take care of sick people, and have to lock my doors up very often. But just to think! If you had not been so polite and good-natured this morning, I should never have known Snow-ball belonged to you or been able to give him back. How happy you do look!"

Then she kissed me, and I ran home to tell the news to mamma.—New York Ledger.

GENERAL SHERMAN UNDER FIRE.

General Sherman and General Thomas were warm and intimate friends. In their familiar intercourse they were to each other usually "Bill" and "Tom," after the free and easy fashion of school-boys rather than like dignified and austere warriors.

Near Resaca, Ga., during a sharp action, General Sherman went upon a railway embankment directly in the line of fire, and stood carelessly amid the flying bullets, making his observations and giving his orders.

Turning, he saw the head and shoulders of the portly and magnificently proportioned Thomas appearing above the protection of the railway earthwork. Sherman, always careful for his friends rather than for himself, called out,—

"Pretty hot up here, Tom,—better not come up."

"What are you doing there yourself, then?" answered Thomas.

"Oh, I just turn edgeways to 'em," said the tall attenuated commander with a grin, as he resumed his duties.—Youth's Companion.

THE PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

The most interesting and instructive sessions of the General Assembly were those devoted to Home and Foreign Missions, and to the celebration of the reunion of twenty-five years ago. It is, perhaps, impossible to judge from what was said in the General Assembly as to what is the present feeling of Presbyterians in regard to missions. Both the Home and Foreign Boards reported very large deficits and restricted work for the year. This, however, may have been entirely due, as the reports claimed, to the financial depression. In this Assembly, however, there seems to be no diminution of interest in missions to the heathen. The reports were received with close attention, and applause was given at all references to the names of missionaries. If the dozen or more missionaries who have appeared in these meetings are fair examples, this Church is represented abroad by men of good ability, not by its weaklings, as is sometimes affirmed. They have made clear, concise, and stimulating addresses about their work, and have given evidence of the same heroic spirit that animated Judson and Patterson. It is certainly a great thing for a church to have such bronzed and emaciated soldiers of the cross to make at its great meetings their threefold report,—by their firm words announcing their victories, by their worn faces their fortunes, and by their heroic intention of going straight back to the front their continued willingness to endure for Christ and his church and humanity the lonely and slow labors of the missions.

The orthodox sects are reputed to be more zealous for missionary work than the liberal Christians; and it must be admitted that they have been more patient and heroic in sticking to the hard tasks of the spread of Christianity than we have. Unitarians have been too much given to waiting for their new churches to spring up by spontaneous combustion, too little devoted to advancing with their torch. There must be some sort of fire connected with missionary work; and perhaps our dilatory policy in the matter has been due to our inability to use the old kind, the lurid hell fires of stanch Calvinism. But there is arising a new Unitarianism, as witnessed in Mr. Chadwick's recent book, that has a vital fire of its own,—a fire in the hearts of true believers who desire to help others by the truth; and it has been intensely interesting to the writer to discover in these meetings devoted to Presbyterian missions that there is rising also a new Calvinism, not so much one of a changed catechism as one of a riper, broader, sweeter, missionary motive. In these addresses upon missions there has been comparatively little emphasis upon the old hell bugbear. To be sure, one lay-worker from Siam talked in the old strain about the millions that are dying daily, and sinking into hell; but the prevailing reference was to the educational and friendly work of missionaries, and the aim of missions was stated to be "to bring the world to Christ" rather than "to rescue the perishing" as formerly,—a significant change.

Consequently, the general temper of the Assembly upon this subject has been one in which a new-school Unitarian has been able to sympathize heartily. Modern missionary work is grand, and Unitarians have it in their hearts to share its toil. It is very easy to find a seamy side in orthodox missionary work, just as it is in the doings of scientific societies and the business operations of some of the critics of theological zealots. In the annual report of the Board of Foreign Missions of the United Presbyterian Church are these passages concerning their mission in India: "A few years ago our mission field was invaded by the Roman Catholics; . . . but now it is believed that the effort of the Romanists has spent its force, and that but little, if any, more injury will result." "But during the past year a serious invasion has been made from a very different source. The General Synod of the reformed Presbyterian Church has a mission at Roorki, some two hundred miles distant from our field. Two of their native ministers are related to persons connected with our mission in Gujrauwalla, and through them have begun to organize work there. The movement is hostile to our mission and work. It has made itself a reproach in the sight of the heathen, and there is no prospect of the two missions being able to work in harmony. The cause of Christ suffers, and apparently evil only can result." One would think so! Here are two denominations, differentiated in the United States by technical points that are not even theological, and that are so pitifully slight that an ordinary mind cannot remember them after he has painfully inquired what they are, so hostile in the mission field that they cannot work within two hundred miles of each other!

The criminal rivalries of the various orthodox bodies in innumerable small towns and cities of the Home Mission field throughout this land are well known to every unprejudiced observer. They were indirectly confessed in the assembly meeting for Home Missions. This is pre-eminently the "seamy side" of missionary work. Add to this the firm conviction of apparently all Presbyterian missionary workers that their duty everywhere is to antagonize the Roman Catholic Church and convert its adherents, and you see Presbyterianism at its worst. If Jesus and his disciples founded any church at all, it was the Roman Catholic Church; and there is precious little of the spirit of Christ in these fierce hostilities against the only Christian church that has ever deeply affected the minds and hearts and conduct of great masses of lowly people.

But with all their faults,—what work in all the world is not hampered by the human weaknesses and mental errors of its upholders?—with all their faults, orthodox missions to the heathen have achieved magnificent things. One has only to read Dr. Lawrence's sober and catholic book on "Modern Missions in the East" to be convinced of this. Dr. Lawrence was a true friend of missions. He has shown his honesty by frankly revealing all their faults and weaknesses; but, as only a friend can do, he has presented the real spirit and results of the missions of this century, and his tale is one worthy of the careful attention of Unitarians, who have often hastily criticised this brave right arm of Orthodoxy. Entering with him into the inner life of the missionaries, we discover that, after all the lurid speeches of old-time home officials of mission boards, the essential thing planted among "the heathen" has not been Calvinism so much as it has been magnificent human courage, patience, love, and devotion to ideals.

Think of men working alone among an alien race for five, ten, even twenty years before they saw one evidence that they had influenced a single soul, yet still sticking to the high endeavor. Dr. Lawrence shows us the men that have done this sublime thing. We may well recognize and honor their pluck, even if it does lead us to overlook the errors we think we can demonstrate in their creed; and we can learn a lesson for our own work from the fact that in every case where such persistence was displayed there are now large and active native Christian churches, through which Christianity is rapidly spreading. Many orthodox missionaries have failed. Many have died at their posts. But orthodox missions have succeeded.

On the evening of the celebration of the reunion two addresses of striking ability and interest were made by President F. L. Patton, D.D., and Rev. H. M. Booth, D.D. The point of most significance for the readers of the Register came at the climax of Dr. Patton's profound and eloquent treatment of "The Fundamental Doctrines of Presbyterianism." After enumerating and eulogizing the distinctive tenets of his Church, he asserted that the one most essential doctrine was that of the plenary inspiration of the Bible,—a supernatural, infallible record of supernatural events. Then he went on to say, with most impressive emphasis and careful choice of words, that the next great debate for the Church must be between those who defend this doctrine and those who do not believe it. Evangelical Christianity hangs on the inerrancy of the Bible; but it will no longer answer, said the speaker, to defend the Bible with clap-trap methods. The new views about the Bible must be met with profound scholarship and open discussion. Only by beating them with their own methods can the advocates of "the higher criticism" be suppressed, and the old view of the Bible be preserved. Dr. Patton said that he had no fear as to the outcome of the debate that is now beginning; but to at least one of his hearers the thought came that to admit that there is need for debate on this subject is the beginning of defeat. It is a matter for profound rejoicing for all who love progress to learn from this startling admission made so publicly, and in such a manner as to seem an authoritative utterance of all Calvinism, that Orthodoxy recognizes that it has a great fight on hand which touches its very foundations, and can only be waged by the ablest minds. Let the great debate go on. It is much that Kuenen, Wellhausen, Cheyne, Smith, and Martineau have at last compelled conservatism to put forth its entire strength in all seriousness. At last it will leak out to all people that new ideas about the Bible are thoughtfully advocated in the name of Christ, and in the high tribunal of mankind's common sense that which is true will carry the day.

The spirit of President Patton's weighty address was most judicial and noble. He recognized the sincerity of those whose views he felt to be so perilous to Orthodoxy. He would meet them with scholarship, not with hatred. It would seem, therefore, that liberalism has won a footing in the respect of its ablest opponents, and that a gracious day is dawning, in which fairness is to be the rule on both sides, and truth the only desire of all engaged in the study of present-day theology. So let the liberal church of every name gird up its loins for a more strenuous work. We are the ones to push this debate; and our opportunity to-day is to make of the new scholarship that recasts and lights up our Bible the most influential religious force in our land. Evangelical Christianity (so called) is at last on the defensive in a thoughtful way. And the ocean it is hoping to keep back is the holy spirit that is going to set forth Christianity in its simplicity and undogmatic power.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much. — Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid. — Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number. — Wisconsin.

BLOSSOM-TIME.

Oh! the sweet world of the blossoms,
When the blithe winds to and fro
Rock the softly tinted cradles
Where the fruited orchards grow,
All the breezes wafting perfume
O'er wide fields of drifting snow.

Snow of summer and of flowers,
Not the flakes of feathery chill
Once that filled the sleeping hollows,
Rounded out each watching hill;
Snow of summer and of flowers,
Acres of it where you will.

Hidden deep among the petals,
Even from eyes that love her best,
Many a patient little mother
Broods beneath her beating breast
Wings and songs that wait their rapture
When they flutter from the nest.

Oh! the white world of the blossoms,
Where the sweet winds to and fro
Softly, softly, rock the cradles
Swinging high and swinging low,
Cradles of the fruited orchards
In the blossoms' tinted snow.

Literature.

The Magazines.

The Atlantic Monthly for June contains tender, appreciative reminiscences of Christina Rossetti by William Sharp, who writes of her out of a personal acquaintance and sorrow at her death. William Woodville Rockhill describes a pilgrimage to the Buddhist sanctuary of North China, a place visited each year by thousands of Mongols, Tibetans, and Chinese. Gilbert Parker's serial, "The Seats of the Mighty," does not droop in interest; Mrs. Phelps-Ward's gains in movement; and there are two short stories to keep up the fiction end of the magazine.

An article on "Chicago" takes the lead in the June Scribner's, and makes good its first assertion that "the history of Chicago is the most romantic and dramatic of modern times." The pictures given illustrate well the successive phases of the city, and Mr. Melville Stone proves an apt commentator. The increased interest in the bicycle is recognized in four short articles that will draw still others into the healthful recreation. Continued articles are Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Story of Bessie Costrell," which is to be completed in July; a fourth instalment of President Andrew's "History of the Last Quarter Century in the United States"; another section of Meredith's "An Amazing Marriage"; and "The Use of Time" in Robert Grant's "Art of Living" series. Then there are three short stories of average quality.

The red-letter articles in the June New England Magazine are: "The Roxbury Latin School," by James De Normandie; "Sir William Pepperell and the Capture of Louisburg," by Victoria Reed; "Artistic Domestic Architecture in America" (a title curiously difficult to pronounce easily), by Ban Ferree; and "The Capital of New Hampshire," by Frances M. Abbott. Of these the first has an especial interest for educators about Boston, and no less, perhaps, for the many who may pick out the names of their own ancestors in the reproduction of the first page of the ancient school covenant. Alice Morse Earle writes of John Pitman, "A Baptist Preacher and Soldier" of Revolutionary times. Gertrude Morton and Keziah Shelton contribute stories; and other articles of interest are "A Memorable Journey in a Chaise," by John Boylston, and "A Famous Vermont Editor of a Hundred Years Ago." In the June number of Harper's Magazine Mr. Howells writes entertainingly of his "First Impressions of Literary New York." His visit to Pfaff's was something of a disappointment at the time, but the description of it now shows that it was worth while. His later meeting with Stedman, Stoddard, and the rest, was more satisfactory. The third number of "Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc" and the seventh of "Hearts Insurgent" appear; while "House-boating in China," by Julian Ralph, "The Grand Prix and Other Prizes," by Richard Harding Davis, "A Familiar Guest," by William Hamilton Gibson, are other articles of especial interest. The short stories of the number are contributed by M. E. M. Davis and Robert C. V. Meyers; while there are poems by Miss Louise Imogene Guiney, Marion Wilcox, and John Vance Cheney.

Literary Notes.

As a special inducement for trial subscriptions, the publishers of Littell's Living Age offer the twenty-six numbers of their magazine forming the first half of the year 1895 (January to June, inclusive) for $3. This magazine has been an exponent of progress in different fields of literature for the last half-century.

The New Galaxy is a new ten-cent magazine, edited and published by Harry C. Jones, 90 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Its prospectus announces, as its claims to attention, that it will include pictures bringing the best art of the world to the homes of the people, good short stories, and trustworthy articles of travel, science, history, or information.

"The Art of a Scene-painter" is the title of an article in the June number of the Monthly Illustrator that is likely to attract attention. It is by Alexandrina Ramsay, and is profusely illustrated by John Rettig, the originator of the great outdoor spectacles visible at summer resorts, national festivals, etc. Stories in the same number are by Barnet Phillips, illustrated from the sketch-books of J. Francis Murphy; by Mary T. Earle, illustrated by Clara S. Hagarty and by Polly King, with travel sketches in pen-and-ink by Henry P. Smith.

Personals.

Rev. John C. Kimball of Ipswich has been lecturing on "The World's Coming Better Social State as indicated by Evolutionary Principles" and "The Marvel of Heredity."

Rev. Dr. Washington Gladden of Columbus, Ohio, has been awarded the $500 prize for the Fletcher prize essay, on the subject, "In What Ways ought the Conception of Personal Life and Duty to be modified?"

The Armenians of Boston presented to Miss Alice Stone Blackwell a unique clock last week, in recognition of her generosity of voice and pen in behalf of that persecuted people. The works of the clock are French, but the whole exterior is copper engraved and decorated by Armenian skill. In responding, she said she hoped some time to hear it strike the hour of Armenia's freedom.

Samuel Staples, who lately died in Concord, Mass., numbered Emerson, Thoreau, Alcott, and Bull (the inventor of the Concord grape) among his friends. He was at one time the town jailer; and he once had Alcott and Thoreau for prisoners,—the former for a few hours, the latter for a night. Alcott's offence was the non-payment of a small tax debt, which he refused on principle. "I never heard a man talk honest," said Mr. Staples.—Independent.

Education.

President Thwing of Western Reserve University is arranging for a summer school of theology, to begin the 1st of July and to continue through the 9th. It will be modelled after the Oxford Summer School of theology of last summer. Among the lecturers will be Principal Fairbairn of Oxford, who was at the head of the Oxford Summer School, and who will lecture every day.

A circular announces the Clark University Summer School to be held in the city of Worcester, Mass., under the direction of Dr. G. Stanley Hall. Outlines of the work which will be followed in pedagogy, psychology, and philosophy are most attractive. Special features will be a study of the best school programmes and syllabi in this and other countries. Child study will be carried on with aggressive interest, and the kindergarten will be given its proper place in connection with this study.

There are nearly two thousand children enrolled in Alaska schools, though there is a school population of from eight to ten thousand. The government contributes about one-third to the support of the schools, and the other two-thirds is provided by the missionary societies. One of the obstacles to the progress of teaching in Alaska is the idea of the northern Eskimo that "to-morrow will be another day," and they make no effort to memorize anything for future use. However, the children seem to have a great desire to know the English language, and study faithfully in the school-room, though they often fail to use what they learn outside; and they are uniformly well-behaved in the school-room.

FILES OF "THE UNITARIAN."

I wish to say to persons desiring to obtain back numbers of the Unitarian in order to complete their sets, that they will need to attend to the matter between now and the 10th of June, or it will be too late. The present publisher, Mr. Geo. H. Ellis, can furnish back numbers since January, 1891, the time when the publication office was removed to Boston. But for the five years previous to that time back numbers can be obtained only from me. Most of the numbers of that period I can furnish; but I shall dispose of all before June 10, after which time it will be impossible for me to give aid to any in completing their early files.

Mr. Podgers: "I see that old hen just come out of the cellar. What has she been doing down there?" Mrs. Podgers: "I guess she's been laying in coal."

A provincial paper concluded an account of a local wedding with the following surprising announcement: "The bridegroom's present to the bride was a handsome diamond brooch, besides many other beautiful things in cut glass."—Youth's Companion.

"What lessons should we learn, Wendell," asked the Sunday-school teacher, "from this story of demoniacal possession?" "One of the lessons we should learn from it," replied the little Boston boy, "is that the word demoniacal is accented on the antepenultimate."

A little girl had a kitten. She was very fond of it, and it was a great delight to her to hear it purr. One night she was restless; and her mother said, "Cynthia, why don't you lie still and go to sleep?" "I can't," answered the little one: "papa purrs so loud."

Texan (at the grocery store): "What do you call them things?" Grocer: "Those are olives." "Are they good to eat?" "Certainly. Try one of them." (Bites into one.) "Jest as I expected. Got a wooden core. Come from Connecticut, don't they?"—Chicago Tribune.

Paul Cooper of Albany (son of James Fenimore Cooper) once admitted, in the glow of after-dinner conversation, that the two holidays he kept were Christmas and the anniversary of the great storm that blew the Pilgrim Fathers off the coast of New York and on to the rock of Plymouth.—Harper's Weekly.

A peripatetic exhibitor of the phonograph in Holland seems determined to outdistance all competitors as regards the excellence of his records. He was exhibiting the machine in the streets of Utrecht, and a number of customers were listening to selections of tunes. Suddenly the tune ceased, and there was a pause. Then in a loud clear tone was heard the one word, "Halt!" delivered in a tone bespeaking authority. "What is that?" asked one of the listeners. "That," was the reply, "is the voice of Napoleon Bonaparte giving an order at the battle of Waterloo!"—London Daily News.

"One day," says an American, "I went into a book-shop in the Strand, and asked for Hare's 'Walks in London.' In America the book is sold in one thick volume. The clerk brought it in two. 'Oh,' I said, as I looked at them, 'you part your 'Hare' in the middle, do you?' 'I, sir?' he said, with a bewildered look. 'Oh, no, sir!' I saw he didn't see the joke, so I didn't explain, but bought the books and went away. A week later I went to the same shop. As soon as the clerk saw me, he rushed from the back of the shop, laughing vociferously. 'Good!' he shouted. 'Capital! Part your 'Hare' in the middle! That's capital, sir, capital!'" Tit-Bits.

PULPITS.

Mr. Baring Gould has a delightful paper in the Sunday Magazine on pulpits, as they appear to an ecclesiastical observer who is far from being blind to the human side of things. He objects to the elaborately carved receptacle, on the ground that it distracts the listener. "Moreover," he says, "the living preacher is made ridiculous, perched among the leaves of the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, or in a cloud hovering over the prostrate Saint Paul." He denounces marble pulpits, also, as "all ugly and unsuitable in our cold northern climate, where the pulpit should be calculated to warm, not to chill." Several entertaining stories are told of unique pulpits. One had a sort of screwjack attachment, worked from the vestry, by which the pulpit floor was raised or lowered to suit the preacher's height. Bishop Wilberforce was the first victim, the clerk screwing up the floor on the occasion of the reopening of the church. The thing would not have been so bad, were it not that the raising process was conducted on the spiral method, and the bishop found himself being spun around during the prayer. "A sense of nausea, of sea-sickness, came over him; and he feared that in another turn his knees would be level with the edge of the pulpit."

Editorial.

DR. MOXOM, in a very brief letter, told his people Sunday before last that he declined the call to the West Presbyterian Church of New York City. According to the Springfield Republican the committee of the church which waited on him practically assured him that he could name his own salary; but he is quoted as saying that they had really shown him no good reason why he should leave Springfield, which clearly shows how much their money offers influenced him.

THE rigidly orthodox are trying to magnetize into new life the "missionary nerve." Rev. H. Vanderwart, in the Christian Intelligencer, says: "We do not hear nowadays as much about the lost, sinful outlook of the nations without God and hope in this world as we used to do. . . . Now, it is very plain to me that we need to return to those old-time views about the lost, terrible condition of heathen nations, as God in his word has described them. Loose views about sin and its results are likely to cut the missionary nerve in many a Christian heart. Sin in a degraded heathen in Asia makes a hell for him just as much as sin in a civilized heathen in America. And Jesus Christ came first to save, and afterward to civilize,—first to redeem, and afterward to reform. If you and I had been less damned, he would not have come. And that is true for the heathen as well as for us."

THE Baptists, at their recent gathering at Saratoga, gave another proof of their loyalty to religious liberty for which they have been distinguished in their history. On the report that in some portions of the United States citizens who have conscientiously observed the seventh day for religious rest and worship, and engaged on the first day in labor which in no way disturbed others, have for this act been arrested, fined, imprisoned, and put upon the chain gang, they passed the following:—

Resolved, That we most solemnly protest against the violation of the right of religious liberty for which our fathers have contended at the cost of imprisonment, and spoiling of their goods, and stripes, and exile, and even of life itself.

DR. PARKHURST and Rev. M. J. Savage have recently treated the very important subject of heart religion. Each speaks in his own dialect. The one emphasized this in his remarks at the Unitarian Festival, and the other in an article issued on the same day by the Independent. What Mr. Savage said on this point will be found in our printed report in the last Christian Register. Dr. Parkhurst, while recognizing the power and place for the intellect in religion, regards "the heart as the organ of insight." Man's first language, he says, is music. Prose is poetry cooled down. Geology tells us that the world began hot, so every thought that has had a history began as a passion. You can manufacture in cold weather, but all creating is done under a high temperature. What is true of thought is just as true of art. Art is enthusiasm become shape. The grand cathedrals are old, petrified pulse-beats. The master paintings—and they are all religious—are holy mediæval passion flung on to the canvas. Art is imitative now, because the thermometer is down. Moses built the tabernacle, and he patterned it from what he caught up in the mount. He thus sums up the whole matter: "In the sphere of truth, in the domain of life, and in the higher ranges of religious discernment and of Christian appreciation and aspiration, pure, calculating intellect is being worked for a great deal more than it is worth. It is heat that makes the world a live world, and not light. It is heart that composes the core of Christianity, and not head. The moving energy in the world's history to-day is not a philosophy, but a cross; and the consummating act by which Christ fitted the Church for its work was not the founding of a college, but the baptism of the Church with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

THE public feeling manifested recently when the Salvation Army dedicated its new building on Fourteenth Street, New York, is a signal instance of the triumph over prejudice by the power of sincere and unselfish devotion to a good cause. When the Salvation Army first came to New York, its members were met with suspicion and contempt from Christians, and by strong opposition on the part of the public. Only a very few at first respected their motives. All this is now changed. As the procession moved along the streets under the boiling heat of the sun, dressed in the various uniforms,—the "slum brigade" in their white aprons, the hallelujah lassies with faces touched with love and pity, though shaded by ugly bonnets,—as this procession moved on, with flags and banners and music, they had the hearty respect and sympathy of the crowd of lookers-on. This was a victory of unselfish devotion; and what makes the case still more marked is the fact that this was not a victory gained over the prejudices of the worst people, but a triumph over the prejudices of the good. Here is one more proof of the power of real love, intense conviction, and self-sacrifice in a noble cause. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."

THE metropolitan character of Chicago is strikingly illustrated by the number and variety of its anniversaries and street processions. These are constantly taking place. One occurred on the first Sunday of June which is typical of others. It was the second anniversary of an Italian society in commemoration of the patron saint who two hundred years ago lost his life in his services to the poor at the time of the plague in the province of Salerno. This celebration was unique and picturesque. The members, about five hundred in number, made up of men, women, and children, marched through the streets in the forenoon to church, with bands playing and flags waving. They were dressed in various costumes, with banners of taste and beauty characteristic of the Italian people. The forenoon was given to worship in the church, the oldest priest in Chicago officiating. Then at noon there was a lunch; and the afternoon was devoted to social festivities, in which the families engaged with hearty joyousness. The evening was spent in literary exercises, in which young and old took part. The day closed with an entertainment. This mingling on Sunday of worship, social enjoyment, and literary culture is suggestive of some of the best uses which can be made of Sunday, when whole families join in prayer, in social enjoyment and mental improvement. It was a gala-day, rich in beautiful symbolism and wholesome in its influences.

THE Chicago Tribune recently sent to all the clergymen of the city the question, "Is cremation a Christian disposition of the dead?" Various replies from ministers of different denominations were printed, some in favor, others not. But in no case were any objections made on Scriptural or doctrinal grounds. Next comes Dean Hodges of the Cambridge Episcopal Theological School, who is reported as declaring "that the dissociation of the idea of preservation from that of resurrection was now complete, and it really made no difference whatever to the dead." From this it would seem that the question of cremation, freed from Scriptural and dogmatical objections, has now a clear field to be discussed and decided on its real merits.

PROF. DRUMMOND, it is rumored, is threatened with a trial for heresy by some of his Presbyterian brethren. It is doubtful whether the trial will take place. If once the work begins, heretics like Prof. Bruce and the author of "The Natural History of the Christian Religion," not to mention other members of the Presbyterian Church in Scotland, must also be taken in hand. If these leaders, who have so broken away from the old opinions of Scriptural authority, plenary inspiration, and supernatural Christianity, were brought to trial, the work of heresy-hunting would prove a very great task. The religious thought of Scotland is making so great progress that no ecclesiastical court can stay the current or turn back the tide.

THE London Christian World, which represents the broadest phase of the English Congregationalists, is both able and courageous. Dr. Martineau and Stopford Brooke preach in its pulpit. But a still more striking illustration of its liberality and loyalty to freedom is given in printing a recent sermon by Rev. R. A. Armstrong, in which he deals with the doctrine that God suffers in the person of Christ. As quoted by the London Inquirer, the Liverpool preacher says: "This mythology of a suffering God, or of a God-Christ who is partner in all the pain that is in the world, is not the solution of the problem of our faith. It is a purely mythological conception, which does not touch the deep verities of spiritual fact. That is not the nature of the love wherewith God so loved the world." With this fact in mind, we are also prepared to find from our English contemporary the following dissent from the remark of Rev. Hugh Price Hughes that orthodox Christians who believe that Christ is God cannot kneel in prayer or unite in common work with Unitarians:—

If that feeling is at all a common Nonconformist feeling, then, surely, Nonconformists should cease protesting against Anglican or Romanist narrowness and intolerance. The Nonconformist who cannot pray in company with Dr. Martineau and Dr. Stopford Brooke, or who cannot unite in promoting social reforms with Rev. R. A. Armstrong of Liverpool, is still far from the catholicity of Christ.

EIGHT YEARS OF GROWTH.

We should like to direct special attention to the address of the retiring president of the Unitarian Association, Hon. George S. Hale, which was printed in last week's Register. His review of the eight years during which he held this office and his statement of the gains won during that period furnish a showing in which we are entitled to take much satisfaction. The people who think Unitarianism ought to die have so long and so persistently proclaimed its declining state that Unitarians themselves are sometimes found wondering how much longer the movement can last. It appears that at every point, so far as statistics can be made a test, there are signs of a rapidly increasing life. This is not guesswork or pretence, but a fact as solid as any to be gleaned from census reports. It is evidence of enterprise and zeal of no inferior kind that in eight years so small an organization has been able to add ninety active and efficient churches to its list.

These signs of material prosperity are not to be despised. Perhaps in some dim and distant future it may be necessary to warn Unitarians against an exaggerated estimate of the importance of their ecclesiastical machine; but the plain fact is that, thus far, they do not half appreciate the value of their religious organization. A movement, as Mr. Fenn said in his address, implies something that moves; and, to maintain progress, there is needed a large body of common thought and experience. If Mr. Kidd's book has taught us nothing else, it has at least shown us how social life gathers up and conserves the gains that are won by gifted individuals. People do not get far in any direction unless they march together; and Unitarians, evidently, are beginning to have a better appreciation of this truth.

Moreover, it requires a somewhat exceptional faith to go on indefinitely sowing seed that takes no root. In the face of such discouragement one must begin to ask himself after a time whether that seed can be alive. It is a help to us in our labors to see that the world wants and can use the message we bring to it. We ourselves look more hopefully for its deeper meanings and implications when we find that others hail it with joy, as a word they have longed to hear. When, as missionaries, we have preached the good news to hearts which it has really quickened and thrilled, we are ourselves put under the heaviest of all bonds, and we are conscious of one of the strongest incentives we can feel, to make that gospel real and true in our own living experience. Therefore, the evidence that we can now build churches faster than ever before, and that our faith will take root in the minds of men more than was formerly the case, though it gives us no occasion to boast, does bring to us a spiritual help which we should be ungrateful not to recognize.

We have sometimes comforted ourselves with the thought that, though we are not in direct contact with a very large portion of the American people, to work upon their minds for good, we are helping other religious bodies to a better understanding of the vital truths of Christianity; and acknowledgments come to us now and then, to convince us that this hope is not utterly vain. At the same time that sacerdotalism which we do not like has perhaps held, in recent years, no more effective weapon to threaten and repress the growth of broader ideas than its assertion, often repeated, of the fatal organic weakness of the Unitarian body. "You see what you are tending toward," it has been said, "and what mischief you are certain to do, in proportion as you go that way."

If we desire to aid and comfort those who are fighting the battle of what we take to be the higher thought in other denominations, we cannot do better than to disprove that charge. Entertaining no expectation that these liberals of other folds desire to be or are to become Unitarians, we have a duty to deprive their antagonists of all pretexts for the accusation that liberalism means Unitarianism, and Unitarianism means death to organized Christianity.

We have taken a long step forward during the eight years reviewed in Mr. Hale's address, though we know perfectly well that we have accomplished only a little portion of what we might have done. Let us hope and resolve that, when the next occasion comes to sum up the results of a period of years, we shall be able to face the record with a less uneasy consciousness of wasted opportunities and resources only half employed.

ART AND MORALS.

Rousseau believed in the inherent virtues of the child of nature, unperverted by civilization and the arts. It was a baseless dream, woven of ignorance, poetry, and fiction. The savagery of the wild man was seen through the wrong end of the telescope, and the cult of which Rousseau was the founder swam in a haze of misconception and error.

Art is educative, stimulative to refinement and culture; but in this age of the world we begin to question its moral bearings on grounds other than those raised by the great Genevan. At first purely religious and springing up as an indispensable part of polytheism, it lost its early significance when a multitude of gods and a devout belief in anthropomorphism were gradually outgrown, and when it was forced to strive for existence for its own sake. The Jewish conception of God as a spirit inconceivable in form spread over the world with a blighting effect to the imagination. But Christianity at last overcame the difficulty. It grafted many genial pagan ideas upon its own body; and art sprang again into being, flourished lustily, and flowered in the splendid achievements of the great painters and sculptors and architects of the Latin races. But, though of unrivalled power and beauty, it was comparatively a short wave. A little more than a hundred years saw its rise, culmination, and decay. It was a flower that left no seed, and we know not whether it will ever again spring forth.

It would appear strange to say that art may be religious and yet unmoral, although such would seem to be a statement not far amiss from the truth. Art has the power of stimulating the devotional sentiment, of arousing religious aspiration in natures unawake to moral sanctions. The Italian bandit or murderer will pray in ecstasy before a beautiful picture of the virgin, and then go cheerfully abroad to ply his trade. It is the sensuous side of religion, something to gloat upon with the eye in color and outline, something whereon an unreflecting soul can find a passionate support. The artistic nations, if no worse than the inartistic nations, are certainly no better. Their art instinct seems to lie largely in the fact that the primitive impulse toward wonder and admiration have not been educated out of them. They still have the child heart that beats with ardor at the sight of beauty. They admire and enjoy more; but it cannot be said that they are more upright, more honest, more trustworthy, because of this admiration. Here is the crux of the whole matter. We may say that the illiterate Italian or Spaniard, who recognizes at once a good bit of painting or carving when he sees it, though he does not know his letters, is unequally developed; but with development the art instinct might die. We forget the influence of race that refuses to develop save on certain lines. Sensibility to art is given to certain peoples, as keen eyesight and hearing are given to savages. It is a natural aptitude.

Though the uneducated lover of the arts be not consciously better for his power of discrimination, his fine sense of pleasure in color, line, and proportion, he is perhaps happier; and we may say because he is happy he is more virtuous. In the higher ranges of feeling happiness undoubtedly is the ally of goodness. In the lower who shall affirm it? The kind and quality of happiness must be set forth. Low animal enjoyment is not incompatible with intense cruelty and selfishness. Evidently, the influence of art escapes definition. Like nature, it refuses to be put into harness to drag a formula. It laughs at mete and bound. We can hardly tell what it does for us. We know it does something delightful,—that we should be infinitely poorer without its help.

A few great suggestive works of art may make us consciously better by raising our emotions to the height of prayer. The noblest cathedrals have this power. Subtly we see how the religious sentiment has taken form in them, has wrought itself into grand expression, has diffused itself like light, odor, and atmosphere. We cannot think of such places without being assailed by the emotions they at first drew forth. The reality of spiritual things is brought home to us. We believe it is impossible to divorce religion from morals. They are varying degrees of the same principle, religion being morality set free, raised to the highest power by devotion and self-abnegation, morality being religion brought down to practical things, made to subsist in law and to toil in shackles. The rightness of the universe and the uprightness of God are in both. Joy and freedom and self-surrender make the difference.

It is impossible to believe that such works as those of Michel Angelo, a Raphael in the Vatican, such buildings as the Grecian Parthenon and the Roman Pantheon, can be other than moral in their influence, they are so supremely right. But it is a form of morality so high we cannot prison it in phrases. It is the odor of the violet, the bloom on the peach, the overplus of beneficence that has no proper word. In its suggestions, therefore, art must be entwined with the deep heart of morality,—creative, not formal rightness. In its indirect bearing, its temperance and restraint, its instruction in the just mean, the refinement it brings to minds in turning them from grossness and excess, teaching them something of the secret of God in his art of fashioning the world, it makes for growth on the side of a fine balance of powers.

It has no precepts to impart to charity scholars. It sends no tracts to the heathen. It does not openly rebuke drunkards or blasphemers, but its silent rebuke is greater than cut and dried lessons. It says with silent scorn: "You are none of me. You cannot enter my heaven or partake of my ideal delight. You can but know me in perverted and debased forms." The art deity, we may be sure, shows itself only in its perfection to the pure in heart. If the nature is lowered, the art will be lowered. If the artist degrades himself, his degradation shall be written in the coarsening and profanation of his work. The moral part of art is that it exacts from its devotee the highest ideals. Its appreciators, too, must have in them some touch of that lofty conception. If they miss the soul and grasp only the sense, the most glorious production is to them an untranslatable riddle. These are exactions too subtle to be apprehended; they are only to be felt.

The art lover must come into this presence prepared to look beneath the surface to find something that escapes little formal precepts and the small measurements of the tape line. Acres of canvas, tons of bronze and marble, however cunningly colored and wrought, are meaningless to us unless they awake in us a glance that goes clear through the medium, and sees even the half-conscious suggestion that impelled the artist, the something in him that painted and chiselled better than he knew. The divine mind must be in it, the creative Power that works in stars and in the smallest atoms. The divine suggestiveness is everywhere awaiting a brain, a heart, an eye, a hand. Set up a great statue in the public square, and hundreds of careless people will pass it by unresponsively. But by and by one will come who will gaze, will be smitten with love and wonder. His whole life will be changed, as was Michel Angelo's when he discovered the antique. New desires will awake in him. He will find the power of self-expression, and priceless treasures of art will be given to the world.

We are uneasy about beauty because we fear it is not moral, not quite proper to stir the love of descendants of the Puritans. But God evidently has no conscience on this head. He revels in beauty, and we may let it sink into us as the summer rain sinks into the mellow soil. Were we wiser, we might discover that not a gleam of it is without spiritual significance or non-essential to the moral education of man.

THE PRACTICE OF CREMATION.

When Socrates was asked whether he wished to be burned or to be buried after death, he replied that he did not care, provided they did not think they were burying or burning Socrates. When the men and women of the present century as completely dissociate the real personality of their friends from the body that has enshrined them during life, they will be more ready to study with calmness and patience the best method of caring for the dead.

In many countries in early ages, and in Eastern lands up to the present time, the practice of cremation of the dead has been observed. Even in Rome, down to the fourth century, cremation was the method usually adopted; and it was common in Greece, except for suicides and babies. The belief in a literal resurrection of the body seems to have been the chief reason for embalming the dead and for earth burials. But now that that belief has faded from the thoughts of reasonable people, it is only natural that the method of caring for the myriads who pass out of life should be studied anew. Whatever form is adopted, it must be reverent and tender, and one which also is best for those who are still alive or who are to live in years to come.

It is barely twenty-one years since this great reform was fairly inaugurated. It found its first strong advocates in England in 1874. Not long afterward an attempt was made in Boston to found a cremation society here. It was almost impossible to find any reputable physicians who were willing to lend their names to such a project; and hardly a clergyman, save here and there a Unitarian minister, was willing to be counted in the ranks of those who favored cremation. What are the facts to-day? In England there is a large crematory at Woking, and another at Manchester. In the two together more than six hundred bodies have been cremated. Italy has many crematories; Germany, several; and Austria, Switzerland, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland all have them in active operation. During the last five years there have been cremated in Paris alone between fifteen and sixteen thousand bodies. In Buenos Ayres the incineration of the bodies of persons who have died by infectious diseases is decreed by the government. In this country several large cities have made arrangements for this way of disposing of the dead; and in Boston, where the public was so uninterested a few years ago, there is now an active society, largely made up of the best physicians, clergymen of all denominations, and thoughtful and influential people. The first body to be reduced to ashes here was that of Lucy Stone; and the last was of that noble man, Henry Martyn Scudder, who from his experience in India must long ago have been convinced that burning the dead was kindness to the living.

It is held by many that in this country, where there is such ample space for burying-grounds, no danger can come to the living by the inhumation of the dead. But every year cities and villages encroach more and more on burial-places; and the dangers, though invisible, are none the less there. It has been proved, says Dr. Cameron, that many microscopic organisms which give rise to disease "naturally multiply themselves in earth, under suitable conditions of moisture and temperature, or that their germs, when buried in earth, retain their vitality for many years, and brought to the surface, either by the spade or earthworms, or placed in conditions in which they can mingle with the air we breathe or the water we drink, can once more enter the animal system, and renew the cycle of their pestilential existence." This is true of the organisms that produce cholera and yellow fever, and it may be as true of diphtheria and other infectious diseases. On this ground public opinion is rapidly growing in favor of cremation. Many of those who at first considered it revolting are ready to see the possible advantage in it to humanity. It is also beginning to be seen that the sentimental as well as the sanitary argument is in favor of cremation. It is as Sir Spencer Wells says, "purification versus putrefaction."

It needs hardly to be said that in the process no flame or smoke is allowed to touch or disfigure the form which, after all, is so dear to those who are left to mourn. By a swift and absolutely purificative process heat is applied in such a way that in a little more than an hour all that was mortal is reduced to a handful of beautiful pearly ashes, unmixed with any impurity,—a process that can only be called sweet and tender as compared with the revolting process that goes on beneath the turf, when left to the slower methods of nature. An English writer, Rev. R. Ussher, says truly, "The fire does not destroy, but purifies, and does quickly, decently, and safely what the earth does slowly, offensively, and dangerously. . . . If it had happened that cremation had been the manner hitherto of disposing of the dead, and that burial was proposed to be adopted instead, I am sure the whole world would stand aghast and appalled at such a terrible proposition."

This method has everything, then, to commend it, including a lessening of funeral expense and show, and little against it except a slowly dying prejudice.

Musings.

THERE is some satisfaction and some compensation in being born into the world late. Metaphorically, we do not live as long as Methuselah; but, potentially, and no doubt actually, we live a great deal longer. A man of to-day can accomplish more in a thousand days than Methuselah could in a thousand years, though statistics show that the average of human life is longer than it used to be when men and women drew too much on their imagination for their vital statistics. So Methuselah would have lived longer if he had not been born so early. Columbus, if he had been patient and waited about four hundred years later, might have crossed the ocean in five days and eight hours and thirty-eight minutes, in a vessel several times larger than his whole fleet, and, instead of depending on the fickle breezes, might have had the equivalent of twenty thousand horses day and night to drag him over. But Columbus, I suspect, was one of those men who would rather be a pioneer than march with the rear-guard over a well-beaten track. He had a vision of a new world rather than of a new age; and I wonder if his imagination ever pictured anything in the way of Atlantic transportation which could compare with the immense capacity, elegance, speed, power, and comfort of an Atlantic greyhound. Well, we have the new world, and we have the new age. We have not exhausted the capacities of either. The new age has been needed to develop the new world; and what is most needed now is not so much new areas of mechanical invention as the new age of love and peace and brotherhood. Thank Heaven that, if we have the inventor and the explorer, we have also the prophet, who holds before us the vision of a new order of society and a new benediction of righteousness, love, and truth.

THE expression "all at sea" to a land-lubber may be a synonyme of mental confusion, helplessness, and ignorance; but to a first-class captain, with chart and compass and sextant, it means knowing just where he is, just where he wants to go, and just how to get there. And thus this "trackless deep" is by no means trackless. The ocean steamers mark out their own pathways, and follow them with almost as much precision as if there were a fence on each side and the familiar sign, "Keep off the grass." At this time of year the Cunard vessels take the southern track, to avoid icebergs; and so we add from ninety to a hundred miles to our journey, for the sake of shunning these crystal ships. On my last trip home, coming from Iceland to Quebec, we saw one day in the straits of Belle Isle forty-five icebergs,—some of them of curious and picturesque architecture, a little frigid in style, but shining with resplendent brilliancy in the summer sun. But icebergs on this trip are not cruising near us, and we have not advertised for them. The only ice we see is in our tumblers, or in the cold, passive demeanor of some of the passengers. Some people freeze up and others thaw out on a sea voyage. Our table steward has, however, an iceberg story for us. He tells of seeing one with a polar bear on it floating slowly to the south. Used to hibernating, the animal might subsist a long time without food; but what will happen when his bed melts but an unaccustomed feast for the southern fishes? I have tried to extract from the steward some more blood-curdling story, but in vain. He apparently would not do for a modern newspaper reporter, because he simply transmits mythology: he does not invent it. The modern reporter has an insatiable appetite for the marvellous and a great power of producing it. I suppose that a thousand pounds more of yarn a day can be fabricated by certain modern newspapers than by any other story-twisting machine ever invented. This is not a materialistic and prosaic age: it is an age of invention and of imagination. I believe that more mythology is invented to-day than the Greeks or Romans dreamed of, but much of it is not so religious nor so beautiful.

THE Atlantic liner will not be complete until a newspaper is published on board every day. Think of a village of seventeen hundred people without a newspaper! What a state of backwardness it represents! The time will come, I imagine, when every great vessel forming a part of the Atlantic ferry will maintain daily or constant communication with the port from which it sails, and perhaps with that to which it goes. And this will not be done by reeling a wire out of the stern, as the "Great Eastern" did when she laid the cable, but by communication through the air, water, or ether. Then we shall not be five days on the Atlantic without knowing of the latest political pull, or the result of the last horse race or prize fight, of the most horrible murder, or of other things which make papers interesting and indispensable. But, without waiting for the consummation of this possibility, I am sure that a very readable daily journal might be published on the "Lucania" from such material as we could gather within the diurnal horizon of our sight, hearing, or experience. The opportunity of the reporter, interviewer, or society itemizer would be almost unparalleled in any equal number of people gathered in the same space on land. It is as true on a great ocean steamer as it is in a great city that one-half of the floating world does not know how the other half lives. The first-cabin passengers know nothing of the steerage slums; and the steerage know nothing of the first cabin, save that on Sunday they may go there to church on most steamers, though this privilege is denied them on others. And neither the cabin passengers nor the steerage know anything of the world far below, where burns unquenchable fire, and where the faithful stokers are shovelling a ton of coal every three minutes into the furnaces. News and descriptions brought from these different strata of society would furnish interesting reading for each of them. The harvest of the interviewer and the biographer would be great. There are men on board who, when they crossed the ocean twenty-five or thirty years ago, had only a few dollars in their pockets. Now they return to Europe worth thousands. The story of how they made that money and what use they have made of it would be an interesting tale. There are men of brain and power who have won intellectual and professional victories, and then there is the never-ending web of romance which has been woven in many bright colors; and the weaving is still going on, as you may see, if you watch the elective affinities on the upper or the lower deck.

The itemizer would have the endless privilege of seasoning the sheet with "social" and "personal" condiments, innocent or inane, interesting and intelligent, but not malevolent. The "Sparks from the Furnace" of the Daily Lucanian would contain such items as the following:—

"Judge Morris of the United States District Court, Baltimore, is one of our most genial passengers. He expects to meet his daughter in Liverpool and travel in England."

"One of the most interesting and popular persons on board is Capt. Daily, the professional swimmer and lecturer on the art of saving and restoring life in drowning accidents. He has saved the lives of thirty-eight persons, and bears a medal from the United States government. He is an excellent raconteur, and is now a successful stage manager in an American theatrical company. No one knows just how old Capt. Daily is; but every one, especially the children and the ladies, know how young he is."

"A concert was held in the second cabin last night." (Then follow the programme and a long critique of the performance.)

"At the first cabin concert the second cabin talent was of the first class."

"The smartest dress at the first cabin soirée was worn by Miss Fitmecute."

"Sharp-toed boots are the rage on the upper deck."

"Officer Hamilton seems to find great pleasure in the society of two very clever English young ladies."

"Religious services have been held in Swedish and English nearly every day in the steerage. The first cabinians get enough on Sunday to last them the voyage."

"The most talkative man in the second is a Chicago man, and the next best is an English sporting man."

"There is an ad libitum cadenza of babies on the second cabin score."

"The doctor is to be congratulated on not being obliged to take his own medicine. The health of the vessel is first class."

"Rev. W. B. Cliff of Akron, N. Y., with two young friends, will make a tour of England. Though he has worked among the Indians, they have never scalped him; and, so long as he is with us, we always have land on board."

But perhaps the most exciting item in the Daily Lucanian would be the extra issued this Friday morning, May 24:—

"A Record-breaking Trip.—Our noble ship broke once more her own record by making the fastest time yet made on the eastward trip on the southern track.—New York to Queenstown in 5 days, 11 hours, and 40 minutes! Land was seen this Friday morning at 3.30 o'clock, and Queenstown passengers were landed at 7. The speed of the vessel has averaged very nearly 23 knots."

We shall reach Liverpool to-night. Then good-by, sea-gulls, with your white flapping wings; good-by, smiling stewards and friendly tars; good-by, room-mates and fellow-passengers; good-by, grand old ocean, till we meet again!

Britities.

Now, "if ever, come perfect days."

On another page will be found the epistles of the modern saints, messages from the aged but faithful disciples of the liberal faith, which were necessarily omitted last week.

It is not too late to echo the opinion of the Outlook that the report of Secretary Batchelor is "admirably written, and is a clear and full statement of the work of the Unitarian Association."

Dr. Donald's baccalaureate sermon before the Tuskegee (Ala.) School may have hurt the pride of some of the thoughtless; but his words, though frank, were kindly and wise. Faithful are the wounds of a friend.

Sunday-schools, church clubs, and guilds are now laying out plans for the next year's work. To any wishing to study the works of Emerson the programme prepared by the Church of the Disciples may be heartily commended.

A Presbyterian exchange rejoices in Prof. Patton's prophecy that the outcome of Biblical criticism "will be the triumph of plenary inspiration," and utters a semi-prophecy itself that doctrinal preaching will become popular before long.

An Oriental writer says that "a good audience is a superior metal: it is gold, for silence is gold. A speaker is an inferior metal. Call him silver or copper, as you find him." Unhappily, one too often finds him lead.

Rev. William H. Noyes of Japan calls for a discussion of vegetarianism in the Outlook, the columns of which are opened for that purpose by the editor, who grants vegetarians the advantage in name at least, for "flesh-eater" is certainly not a pretty appellation." Other advantages will be found without prolonged search.

Some of the California papers are demonstrating the great value of raisins as food, and expressing the hope that their cheap and abundant production in this country will make it possible for people to use them freely for this purpose. Certainly, it would be for the health of the nation to use the same amount of grapes as raisins rather than as wine.

The sympathy of all hearts must go out to the many who are mourning the loss of the one hundred and eighty persons who perished in the wreck of the "Colima." Who can fathom the depth of sorrow into which such families as the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Harold Whiting, for instance, must be plunged! Father, mother, four children, and a servant, all gone! No trace of them left! An entire home circle blotted out of existence. And that was but one group of many.

A writer in a Calcutta paper betrays an innocence of ice-cream and frozen sherbets that would amuse a Yankee child. He has made the grand discovery of a freezer. He says: "We were interested to find that the machine was charged with proportional quantities of ice and salt, and a bottle of lemonade was poured into the trough. The handle was turned by a little boy, with the result that frozen lemonade, which we had never seen before, was poured into a plate. We also had the pleasure of tasting the frozen lemonade, and found it excellently delicious."

The celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Roxbury Latin School on Wednesday, June 19, promises to be very interesting. This school, it will be remembered, runs back to the apostle Eliot, who took a very active interest in it; and, though it now has no further connection with the First Religious Society of Roxbury than is implied in the fact that the pastor of that church and the two senior deacons are ex-officio members of the board of trustees, it has always been effectively and affectionately fraternized by the families of that parish. Rev. Mr. De Normandie is president of the trustees, and will preside at the public exercises, which will begin at two o'clock in a tent in the school campus. The leading address will be given by Rev. Percy Grant of New York, an alumnus; the poem by Rev. Theodore C. Williams, also an alumnus; and addresses are promised by President Eliot, Dr. Hale, Dr. Merrill of the Boston Latin School, Mr. Collar, the head master, and others. Music will be furnished by an excellent orchestra, composed of boys in the school. The graduates will have a dinner at the Vendome in the evening.

PAGANISM.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The Massachusetts Convention of Congregational Ministers held its two hundred and fourteenth annual meeting in Boston on Wednesday and Thursday. It was this meeting of the ministers which gave rise to the custom which has fixed on that week so many of the annual meetings of charitable and philanthropic societies. As your readers know, the convention has occupied itself now for two or three years in considerations of the social dangers which come in upon our people from the gradual moral decay, if one may so speak, in the extreme outskirts of the smaller towns of the country. We hear the same complaint from the West and from the East.

In the last official report of crime in Massachusetts it appears that in ten years there have been in the courts of the State thirty-three convictions for homicide, making an average of three and one-third for every year. It is very suggestive and very important that twenty of these thirty-three convictions were in the four Western counties of the State. The population of these counties is hardly one-sixth of that of the State, and yet they furnish nearly two-thirds of the convictions for murder or manslaughter.

It is the testimony of the most intelligent officers of the county prisons that the convicts who come to them are persons from these little outskirts, who have not been under the benevolent pressure of the public opinion of the central villages.

The report which was sent you last week was read to the convention at its meeting on Thursday, and elicited a very lively and interesting discussion. Without attempting to go into the detail of this discussion, I may say that some points may be regarded as made out. First, there is a gradual tendency in the Massachusetts towns to give up the outlying schools in the small districts. In place of these schools the town provides a central school and free daily transportation backward and forward for the children. It was the general verdict that this arrangement is a civilizing one: it brings children who might otherwise be outcasts, in a way, into close communication with other children. It is thought to improve their advantages for education; and, wherever the town authorities are careful in enforcing our strict truancy law, and in compelling parents to send children of the proper age to school, it is thought that here is a check to the growing "paganism" of the outer districts.

The convention voted its unanimous approval to the plan suggested in the report. This plan proposes that, as soon as possible, the minister of the "first church" in each town shall call a meeting of all the clergy of the town, Catholic and Protestant, and that they shall devise some system of house-to-house visiting—by the clergy themselves, if possible—which may result in what may be called a moral census of the town. It proposes that in Thanksgiving week the clergy shall meet again, and that the results obtained in this survey shall be brought together in such form that action can be taken for the future. Possibly, a good subject for the union meeting on Thanksgiving Day of the members of our churches might be the duties which they have toward those who are prevented by distance or by other reasons from attending on any church.

The conversation and discussion brought out many suggestions, encouraging and discouraging, as to the condition of those districts of which the population is decreasing. The same committee was appointed to continue its work in the next year. In their report of next year they will have to consider the condition of Boston and some of the other large cities. It was stated by every one who spoke on the subject that what was called the "moral police" of the cities is much better than that of the smallest rural towns. For instance, there seems to be no doubt that in Boston, among Catholics and Protestants both, at least 95 per cent. of the children are connected with one and another Sunday-school. The arrangements of the local churches are so good that a watchful care is extended over each family. In a very curious and valuable report presented by Mr. Barton of the active Shawmut Church in this city, he said that their visitors found that in 52 per cent. of the cases which could really be called cases of the "unchurched" the "unchurched" were not found, upon a second visit made within six months, at the same home. That is to say, in more than half the cases where people had not connected themselves with any religious organization they were mere birds of passage, and had passed to some other home before they could be seen a second time.

Such discussions at our ministerial meetings are of the greatest value. In this instance the discussion was even the more practical, because the Good Citizenship Society is interesting itself in the same topic, and gave a recent evening to a very valuable symposium on it. On that occasion we had the testimony of experts as to the work of the public-school system, the work of the public library, the work of the church, and the work of the home missionary organizations, in meeting the need and the danger.

DARKNESS.

BY N. L. O. S.

The night is closing round, and in the west
The golden glory softly fades away;
The earth in palest tints of light is drest
With loving, lingering touch of dying day.

O Hope, which I have sought in vain so long,
Where shineth out thy star of beauty bright?
O Love, which soars on giant pinions, strong,
Where art thou hiding in the starry night?

O Peace, which falleth like the blessed rain,
Where art thou gone to pour thy incense rare?
And Joy has followed in the fleeting train,
And naught remains save darkness and despair.

Then whispered to my tortured, weary heart
A voice of sweetness, low, exceeding mild:
"Thou seekest boundless gifts: all these are part Of that fair heaven awaiting thee, my child."

Close not thine eyes in earthly dark to grope,
Look up unto celestial heights above!
Pray Joy for Faith: Faith bringeth then sweet Hope,
Hope bringeth Joy and Peace; and God is Love.

THE WAY TO CIVILIZE INDIANS.

BY CAPT. R. H. PRATT.

The central principles of Carlisle are:—
First.—The best way to get civilization into the savage is to get the savage into civilization.

Second.—Self-help is the best of all help.

Third.—America can do for the Indian exactly what it does for all other races, including the Negro, but only by giving him the same chances.

"The Outing System of Carlisle," based on these principles, is the placing of its students among our people, in our families, and in our homes, and in our public and other schools. Carlisle is nearly sixteen years old. It has had under its care, from upward of sixty different tribes, more than 2,600 different students,—some for very short periods, others for ten years. The average has been less than five years. Its graduating point is the grammar grade of the public schools.

Every spring, from the beginning, Carlisle has placed as many of its students out in families and homes for the summer as it could spare. And in the autumn its agents have visited these homes; and, if conditions are favorable, the students are left out during the winter to attend our public schools, working out of school hours for their keep. These are also visited during the winter. From sixteen so out during 1880 we have come to give outing experiences to above five hundred each year. When they work all the time, they are paid such wages as they deserve. The money earned belongs to them, and they are taught to save.

Our total outings to date number 4,193. The aggregate earnings of the students per year have come to be from $23,000 to $25,000. There has been a steady and increasing demand for students, and now two to three times as many are asked for yearly as we can supply. Our growth in this direction is hindered only by reservation and home school methods.

The last year I proposed to the department and Congress to double the number of children we are caring for, and to do it almost entirely through the outing system, thus vastly decreasing the per capita cost, and making the real gain to the Indian youth many times greater than can possibly be made at any Indian school.

Mere book knowledge is not by any means the vital need of the Indian. Neither are the necessities of his civilization and progress met by adding a school theory of some industry. The great vital principle of his need to-day is the courage of civilization; and that courage is not to be gained theoretically on the reservation, in the tribe, or in any Indian school. Living in civilization and becoming a very part of it, holding the plough by the side of the civilized ploughman, attending school and being in classes with the boys and girls of civilization, are the experiences necessary to make a courageous, self-supporting, independent, civilized man and citizen out of the Indian,—just as they are necessary to accomplish the same thing for all other un-Americanized men.

The school may easily be, and really is now, utilized to educate into greater tribal solidarity; for the school is sure to do just that when it is purely Indian. And when, in addition to being purely Indian, it is purely reservation and tribal, it becomes absolutely a first-class Cahensleyizing, tribalizing institution.

Our good friend Senator Dawes, now a commissioner to get the five so-called civilized tribes of the Indian Territory to become a part of the United States, is contending with five separate and distinct masses of people, who, through tribal, school, and missionary influences, have been built out of instead of into the United States. Notwithstanding most of their people speak English, they have become solidified into such separate and distinct communities as to assume and call themselves "the Cherokee Nation," "the Choctaw Nation," "the Chickasaw Nation," "the Seminole Nation," "the Creek Nation," each having its own form of government, separate and distinct from every other, and separate and distinct from the United States. They have been made stronger to hold out against unification with the United States by the very education they have received. Unfortunately, for both the Indians and the government, the trend of all missionary work among the Indians is along these lines. Missionaries, to meet their churches' demands, must create communities of adherents, who must hang together and be ready to stand up and be counted as so many sheaves. This builds tribal cohesion, as against individual opportunity. The individual gain to the young Indian through these outing experiences is inestimable. His fear of civilization and its competitions leave him. He makes lasting friends with the civilized young people about him, with whom he corresponds for years after, it may be. He gets the wisdom of the civilized sages whom he meets. All his surroundings and experiences rapidly develop in him the language, the habits, the thought of civilization, and these soon crowd out the habits and superstitions of his tribal life.

The happy experiences I have had in this feature of my work have given me the courage for many struggles and difficulties along other lines. The wonderful progress I see, and the gratitude I get from my pupils for having secured such opportunities for them, are almost incredible. I could more than fill your paper every week with letters very like the following:—

(From a Young Nomad from the Indian Territory.)

CAPT. R. H. PRATT:

Dear School Father,—I will write and tell you how I like my country home this year. I like my place very much. These folks are very nice to me every day. I like Mr. W. K. G. very much, and he is very kind man. Good fellow to work for him; and also Mrs., too. Every day I trying to use myself best. I am very glad of it. Your give me a lovely home this spring. Every since I came to this place I think of the difference places which I have been. I never did find a place like this; and I thank you very much, Captain.

I hope you be glad to hear from me. Mr. W. K. G. give me very teams to work with it. I like my teams very much because very horses. This is all for to-day. I must close now.

From your school son,

—, Pa.

(From the Daughter of an Apache Chief.)

Dear School Father,—I will now write a few lines to you this morning. Will you please tell me how much money I have at Carlisle? I want to send some money, so I can have at least twenty dollars in the bank.

I had $11 befor I got new shoes, which cost $2; and I do not know how much I had to pay for my ticket.

I do not want to send all the money I have, because I might need some little things when I go to school; and I will want some at Christmas time.

Mrs. F. is going to send me to school the last part of this month. I will be so glad to go, and am going to study hard, too.

I just had a nice visit from J., who came one week ago yesterday and stayed until Tuesday afternoon. Mr. F. let me have the horse and buggy to go meet her all by myself. Albert went with me when I took her to the train to go home. I was so glad to have her, and was lonely when she was gone. So Mrs. F. and the children and myself went after chestnuts, but we did not find very many.

I just finish writing to my father. I am just as happy as can be, although I did not come back to school; but I will try to do my best to learn all I can this winter. Our S. School closed last month. I did not missed any, so I got a nice little Bible. As you know, Miss L. will be our S. School teacher for this winter. I would not stay here if it was not for Mrs. F. She's so good and kind to me, that made me want to stay with her. She calls me her oldest daughter.

With much love,
respectfully,

—, Pa.

I hope what I have said may not lead to the necessity of my sending negative answers to applicants who may read this, and make up their minds they want a young Indian. Remember I said in the start I have several times as many applicants as I can accommodate. It is not places that I need now, but Indians.

Let me suggest that every influence is golden that can be brought to bear upon Congress, the Department, the Indian agents, the home schools, and other tribalizing influences, to lead them into allowing the Indians to utilize the opportunities that are opening for them to enter civilized life.

The calamity to the individual Indian in these later years has been the scheme so lauded a few years ago of "a public school system among the Indians," and the great increase therefrom of educational appropriations in that direction by Congress.

If we secure that which will really end the problem, it now becomes necessary to destroy the material creations and the influences of this most un-American scheme, hard though it may be to make the leech let go so long as there is blood.

THE ENGLISH LAKE COUNTRY.

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

Not the serenity of the Atlantic nor the soft blarney of the Irish Sea, which was as smooth in its blandishments as an oily-tongued politician, could induce me to stay on the great salty wastes a moment longer than necessary.

"Have you any spirits or tobacco?" said the Liverpool custom-house officer, as our trunks were ranged alphabetically before him.

"No," we answered, with a temperance-pledge smile, a dry, prohibitory negative, which was so convincing that he stamped the trunks without examining them. Then, turning to Coriander,—

"Madam, have you any Florida Water?"

What is it that makes Florida Water so dangerous in a free-trade country like England? Is it that it contains the germs of undeveloped alligators, the spores of secession, the liquefied essence of malaria, or the bottled secret of perpetual youth which Ponce de Leon craved? It was not Florida Water that we brought or that we wanted, but the fresh, clear, cool waters held in the mountain bowls of the English lakes. So Coriander smiled an audible "No!" and the inquisition of the custom-house was over at half-past eleven Friday night in Liverpool. Then we rode up Tithebarne Street to our hotel, sank into our beds, and gave thanks that we were no longer rocked in the cradle of the deep.

A single night in Liverpool, and the next morning we were rushing north to Penrith and Keswick. A four hours' journey, and we find ourselves ushered into this delightful park in the north-west of England, which nature, art, and literature have all combined to make beautiful and famous.

Saturday, May 18, at two o'clock, we were just leaving Sandy Hook. Saturday, May 25, at two o'clock, English time,—about nine o'clock in New York,—we are three thousand miles away on the shores of Derwentwater, one of the most beautiful of all the crystal lakes that sparkle in the mountains. Aladdin, with his wonderful lamp, might have produced a more wonderful transformation in the same time and in the same space; but, doubtless, he never did.

Oh, the rest and peace and exquisite beauty of these classic hills and vales! No perpetual earthquake under your feet, like the perpetual shiquake made by the interminable rivalry of the twin screws; no rolling and pitching of your bedroom when you rise in the morning or go to bed at night; no tottering and swaggering across the deck; no pool-playing based on a guess how far your floating hotel will be to-day from where it was yesterday; no fear of leaving your window open at night, lest some wave shall deluge you before morning; no helter-skelter horde of tourists crowding down the companion-way to dinner; no showers of cinders, as if Vesuvius were belching forth through the smoke-stack; no vasty deep without a sprig of green. Presto! All has changed. The sea has gone, and we can well spare it. These fresh, peaceful lakes are more Sabbatical. And, instead of being quartered in a small section of the ark, we are delightfully settled in one of the snugest and most comfortable of the lake district hotels,—the Derwentwater, Portinscale, Keswick.

The lovers of this charming region dispute as to when it may be seen at its best, and every season has its advocates; but I ask no better week in the year than the full height of springtide, when the birds are singing with exhilaration, the flowers are blooming, the trees are in fresh, new leaf, and the grass is living green. It was in this lovely spot that Coriander and myself met Mizippi and Du Lace who had sailed away a month before us. The crowds of tourists have not yet come. We are almost alone. And delightful it is to be alone, with Nature speaking to us in varied language, with a vocabulary which, for the most part, we can understand, but with just enough accent and idiom to give a local flavor and dialect to her speech. This is not Italy nor Switzerland, with the magnificent spectacle of the Alps; nor is it the American Rockies nor the Sierra Nevadas, with wild, unbroken forests and vast canyons; nor is it the Adirondacks, with its picturesque camps and its mammoth caravansaries. It is England. And that means no mountain over 3,210 feet high, no snowy peaks, no inland seas, but a chain of sparkling lakes, walled by hills and fortified by threatening crags,—here and there a fringe of trees on the sky line, but most of them long since cleared for the pasture of sheep. Their sides are green with verdure, brown with bracken, dark with heather, tufted with gorse, or covered with shale. Lower down and skirting the shores of placid lakes are leafy groves and stretches of forest. Gentle vales lie sleeping between the sloping hills. The flowers and the trees and the birds are all speaking English. Here are sturdy English oaks, which you will look for in vain in our Canadian forests; giant beeches, imposing in height and spreading leafage; lusty elms; sycamores, with livery of vivid green; dark holly, shining as if varnished. Here are hawthorns in bloom, the wild hyacinth, and the English primrose, daisies, forget-me-nots, and lilies of the valley, lilacs, and laburnum falling in showers of gold, as the Germans think of it. Some of these flowers remind us of New England, and others as surely tell us of old England; and there are those new to us in form and odor which have never migrated from the island, but still cling to its ancient soil, as if this only could be home.

The English lake country is a great park,—not a park like the Yellowstone or the undefiled portion of the Adirondacks, in which Nature is left largely to her own sweet will, but one in which the hand of man has been gently laid in the hand of Nature. The wooing has been ideal, and the honeymoon still goes on. I have seen Nature in her untamed grandeur in the great cañons of the Rockies and the Sierra Nevadas, in rolling plain, blooming prairie, and unbroken forest, in the sequestered vales of the Black Hills, the dreary wastes of the Mauvaises Terres, and the unmeasured miles of Canadian timberland. In such scenery Nature makes an impression which is all her own. "This is what I can do," she says, "if I am left to myself." And sometimes it seems as if man could not enter without marring the effect, as he certainly does when forests are devastated by axe or fire, and acres of stumps or charred timber are left, and hills washed out by hydraulic mining or scarred by quarries tell that man has been there only to pillage. The effect is sometimes almost as bad when man attempts to beautify by artificial means the face of Nature. No cosmetics, no pomade, wigs, or hair dye can make the painted belle look as sweet and pretty as the rosy-cheeked, sun-browned farmer's lass. But here in the lake district it seems as if man and Nature perfectly understood each other, and as if each lived in and for the other. By the vigilant exertions of a band of Nature-lovers who have joined to protect these hills from ravage, the railroads and the great caravansaries have been kept out; and Nature has been left with arching brows, gleaming eyes, and a smile on her cheek. Her tresses have been combed out and trimmed, but not banged or frizzed.

Away from railroad engines and factory smoke the lake district is not soiled with the grimy touch of the artisan. Its industries are rural. Here and there is a quarry or the remains of a mine, but scarcely making a scar upon the face of the landscape. There is not a tent or a log cabin; and in the whole district I have seen but one wooden house, and that built by an Englishman who had lived in America. The habitations speak not of transient or sudden possession, but of the stability of long occupancy. Houses, cottages, barns, churches, boat-houses, and the stores in the picturesque little villages are all built of small stones quarried from these slaty hills and laid up with the mortar three inches back from the front, so that to the passer they appear to be simply laid stone on stone, without cement; and few stones are thicker than half a brick. The walls are built in the same way. Hawthorn hedges abound, but wooden fences and wire ones are rare. While the little cottagers and farmers have not been excluded, the lake district has become a place of summer residence for many people and a favorite resort for the tourist. The fine roads, the delightful little inns, the opportunity for boating and fishing, the beautiful and picturesque scenery, and the literary fame of the lake country invite a host of zealous pilgrims. But, fortunately for us, we are here before the "season" has set in, and before the Whitsuntide holidays have tempted an army of "round-trip" excursionists.

The lake district does not, like the scenery of Greece, fairly reek with mythology. You do not find here aboriginal legends, like the Indian traditions which, in name and story, garnish the scenery of some of our own lakes and mountains, and which often have been suffered to fade away into forgetfulness. The literary baptism of this beautiful section has come within our own century. Its distinction is that it was the home of Southey, Coleridge, and Wordsworth, and that here they found rest and inspiration. The designation, "the Lake School," was an attempt to lump them all in the same mockery. But they did not represent together a distinct school. They were individual, and unlike in many respects. But Wordsworth, at least, represented a new epoch,—an epoch of simple, reflective, natural expression; and the term, "the lake poets," was, geographically, and perhaps critically, as good a term as could be found to describe him and his companions when the wrath of Jeffrey and the critics was poured out against him. Wordsworth lived in the lake district, but it is just as true that the lake district lives in him. This, above all things, was his academe. He studied at Cambridge, but produced almost nothing there; and his insignificant library of four or five hundred books did not feed him. Southey was the book-worm, but Wordsworth craved other fare. "There is my master's library, where he keeps his books," said his servant; "but his study is out of doors." Matthew Arnold thought Wordsworth would have gained by reading more, and we might add by writing less; but genius must be left to its own diet and exercise.

And now for a few days I shall ferret out the haunts of Wordsworth, and climb the hills, row on the lakes, walk the fields, sit under the shade of beech and sycamore, and listen to the thrush and the cuckoo's note, which still are heard in his verses.

NEW YORK LETTER.

A novelty in the way of an art exhibition has just closed at the Fine Arts Galleries. For the second time since its organization the National Sculpture Society has given the public a chance to see what the Americans are doing in plastic art. At this second annual exhibition there have been not only large numbers of pieces of sculpture, admirable in subject and excellent in execution, but the collection has been set in the midst of beautiful artificial gardens of towering palms and cedars, growing plants, trailing vines, and sweet-smelling flowers. Enthusiastic praise has been given the managers of the society who conceived this gratifying, artistic arrangement, showing conclusively that ornamental gardening is the most effective and appropriate background for the display of sculpture of the highest excellence and architecture of the most effective design. The uninitiated visitor who stepped from the noise and bustle of the humdrum street into the quiet greenery of the garden enjoyed a new and delightful experience.

Far different in surroundings and in visitors has been the Free Exhibition of Loan Pictures at the Hebrew Institute in East Broadway which was opened two weeks ago by the University Settlement Society and the Educational Alliance. This is the third time the experiment has been tried of giving the "East-siders" the enjoyment of higher pleasures. As heretofore, the largest proportion of the visitors have been children; but the men and women of all nationalities have not been absent. Among them one notices an occasional connoisseur of art who has been attracted to the collection because it contains treasures which rarely or never leave the private galleries to which they belong. It is said that the favorite picture so far is a copy of Mme. Vigée Lebrun's delightful portrait of herself and child. Dubufe's "Prodigal Son" is reported to be second in popularity. Mr. Seth Low is president of the University Settlement Society, another evidence of the wide philanthropy and liberal spirit of this distinguished son of Columbia and now its president.

It is not a far cry to turn from art on the East Side to Col. Waring of the Street Cleaning Department, who has done so much to better the condition of the poorer neighborhoods of the city. Col. Waring has just presented another of his business-like communications to the mayor and his council, in which he states that the streets of New York are "pretty nearly as clean as they can be made with the pavements they now have." But, to bring about this godly condition, Col. Waring has overrun his allowance; and the Board of Estimate must, if the streets are kept as clean for the remainder of the year, give him a half-million more dollars or else reduce the rate of wages paid to the workmen, who, through a series of political manoeuvres, are now getting $2.50 per day for their "common labor." It is these frank and fearless statements, showing an absolute disregard of conciliating any one, which make Col. Waring's communications such delightful reading to the non-partisan reformers.

But this is not all. In a second statement to Mayor Strong, Col. Waring estimates that the merchantable material thrown away by the people of New York in their ash and refuse barrels is worth one cent a day a head, and that, if these extravagant citizens are forced to separate the good from the worthless in their refuse, the total saving, rating the population at two million, would be $7,300,000 a year. Thus, instead of paying two million and a half for cleaning the streets, the city would receive a net revenue of about five millions for the privilege. As an individual, Col. Waring believes that this return can be secured. "Nothing can be destroyed," says Nature. "Nothing need be wasted," says Science. What a lesson in economy Col. Waring's scheme, if successful, would teach us all! and, in addition, no more "mysterious paper currency," as Dickens called it in London, escaping from ash-cans, and circulating everywhere when the wind blows. New York could then hope to be second only to Paris in economy, "where nothing is wasted, costly and luxurious city though it be, but where wonderful human ants creep out of holes, and pick up every scrap."

Although the municipal consolidation of New York and Brooklyn has been indefinitely postponed by the recent killing of the Greater New York bill, the commercial union of the two cities is to be further strengthened by a new bridge over the East River from Grand Street, New York, to the foot of Broadway, Brooklyn. New York is also to grapple Jersey City to her side; and designs are now being submitted to the authorized commissioners for a New York and New Jersey bridge over the North River. These connecting links between the metropolis and her outlying neighbors mean increased prosperity and convenience for all concerned; and they ought to mean something higher and better,—the establishment of the conviction that "each is needed by one and all," and the growth of a more fraternal and loyal interest of each in the affairs of all.

Signs of the approach of vacation time are on every hand. Society is fast departing for its fashionable out-of-town haunts, and Fifth Avenue is noticeably the quieter by day and by night. The season of amusements, the last thing to languish and wane here as elsewhere, is, nevertheless, dying, although reluctantly. Even the churches have given their final entertainments, not the least interesting or successful in our own denomination being the concert given by the Choral Club of the Lenox Avenue Society in its church. The object of the club is to cultivate a higher musical appreciation among the members of the congregation.

But the season is never too late to have the pulses of some men stirred to generosity; and at this last moment of writing comes the news that Mr. Henry W. Maxwell, a prominent member of Mr. Chadwick's church in Brooklyn, has made glad the hearts of the deeply interested members of the Brooklyn Guild Association by a gift of $10,000. The Brooklyn Guild had its origin among Mr. Chadwick's people. It is an association for carrying on the redeeming work of bettering the condition of "the backward social classes." Mr. Maxwell's letter to Mr. Charles E. Woodbridge, president of the Guild, was as follows:—

Dear Sir,—In memory of my brother, Eugene Lascelles Maxwell, I offer to erect and present to your Association the building contemplated and desired in your annual report, and under the plans and conditions therein set forth. My purpose is to expend ten thousand dollars in its construction. Trusting that the gift will be accepted, and when completed will be useful in your comprehensive work, I remain,

Very truly,

[Signed] HENRY W. MAXWELL.

At the annual meeting of the guild the offer conveyed in the above letter was received and gratefully accepted.

YALE IN MAY-TIME.

Yale took captive the delegates to the charity Conference who assembled there for a beautiful week in May. The hospitality of the university was unstinted, so that those who had come from all over the country went in and out of library, museum, lecture-room, as though they were students there themselves. The magnificent college buildings and the noble trees were a feast to the eye that loves beautiful things. The young men were ready to doff their caps and answer the curious questions of many a visitor. "How refreshing it is to see such a lot of boys!" said one woman, whose duties keep her closely associated with a hundred or two girls, and to whom a boy is a rare sight. She was even ready to enjoy the 'rah, 'rah, 'rah, that kept cropping up at all hours of the day and night. She drew the line of forbearance, however, at their conduct during prayers.

Strangers go to college prayers at Yale as one goes to a theatre. The special sight is at the close of the exercise to see the Seniors line the broad aisle down which the President walks, and bow low to him as he literally runs the gauntlet between them. It is considered a great feat to bow so low that the head is on a level with his knees. What keeps them from hitting him as he escapes, with a mob of fellows close at his heels, apparently running him out of chapel, is the mystery. Long experience has probably taught the aged President just how to dodge.

But the prayers themselves! It was Memorial Day when several of us wandered in, thinking that that would be an occasion when not only religion, but patriotism, would be inculcated, and the young men would be incited by their leader to all that was manly and brave. At least, appropriate Scripture would be chosen to turn their thoughts to the high things of God and man. We were to be wofully disappointed. If compulsory prayers at Harvard were such a hideous mockery, a thousand thanks are due to the devout men who did away with them. There was not a shadow of reverence, barely of decorum. The Scripture and prayer were so mumbled that it was impossible, from the strangers' gallery, to understand two consecutive sentences; and the boys paid little more attention than so many chimpanzees would have done,—that is, the mass of them. If there were exceptions, they were so few they did not count. They laughed, talked, read, wrote in their note-books; and, though during the prayer they bowed their heads,—which was more than we did, to be sure,—they kept on with their undevotional ways all through. There was nothing to appeal to the spirit of any man; nothing to help those boys to resist temptation, to gird them for self-conquest. It was pitiful beyond words; and one sympathized with a lady who, watching the obeisance to the President, exclaimed, "Well, I am glad they have to bow before him even if they will not bow before the Lord." Such pretence of piety can hardly help to form genuine character.

The truest friendships are often those that spring up unexpectedly, especially if they are laid on the invisible foundations of respect. At one of the meetings a gentle-voiced man found out the reporter's table, and said, "My wife and I read the Christian Register, and we want to meet the wife of the editor." Many and dear as are the scores of Conference friends, there is always an added charm in that friendship if it links one to those of a common religious faith. It was therefore pleasant to be sought out because of congenial belief in the great realities. An invitation for the evening followed. It was the last night of the Conference, and the old words came flashing through the mind, "I'm a pilgrim, and I'm a stranger, I can tarry, I can tarry, but a night." But how sweet the memory of that night!—the long, beautiful drive through the wonderful park to the top of East Rock, with the world of sea and sky and entrancing green below us; the pause, spell-bound, while we held our breath to hear the liquid note of the wood robin at the sunset hour; the breaking of bread together with the gentle friends, growing old sweetly and peacefully in perfect unison; the discovery of the large group of mutually loved friends; the wide reach of human interest from charity and reforms in America to liberty for Armenia and sympathetic hope for Mozoomdar, half-way around the world. All these are things that quicken the heart-beats in such a way that friendship ripens with tropic growth, and make the pilgrim's single night one not to be forgotten.

Yes, New Haven is beautiful in May. Its noble, time-honored university wins our honor for its history and its power; but there is no spot in that beautiful city that stirs sweeter remembrance than the quiet home over which the maple-trees stand sentinel.

SECOND CONGRESS OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

The Second Annual Congress of the Liberal Religious Societies met in Sinai Temple, Chicago, June 2, 3, 4. The attendance was notably less, and there was lack of the enthusiasm of last year. All this is accounted for by the mistrust which has been generated among various liberal bodies and individuals by the policy of the congress, lest its real outcome, if not its avowed purpose, was to build up another liberal sect instead of unifying and federating the existing liberal bodies. This policy has been deplored by many friends of liberal religion on the ground that it would weaken rather than strengthen the work of liberal religious thought, and this has led to the withdrawal of many from the congress who signed the call for its first meeting and participated in its organization.

Many excellent addresses were given during the sessions of the congress. Among them may be mentioned those of Dr. Hirsch, W. L. Sheldon, F. E. Dewhurst, and Dr. J. M. Pullman; and the papers of Dr. Alfred Momerie of England, remembered by his connection with the Parliament of Religions, upon "The Essentials of Religion"; President Cone on "The Higher Criticism and its Ethical Relations"; and Rev. Mr. Faville of the orthodox church on "The Interchange of Ministerial Courtesies across Theological Chasms."

This report will be devoted, however, to the business side of the congress as most important. Dr. H. W. Thomas was re-elected president, and Jenkin Lloyd Jones secretary, for the coming year. Reports were read by the different committees appointed last year. These showed that the activities of the congress had been confined to the dissemination of its ideas through the New Unity and the Non-sectarian, which have been adopted as its organs, and to a few addresses, lectures, and sermons which have been given by various clergymen living in Chicago and vicinity upon the cause of liberal religion in places in Illinois and Indiana easy of access. A branch congress has been organized in Illinois, which has put a missionary in the field, who has preached at various points and started societies at Freeport, Nunda, etc.

The interest of the congress culminated in the debate on "The Policy of the Congress: How far can the Liberal Denominations be federated? Where Federation is impossible, what still remains for the Congress to do?" The discussion of this important topic was led by Rev. Arthur M. Judy of the Unitarian church of Davenport.

To understand this debate and its import, it will be necessary to review briefly the history of the congress. The congress was originally called for the purpose of finding what could be done together among liberals. Reports were submitted at the first congress upon having common headquarters in cities for the liberal denominations, upon the feasibility of a union publication, upon founding a summer school and also a theological school for training of ministers in religion without reference to denominational bias. All that could be expected was accomplished,—a general acquaintance-ship and an increased sense of unity of aim among liberal workers of different names. A permanent organization was formed, and arrangements made for future incorporation. The constitution stated the purpose of the congress to be, among other things, "to foster and encourage the organization of non-sectarian churches and kindred societies" and "to secure a closer and more helpful association of these," etc.

This action led many to feel that the congress might be turned into a new sect, which it certainly would be if these objects were carried out. Denominational Universalists and Unitarians felt sure the congress was to be a new sect, and held aloof from it from the beginning. Others differed from this view in holding its character to be dependent on the work it actually did. So far it was not a new sect, but would become so when it began organizing churches which allied themselves to itself rather than to any existing denomination. So far connection with the congress did not interfere with any denominational relations. When it began the active work of building churches and associating them with itself, then one could no longer work loyally and earnestly with it and also with his present denomination, but must choose either to leave the old or the new organization.

As the reports showed, the congress has undertaken no work of organizing churches during the year, and so has not justified the fears of its opponents. But the local branch of the congress in Illinois has undertaken to do this work, Rev. A. N. Alcott acting as its missionary. Throughout the year discussion has gone on in the board of directors and without as to the wisdom of this policy, and this it was which Mr. Judy really spoke upon.

He took the ground that this policy was a mistake. If co-operation was to come among the liberal denominations, it must be by action of the denominations themselves, not by a self-constituted body, like the congress, acting for them. He said it was natural to believe that the existing organizations would not be favorable to a rival which proposed to take their work out of their hands. The policy of the congress should not be to start churches, but to get the denominations existing to take steps to federate and work together. He offered the following resolutions:—

Whereas the policy of this Congress has not heretofore been defined in a way to place it unmistakably before the public, therefore be it

Resolved, first, That the aim and purpose of the Congress is to bring about a federation of the liberal democrats of America; or, to state the aim in other words, to effect a union of the denominations as a whole, not to build up a new organization out of their dismembered parts.

Resolved, second, That, to the end of effecting this federation, a convention should be called, whose object shall be to frame articles of union which would recommend themselves to the denominations for adoption in their organic capacity.

Resolved, third, That the board of directors be instructed to define more explicitly the scope and purpose of this convention, and to take all needful steps toward determining the basis and condition of representation therein.

Resolved, fourth, That the Congress recognizes that its present form of organization is but antecedent to this final state of union, and in the nature of things destined to give way when this truly representative basis of union has been secured.

Resolved, fifth, That, pending the accomplishment of this union, all missionary work will be undertaken in ways least inimical to the vigor and integrity of the denominations represented in the Congress.

Resolved, sixth, That, as a better understanding of the unanimity of thought among us is needful, every effort will be made to increase the efficiency of our present annual meetings, to disseminate the literature of our various component denominations, and to maintain a headquarters where an adequate clerical force can be employed to carry our purposes into effect.

Resolved, seventh, and last, That the board of directors be instructed to bring these resolutions before the national, sectional, and local meetings of the liberal denominations, and in every other way possible strive to carry to a successful issue what is the ultimate and underlying purpose of this Congress; namely, the bringing of the liberal denominations of America into a strong and carefully planned federation.

Rev. L. J. Duncan of Streator (Independent), upheld the present policy of the congress. Dr. Hirsch said the Jews would all go out if it meant a new denomination, that liberal bodies had much in common and much not common. Dr. Canfield (Universalist) agreed with the ideas of Mr. Judy, and said he adopted Dr. Hirsch's speech, changing the word "Jew" to Universalist. Rev. Jenkin L. Jones pleaded for the present basis of the congress, on the ground that it was more inclusive than any single denomination. Rev. Mr. Johonnot said the congress must drop the words from its constitution which pledge it to build non-sectarian churches, if it would succeed. It must confine itself to such work as would not alienate the present denominations. Something might be done on the plan of Mr. Judy, but there were many obstacles in the way. Dr. Thomas thought we ought to come out of our denominationalism, and work together. The resolutions were finally referred to the board of directors, as deemed "worthy of careful consideration," to be reported on at the next annual session.

It is evident with this question unsettled the congress can undertake no work this coming year, and its future is very uncertain. The present leaders will not care to adopt and push the proposed plan. Without the help of its adherents not much can be done under the present plan. The spirit of the congress was very good, despite the differences of opinion. The desire of the men who have been the life of the congress is highly commendable,—to sink denominational differences, and work for the common unities together; to thus reach out to the great unchurched masses whom only liberal religion can reach. They sincerely believe that people are repelled by the present denominational names. They would have liberals truly liberals, and be willing to drop denominational names for the sake of reaching the people. Sincerity, earnestness, and desire to help men into a religious life must be fully granted to such men, however mistaken their methods. A closer co-operation of liberal bodies is to be desired. Names ought not to count, if the fundamental principles of liberal religion are present. In any town where one liberal church exists alone, of whatever name, all liberals should gather to it. This spirit every liberal preacher and denominational paper should encourage. This will help to the desirable greater co-operation of liberal denominations in the future. But that unity must come by growth, and not by being forced. R. F. JOHONNOT.

LETTERS OF GREETING.

The following letters were read during the anniversary meeting:—

FROM DR. MARTINEAU.

To the Directors of the American Unitarian Association:

Dear Friends,—You will not wonder that your birthday greeting comes to me with a special charm, when I recall the fact that, though your Association is my junior by twenty years, we both began to preach at the same date, since it broke out at once into ordered speech as soon as it was born, while I had to learn my alphabet and a good deal else before I could be admitted, even as an apprentice, to missionary work. Well and gratefully do I remember the more striking of those first Boston productions, and the fresh glow which they kindled, like the dawn of a new gospel upon my heart. Without yet quite knowing why (for I had been moulded upon the pattern of our native Unitarianism), your New England religious literature, opening a new vein of inner experience, gave me at once the need and the courage to rethink the great problems of the spiritual life.

If, therefore, in the last sixty or seventy years any teaching of mine has spoken your thought and met with your approval, I have but reflected back the blessing which I had received; and it will be a joy to me forever if this reciprocation has deepened our fellowship and admitted me to a place—be it only as a guest—with the goodly brotherhood of the living and the dead who have both taught and lived the truth of God among you.

Accept my warmest thanks for your affectionate appreciation of such service as I have tried to render, and believe me, to the end, your loving brother.

FROM REV. SAMUEL MAY.

Rev. George Batchelor:

Dear Sir,—I trust you will not gauge the satisfaction and pleasure I had in your very kind letter at my recent eighty-fifth birthday by the promptness, or want of it, in my acknowledgment. . . . The sight of your letter and name in the handsome book which my friends here (with no knowledge on my part of what they were doing until the day came) had projected for me gave me a surprise and a genuine gratification. Your personal and your official words were alike gratifying. I guess (being a Yankee) that I have been as truly loyal to the American Unitarian Association since I first began to attend its meetings, fully sixty-five years ago, as the average of its members. Every one has his own way of manifesting his loyalty. Protest must have its place; and a good place I esteem it, if it be not merely wilful or partisan, headlong or erratic. One must be fully persuaded in his own mind, of course.

FROM REV. THOMAS T. STONE.

My dear Brother,—I would, through you, send a word of congratulation to the brethren assembled,—. . . congratulation not so much for any denominational success as for what seems to me of far greater worth,—the influence which the fathers of old and the sons of a later day have been enabled to exert, influencing religion from alien traditions and from servitude to outward authority, in opening the way to a truer and larger interpretation of the books generally considered peculiarly sacred, and in raising to a higher estimation throughout society the "Eternal and Immutable Morality," let me add, in calling mankind to more just appreciation of the reason which God has given as our guide.

So much, I feel, has been already done. So much, I think, has brought us to what Newton described as the vast ocean of truth spread out before us. But let us not content ourselves with gathering pebbles on the shore. Rather let us launch out upon the ocean, and see what wealth its depths contain, and what stores the intellectual communion to which it invites us may bring back to us. Or, if we choose an older and more familiar illustration, we have come to the border of a region fertile and full of promise. To the border: so there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed. Let us not fear or delay to enter and take possession,—not, as once, to drive others out and have what they have lost, but to help all whom we find there, and along with them, in union with all lovers of truth and righteousness, striving to join the Paradise or the City of God.

Let me add one thing more. There is no thought of man which is wholly bad, no tradition which is wholly false. Error has its source in something which is true. So let us beware of uprooting the truth which we try to detach from the false. Rather than flat contradiction, even of the dogma manifestly false, let us look to its origin, to what it at first meant to express, and then translate it into language nearer the truth.

Finally, my brethren, let me, so near as I stand to the hour when the great mystery shall be unveiled, simply repeat the ancient word so familiar to you all, God is love.

FROM DR. FURNESS.

My dear Mr. Batchelor,—Dr. Martineau has my hearty admiration, veneration, and love. His sermon that recently appeared in the Christian Register, on "Life as a Preparation for Death," interested me deeply, as I increasingly feel the difference between the near certainty and the distant certainty. He has said many words of wisdom which have helped many and set them thinking. I am three years and a day his senior. How rare it is for so consummate a metaphysician to be endowed with so rich a fancy! I wish him every good under heaven.

COLUMBIA'S LIBRARY.

It is a matter of pride to all citizens here that New York has added another name to the lengthening list of those rich men who feel that their duty is as great "in using money as in gaining it." President Seth Low's gift of a million dollars for the splendid new Library Building of Columbia College on Morningside Heights has placed him as a public benefactor with Peabody, Slater, Pratt, and others of renown. It is hard to believe that even a "thorough socialist" could be discontented with the present economic order which makes such gifts possible, and, as the past has frequently proved, probable. The gift was generous, almost beyond precedent; but the simple words which accompanied its presentation distinguish it as a beautiful memorial of President Low to his father, whom he referred to as "a merchant who taught me to care for the things which Columbia College stands for." The design of the building has already been prepared by Messrs. McKim, Meade & White, and has appeared in some of our daily newspapers. It shows that the structure will be in classic style, surmounted by a dome and approached by a broad flight of steps. It will be the centre and the most commanding feature of the group of new buildings which Columbia will occupy on Morningside Heights.

THE ORIENTAL CHRIST IN GERMAN.

Mr. Ohannes Chatschumian, an Armenian student in Leipzig, in a letter to Mr. Mozoomdar, which is printed in the Interpreter, says that the "Oriental Christ" is to be translated into German by Frau Prof. Dohmke, "a woman of high education, of broad views, and of a deep religious nature, who possesses a perfect knowledge of both English and German." He adds: "This letter farther asks your blessing, that your 'Heart-beats' may also throb in the panting breasts of men and women in Germany. Judging from the religious situation in this country, it is not difficult to say that your works will be accepted with great interest. The interest in and the need of the real Christ are growing greater and greater, while neither the orthodox nor the so-called rationalistic lives of the Nazarene hitherto written satisfy the growing demand of the educated classes. The young generation of this country is waiting for the Oriental Christ."

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

BOSTON, MASS.—The Church of the Disciples Branch of the National Alliance has planned an attractive programme for next winter's study. It will be "A Year with Emerson," and provides for readings, papers, and talks with a thoroughness and judgment that will make the course a most valuable one for all fortunate enough to share it. Any Branch desiring to plan earnest work for next winter could hardly do better than to use the same programme.

Boston Common: The popular religious services Sunday afternoons at five o'clock on Boston Common have gone on with increasing success. Under the big cottonwood tree, now a familiar feature in the exercises, Messrs. Hale, Walkley, Savage, Horton, Crothers, Eliot, Van Ness, Hudson, Huxtable, Howe, and Dole have spoken. The audiences ranged from four hundred to twelve hundred. The weather on certain days was unfavorable. Six meetings were planned. Four are past. It is probable that the series will be continued through July and August. A cornet and parlor organ have been used to lead the singing. Mr. F. H. Nazro has attended to this. Printed hymns are circulated, and tracts are also given away freely. Thus far the addresses have been on topics allied to modern life and duty, such as brotherhood, service, self-respect, and the teachings of Jesus in relation to character. Coming speakers are Messrs. Ames, De Normandie, Boynton, Roblin, Brooke, and McDaniel.

ANDOVER, N.H.—On Friday, June 7, the graduation exercises of Proctor Academy were held, five young ladies and three young men receiving the diploma of the Unitarian Educational Society. Rev. Augustus Woodbury, D.D., offered prayer. The papers read by the class reflected much credit upon the teaching of the school, and gave much satisfaction to the trustees and friends present. The diplomas were presented by President J. C. A. Hill. The same teachers will be continued in their work. The coming year will bring a distinct improvement in the boarding facilities. Many expressions were heard after the exercises to the effect that the school deserves a liberal support and a large attendance of pupils.

BERKELEY, CAL.—On June 2 Rev. E. B. Payne held touching and fitting memorial services for six of the "Colima" victims. —Prof Whiting, his wife, and four children, who have been so identified with every interest of our little church band in Berkeley, Cal. The large audience was in tears, and passed resolutions of sympathy with the stricken relatives in the East.

HOULTON, ME.—The Unitarian conference at Houlton, Me., begins Tuesday evening, June 25. Trains leave Oldtown over the B. & A. Railroad at 7.23 A.M. and 3.55 P.M., arriving at Houlton 11.50 A.M. and 7.35 P.M., connecting with M. C. trains for the West. Returning, leave Houlton at 9.05 A.M. and 2.10 P.M., arriving at Oldtown 12.05 P.M. and 6.42 P.M., connecting with M. C. trains for the West. The M. C. Railroad will sell tickets to Houlton and return at greatly reduced rates to persons attending the conference.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.—Rev. Carl G. Horst preached his farewell sermon as pastor of Unity Church on May 26. His resignation was accepted by the society with much regret. The most cordial relations have existed between pastor and people for four years. The esteem in which he is held by the community was attested to by the large number of persons who gathered to hear his farewell sermon. Not only does Unity Church lose a beloved pastor and loyal friend, but the city sustains the loss of an earnest and valued citizen, who was always ready to help in any good cause. Mr. Horst began his work in Athol on June 2.

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Rev. Russell Belows preached in Washington June 2, from the text, "And Nathan said to David, Thou art the man."

NORFOLK CONFERENCE.—The summer meeting of the Norfolk Conference will be held with the First Congregational Parish in Canton, Thursday, June 20. Rev. Roderick Stebbins of Milton will read an essay on "The Religious Opportunities of To-day," which will be discussed by Rev. L. R. Daniels and Philip S. Thacher. In the afternoon Rev. E. A. Horton will speak on "What can we do to Improve our Sunday-schools?" and Rev. F. B. Mott and Rev. John A. Savage will continue the subject. Trains for Canton Junction leave Park Square station at 8.25, 10.30, 11.35, and 12.05.

SUFFOLK CONFERENCE.—A meeting of the Suffolk Conference was held on the afternoon and evening of Thursday, June 6. The afternoon session began with devotional exercises conducted by Rev. C. R. Eliot. Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford of Waltham then gave an interesting address on "What do Unitarians Believe?" We believe in no statement of belief, he said, because we hold a growing truth; and any creed would need constant revision. We are open to the acceptance of any conclusions reached by experts in the various departments of investigation, without regard to its effect upon our established church or belief. We hold to a conception of God that continually expands with growing thought. He is higher than our highest and better than our best. We believe in a progressive humanity, with a Garden of Eden and a vision of blessedness before, and not behind us.

Rev. Richmond Fisk, D.D., of East Boston then spoke on "Unitarians and their Belief." Dr. Fisk forcibly urged the importance of putting our thought into a form that would make it an effective power in the world. He closed with an appeal for a more faithful attendance at the church service and a greater loyalty to our practical religious work. In the discussion which followed remarks were made by Rev. J. L. Seward, Rev. Albert Walkley, Rev. Mrs. Whitney, and Rev. C. A. Allen. The afternoon session closed with a solo sung very acceptably by Miss Key.

After a supper furnished by the ladies of the Winthrop society the conference assembled for the evening exercises, filling the church in good numbers. The general topic was "Factors of a Successful Church." Rev. E. A. Horton, in speaking on "The Social and Philanthropic Activity," of the church, urged the importance in our day of the expansion of religion to cover a wide range of spiritual welfare. It must be a church of the rich and the poor, and the stranger there must be made to see that he is cordially welcome. Mr. R. C. Humphreys made an earnest plea for self-sacrifice and devotion to the church in speaking of the "Layman's Responsibility." He called attention especially to the encouragement to the minister and the power of example and influence on others in a constant attendance at the Sunday service. Rev. E. C. Butler spoke on "The Preacher." If a man really believes in his ministry, and gives himself, his time and his strength, to the work, he need not become a neglected minister. There comes a time in the career of the successful preacher when he feels a glow when he ascends the pulpit stairs, and when his soul is filled with the spirit of God; and that spirit goes out to his hearers. Rev. Charles G. Ames spoke of "The Spiritual Life" of a church as a condition of success. Rev. W. S. Key, in behalf of the Winthrop church, spoke of the pleasure this visit of the conference had afforded, and he was sure that good results would follow. Short addresses followed from Rev. E. R. Butler, Rev. E. C. Headle, and Rev. C. W. Blackett of the Methodist church of Winthrop. After a hearty vote of thanks to the Winthrop society for its hospitality the conference adjourned.

NATIONAL GUILD ALLIANCE.—The annual meeting of the National Guild Alliance was held in Channing Hall on Wednesday, May 29, preceded by the business meeting in Room 10, which was attended by the delegate representatives of the various guilds represented in the Alliance, Rev. B. R. Bulkeley of Chicago presiding. An encouraging report of the year's work was presented by Mrs. Laura B. Martine, the recording secretary, at which time she exhorted the guilds to greater helpfulness in the Alliance, showing their opportunities of so doing. The report of Miss E. J. Libbey, the treasurer, was next heard, giving a favorable showing of the financial standing of the Alliance. Report of Rev. George W. Cooke agent, was also read and accepted. Rev. George W. Piper, chairman of the Nominating Committee, then announced the resignation of the helpful president, Rev. B. R. Bulkeley of Chicago. This was accepted with regret, in consequence of his acceptance of the position as minister of Unity Church, Chicago. The following were duly announced as the board of officers for the ensuing year: president, Rev. Loren B. McDonald of Boston; vice-president, Miss Margaret Blanchard of Concord, Mass.; recording secretary, Mrs. Laura B. Martine, Worcester, Mass.; corresponding secretary, Miss Kate L. Brown, Hyde Park; treasurer, Miss E. J. Libbey, Dorchester, Mass. The mass meeting was held in Channing Hall at three o'clock, the following programme holding the interest of a large audience of guild workers and friends. The opening address was made by the retiring president, Rev. B. R. Bulkeley, who spoke earnestly of his confidence in the guilds as an important and helpful organization to the future church. He was followed by Miss Brown, who painted bright possibilities for the future. The following representatives of several guilds told in an interesting and inspiring manner the work accomplished by their representative organization: Miss Nellie Porter of Neponset, Mass.; Mrs. Young of Norton, Mass.; Mr. Carlton Wheeler of Peterboro, N.H.; Miss Blanchard of Concord; and Mr. Rodman of Wellesley Hills. Fine music was rendered by a male quartette from the guild of Keene, N.H., and a mixed quartette from the guild of Concord, Mass.

NATIONAL ALLIANCE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.—One of the pleasantest meetings in Anniversary Week was the annual public gathering which has become a custom of the Alliance, and was this year held at the Second Church, Copley Square, Boston. The church was entirely filled with members of the Alliance and interested friends, who listened to a long and varied programme. The speakers were Mrs. Dix, the president; Miss Downing of Concord, N.H.; Mrs. F. W. Hooper, president of the New York League; Miss Elizabeth P. Channing of Milton, Mass.; Mrs. Catlin, director for Eastern New York; Mrs. Utter, vice-president for the Rocky Mountain section; Mrs. George S. Hale, and others. The first president of the Alliance, Mrs. J. W. Andrews, spoke for Grace Chapel, Green Harbor, and its hard-working little society, and told the story of Ramabai and her school to which she is so devoted a friend. Mrs. Martha Perry Lowe, in recent years too seldom seen at the May meetings of the Alliance, read a poem in honor of the seventieth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association. Rev. Ida C. Hultin of Moline, Ill., made an earnest plea for the good time coming, when men and women will work together and separate organizations no longer be needed. The Alliance was honored by the presence of Rev. Thomas Van Ness, the pastor of the Second Church, who cordially welcomed the people present to the hospitality of the church, and then spoke to them on the value of organized effort and some methods to be pursued in forming new societies.

The most important event of the day was the reading by Dr. Duren J. H. Ward of an address recently delivered by Rev. Charles R. Weld at the meeting of the Southern Conference in Baltimore. The subject of the address was "The General Theological Situation in the South," and contained explicit statements of great interest and value to all interested in Southern work. At the close of the addresses the audience was invited to the parlors of the church, where lunch and the "fellowship" of a social hour ended a most memorable meeting.

On the following Friday the monthly meeting of the Executive Board was held at 25 Beacon Street. This was somewhat earlier than the stated date, to enable some distant members to be present. The formation of new Branches was announced at Chelmsford, New Bedford, and Fairhaven. Mrs. George S. Hale of Boston has become a life member. Rev. Mr. Chaney has applied for space at the Cotton States and International Exposition to be held at Atlanta, Ga., from September 18 to December 31, 1895, in which to exhibit Unitarian literature and apparatus for religious education and church extension. It was voted that the Alliance should assist Mr. Chaney in this matter, and the whole subject is in the hands of a committee with full powers. It is desired that Post-office Mission Committees should send to Miss Everett the addresses of recent correspondents, that the directory may be kept complete to date. Register reports will be again sent to the Branches in September. Emily A. Fifield, Secretary.

THE CHILDREN'S MISSION.—The Children's Mission to the Children of the Destitute held its forty-sixth anniversary at Arlington Street Church on Wednesday afternoon, May 29. Friends contributed plants and flowers to adorn the pulpit; and the attractive appearance of the children, who were present in goodly numbers from the Mission and the Female Asylum, made the scene beautiful for the audience, which well filled the house. The exercises were opened by the orphan quartette from the Sunday-school of the Winthrop Society, followed by prayer by Rev. Hilary Bygrave of Belmont. The president, Mr. William H. Baldwin, then spoke of the work of the Mission, which had been going on quietly, but growing steadily, for nearly half a century. He emphasized it as a work which touched all hearts and brought together those who felt for suffering children. A song of welcome was then sung by the children of the Female Asylum, in their usual happy manner. The singing during the afternoon was mostly by the orphan quartette. Mr. Henry Pickering, the treasurer, gave a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Mission for the past year, the particulars of which will appear in the report soon to be published. The secretary, Rev. Samuel B. Cruft, made a report of the work of the Mission during the year just ended, giving statistics of the children. For two months admissions were suspended on account of sickness, but in ten months 232 children had been admitted, 207 had been sent to places, adopted, or returned to parents or friends who had become able to provide for them, and 25 remained in the home. The report spoke warmly of the care given the children by the matron and her assistants; of the great interest felt by the children in the Sunday-schools, shown by their contributions and in various ways; and of the great good which the Mission exerts as an educator in generosity and benevolence. Interesting addresses were made by Rev. Albert Walkley of Brighton, Rev. Albert Lazenby of Glasgow, Rev. Samuel M. Crothers of Cambridge, and Rev. Edward I. Galvin of Chicago. A full report of the addresses and other exercises will soon be published.

Nothing if not Logical.—In another column of this issue there is a very clever argument presented by the Paine Furniture Company in regard to the use of old furniture. It is hard to understand by what rule of logic a man takes advantage of all the improvements of the last twenty years, including the telephone, electric light, express train, rapid postal service, etc., and refuses to avail himself of the equally great advancement made in the convenience and comfort of modern furniture over the old-fashioned, clumsy, and inconvenient cabinet work of a dozen years ago. A walk through the warerooms of a great modern establishment like the Paine Furniture Company will be a revelation to many of our readers of the wonderful advancement which the last decade has made in the direction of personal comfort and convenience in furniture.

Deaths.

In Uxbridge, 21st ult., Hon. Charles A. Wheelock, aged 83 years.

The death of so good a man and such an upright citizen deserves particular mention in the Christian Register, to which he was for many years a subscriber, and of which he was always a thoughtful reader. From childhood he had been connected with the church. It is on record that fifty-nine years ago he agreed to pay his share of an indebtedness on the church, then recently built. The next year he was clerk of the society, and ever since that time he has been active and earnest in everything that pertained to the welfare of the church, from the beginning in the Sunday-school as pupil, teacher, superintendent, forty years in the choir, always present at the services till age and infirmity compelled him to remain at home, till the last having an affectionate solicitude for it. He was a life member of the American Unitarian Association and often a delegate to the National Conference, beginning with its second meeting at Syracuse in 1866.

As a citizen, Mr. Wheelock, though an active business man, was never too busy for many public services. One who has known him for many years said truly of him, "He has always been ready to give himself for the good of the community." In his care for the public schools and keen interest in the young, in his endeavors as one of the founders and president of the Public Library, by his unflinching devotion to the best interests of the community, he wrote his name in our memories as one who belonged to Ben Adhem's race.

MY PRAYER.

BY RACHEL B. MACMULLIN.

If I should ask in my prayer to-night
For a gift from the Unseen Hand,
What answer could I hope to hear,
With a meaning to understand?

So many gifts and prayers I could ask,
So many helps by the way,
If all were answered and all bestowed,
Not a night could I change to a day.

And I, with eyes so blind to see,
And feet so willing to stray,
Could hardly know where the path would lead,
With no guide to mark the way.

I'll pray for faith and trust in One
Who can see beyond the door,
And ask that my steps be led in the path
Where his feet have walked before.

I'll ask that my eyes be open to see
The work that is needing my hand,
And my heart be willing to wait for the gifts
In the time that his love has planned.

A MAN OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

IN MEMORY OF REV. HENRY ADOLPHUS
MILES, D.D.

BY REV. CHARLES T. BILLINGS.

"He was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith; and much people was added unto the Lord."—ACTS xi. 24.

Sometimes a single sentence serves to portray the character of an individual better than volumes devoted to his career. Just as the essence of religion is found in Christianity, and the essence of Christianity is found in the Bible, so the substance of man's highest nature is often revealed through the sympathetic friend and observer by a single word or phrase. It comes as a flash of light into our darkness, guides us to our truest thought, and reveals the secret of man's power.

This is true in the case of the apostle Barnabas, of whom the words of the text are spoken. These words do not, to be sure, add to our knowledge of outward events. With these alone, we should be ignorant of the channels through which faith and the Holy Spirit flowed; for they tell us nothing of his labors at Antioch, nothing of his bringing of Paul there, nothing of the trip to Jerusalem or the missionary journey they took together. Nor do they add anything to or confirm in any way the traditions that have grown up about this apostle.

But they do tell us that which made him what he was and is to us. They do reveal the source whence all his actions flowed. They do portray him as a man of deep spiritual insight, and in the statement that "much people was added unto the Lord" they reveal the strength of that life and its effective working power. He was a man full of the Holy Ghost or Spirit.

Just what the Holy Spirit is has always puzzled the minds of men,—just as it did on that first Whitsunday centuries ago, when men asked, "What meaneth this?" They could not understand the gift of tongues, nor can men readily to-day comprehend the deeper meaning of Pentecost. It seems something vague and remote from them. For the gift of the Holy Spirit is not so tangible a gift as wealth, or learning, or executive ability. Nor can it be acquired through long and arduous periods of study, as knowledge can. It is something that is in a man's nature, and is called forth from it rather than any outward addition or acquisition. It may, however, be developed, and is always influenced by its surroundings,—quickened by the presence of high things, dulled by contact with low.

Its charm is undeniable and quickly felt, yet just what it is we cannot say. It eludes our powers of definition; and philosophy, even in the hands of the greatest thinkers, has not contributed much to its analysis. We know only that it is the power of God touching and glorifying the human soul. Just as the sunlight catches the wave, and makes it reflect in its sparkle somewhat of its own light, or touches the diamond, and causes it to give back to the world a more resplendent lustre, so the power of God catches the thought of man, and ennobles it; the word, and dignifies it; the deed, and renders it immortal; the life, and makes it divine.

The Holy Spirit is that, therefore, which breathes through a man, his work, his life, and gives to all a higher worth. It finds its home in the purpose of the human heart. Two men set out to do a given work. The one sees but the advantage he is to get from the faithful performance of it. The other sees the benefit the world is to get from it. The work may be finely done in either case, but the spirit of both men is revealed in their work; and he who wrought with the higher aim breathes into his the Holy Spirit. And this is just what constitutes its greatest charm. It is the spirit of man that is all-important. It is not what man does, but the way he does it, the purpose that is behind it, that renders it most effective and impressive. Philanthropy from a mean motive shrinks to the limits of the human heart that holds it. Philanthropy from a high motive, from a love of God and man, magnifies the deed, blesses him that gives and him that receives, and enriches and ennobles the world.

The Holy Spirit, therefore, is that in a man which lifts him out of his selfishness, consecrates his work through a lofty purpose, and gives the greatest power to his work. It is that in him which ever suggests God to his fellow-men. It is that which reveals man's divine sonship and deepens his sense of human brotherhood.

However hard it may be to analyze, its power is undisputed. It is that power which has given the world its noblest men and women. It is that which made the career of the Master possible, and must ever be the distinguishing characteristic of his disciples; for it is ever the picture of the spiritual triumphing over the material that has won the hearts of men, and enabled them in their turn to worship God in the beauty of holiness.

We love, therefore, to remember those who in marked degree have possessed this power, the lives that have been touched by the larger life of God and given themselves freely and devotedly to the highest ends, those who in their thought and word and deed have revealed the glory of spiritual strength. It is well that the nation has set apart a day when we may recall with reverence those who used this power in the service of their country. But this same spirit is found also apart from battlefields and patriotic devotion. It is found in the humblest lives as among the most illustrious, among the poor as among the rich, among men of learning and men whose opportunities and advantages have been few. It is found in the home, the church, the wise movements of philanthropy, and all that betokens the love of the unselfish aim and life.

It is a delight and an inspiration to recall all the men and women that have been inspired by the Holy Ghost. We find them in every age and clime. We find them here and now.

As we think of them to-day, our minds most naturally recur to one who has lived among us, one whom we have learned to love. His name, indeed, is the name that is on our lips to-day. More than all others, he dwells in our thoughts; for we sadly miss in this place of prayer one who revealed the presence of God in his heart and life, even as the apostle of old revealed it,—one who, like Barnabas, was a good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith, and through whose earnest endeavors and inspiring influence much people was added unto the Lord.

And he was one in whom the strength from God was the motive power of his whole life. Sorrow came to him in full measure; but the might of the spirit was so great that it raised him above his trials, enabled him to meet them bravely. And sorrow became a diviner experience because of the wealth of faith and love that he brought to it.

Happiness, too, came to him; and he showed his depth of appreciation in his use of it. He seemed to use it chiefly as a source of joy for others; and happiness also became a holier thing in the thoughts of all who knew him because of the spirit of wisdom and love that so powerfully dominated it.

This same spirit guided him in the use of the talents God had given him. He used them as well as he knew to the glory of God. The thought of self was never prominent or obtrusive. It was, in fact, absent to a marked degree. He was ever courteous, generous, and sympathetic. His wit, which was keen, was always genial, never biting, and never wounding. It was the outburst of a nature happy in the peace of God, teaching others that God meant his creatures to be happy, to praise him through their mirth and enjoyment, and to delight in their work and all the works of his hands.

This spirit was likewise manifested in his wisdom. He sought the companionship of men and books, not that he might display his wealth of learning, but that he might help men through it to a knowledge of their greater possibilities and a comprehension of the means of making these actual.

And this working ever with the larger purpose strengthened his faith in this very purpose itself. He was ever an optimist. He believed man capable of better things, not meaner. He looked at man from the diviner side. He had a firm faith in God, and in religion as a means of uplifting humanity; and the same reliance on the divine Power which gave him the devoted impulse of the early days, that made his work living and his influence lasting, strengthened him in his latter days, and rendered his old age, already ideal in its conditions and surroundings, strong and beautiful in the power and freshness of its inspiration and its love.

Never in his last days did he speak to me of the life beyond; but that was ever, I believe, because his thoughts seemed to be remote from self and his condition. But, if ever a man lived in the expectation of it, it was Dr. Miles. The very serenity, peace, and happiness that marked his last illness were suggestive of a faith unspoken, a faith which no sickness nor sorrow could disturb, a faith that the God in whom he trusted so many years, and who had bestowed so many marks of his favor upon him, would be with him anywhere and everywhere. Nothing could separate him from the love of God. This was the firm conviction which his life revealed far better than words could possibly have done.

The same conviction followed him in his work. Some, perhaps, will best remember him by what he wrote,—by the "Gospel Narratives" or "The Grains of Gold," "Channing's Thoughts," "Traces of Picture-painting in the Bible," or "Modern Ideas of the Birth of Jesus." But those who look more deeply will see the direction of his work as well as its value, will see how in the "Grains of Gold" and "Channing's Thoughts" he was trying to bring to other minds and hearts some of the divine fire and love and truth that he found in the words of two great preachers. He wished all to share their inspiration. And this desire to bring the spiritual life to others became so deeply wrought into his nature that he compiled and edited the "Altar at Home," a series of simple services for the use of the family, that through these religious thoughts the atmosphere of the home might be sweetened and purified and robbed of all those material and selfish desires that tend to deprive it of its greatest charm, overturn its deepest foundations, and make its ties less binding and less strong.

And was not this same spirit in his other writings? He wished men to know more about the Bible and its deeper problems. He wished to bring Jesus nearer to the hearts of men, and he felt that the miraculous conception only rendered the Master remote. He wrote his book on "The Birth of Jesus" at a time when it took much more courage to proclaim such ideas than it does now. But, if I read the author aright, the love of God and his truth would not let him do otherwise. He wrote with learning and without fear, and the world for which he wrote was grateful for his courage and appreciative of his careful scholarship. This power of the Holy Spirit was manifest in all that he did. It stimulated his mental activity and desire for knowledge, and he was ever the student rather than the man of letters. But his faith and love never left him. They made him a learner for others, and gave purpose and direction to his reading. They acquired a deeper influence with each succeeding year, and made the thought of his latter years his ripest and his best. His power of intellectual application was remarkable. It is revealed in the ability, at a comparatively advanced age, to enter new fields of study and master them. That which younger men shrank from attempting, or could only acquire with difficulty, he seemed to do with ease, but ever with that one purpose that lightened all his labor and consecrated all his labor.

Even his conversation revealed the nobility of his spirit. It was rarely directed to petty subjects. His well-ordered and well-stored mind always aroused and compelled thought, even when it suggested no new truth to his fellow-creatures. But behind all that stimulus of thought was a stimulus of spirit. Men felt the presence of God in the sweet spiritual atmosphere of his life, and this feeling awakened a response among the deeper emotions of their natures.

This power of the spirit was evident also in all his sermons. Men felt in them the same discriminating care, the same logic of thought, the same learning, that marked all his work; but better than all these were the simplicity and directness which revealed the religious feeling, sanctifying the temple of God, already hallowed by so many associations, and filling it with inspiring and uplifting thoughts.

These same influences gave the chief value to his work with the American Unitarian Association. He was the first secretary of the Association, I am told, who possessed a vital enthusiasm for missionary enterprise. He was the first to appreciate deeply the need of bringing our life and thought to other churches, and to men and women of other denominations. But his aim was ever spiritual rather than denominational.

He was, then, as was the apostle of old, a man eminently endowed with the Holy Spirit. It gladdened, strengthened, and beautified his whole career; and there could be no day more fitting for his funeral services than Whitsunday,—a day celebrated in the Church for the coming of the Holy Spirit into the lives of the disciples, a day which henceforth should increase this spiritual power in our lives,—not alone from the memories of the Master's love, but from the thought of him we mourn this day.

He was, then, pre-eminently a man of the Spirit; but I know there is a feeling in all your hearts that he was something more. The world may view him so; but you do not, because you remember how much more he has been to you. You remember that yours was the blessed privilege of knowing him as preacher, pastor, friend. You remember his kindly face and his cordial welcome. Some of you remember the words which have comforted or strengthened you in your sorrows. You remember the encouragement he has given in moments of trial, and his ready rebuke when you were inclined to accept Heaven's favors too lightly and too carelessly. You remember him in your homes: you remember how he has touched your lives just as God seemed to have touched his. For he came, to the sick and those who were suffering, and his presence made them forget their pain and weakness in the higher thought he brought them. Wherever he came, he brought his blessing. His broad sympathies enabled him to enter into the interests of all who approached him. He loved the children, and the children loved him. He loved his people; and, when he ceased to be the active pastor and became the pastor emeritus, he still, even to the very last, retained his deep affection for all of this parish.

He comes, then, to your minds to-day, not only as a man of spiritual nature, but as one who has entered into the closest relations with your lives,—one whose friendship you prized, and knew better how to appreciate with each added year. You have all the blessed memories and happy associations of nearly a score of years with him whom you learned to love so deeply, and these memories and associations cannot at once be thrown aside in order that you may view him as the world views him.

God grant, indeed, that you never may forget these memories, or think lightly of all that binds him to you and makes your love for him so deep and tender. God grant that these ties may never be broken or relaxed, but that they may be strengthened in his calm hope and confidence of the life to come. Be sure these stronger ties are no illusions. That same spiritual nature that attracted you attracted also the stranger who saw him but for the first time. How often I remember in my divinity school days, when a fellow-student had preached in this church, others used to say to him on his return, "Did you meet Dr. Miles?" And there was always some pleasant word for the man who had given him perhaps his first encouragement. And this is but typical of the feeling for him everywhere; and, if this was stirred at first acquaintance, what must have been your privilege who could look into the very depths of that rare nature, gather courage from its strength, hope from its sympathy, and peace from its quiet and impressive benediction!

You knew the deeper sources of his life and action; and your great joy in him, I take it, has ever been that your first impressions were strengthened, not weakened, that you learned to love him more rather than less, and that each year revealed a greater depth of character and a deeper love for all that was high and holy.

Of course, we have not all entered into these deeper associations with Dr. Miles in the same degree. Our memories of him are all different, and our love of varying strength. Yet I feel sure they all lead us to the same high opinion. He was the friend of all the good. He belonged, as one well said to me, not to the parish alone, but to the town. He was always interested in all that advanced the welfare of Hingham. He was a true citizen as well as a true pastor; but in all his relations, private or public, the love of God dominated all his thought and life. This was the truth to which his greatest devotion was given. He was a true disciple of the Master; and his life and love can be summed up in no words more fitting than those which the writer of the book of Acts applied to the apostle Barnabas,—"He was a good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith; and much people was added unto the Lord."

UNITY CLUB BUREAU.

The National Bureau of Unity Clubs held its annual meeting in Channing Hall on Thursday, May 30. The reports of the secretary and treasurer were read, showing that the Bureau has been at work as in former years, and that it needs about $40 additional in order to meet its obligations for the year in full. Some changes were made in the officers, which may be mentioned. Rev. Thomas Van Ness was elected president; Rev. W. H. Savage, first vice-president; Miss Margaret B. Barnard and Rev. Florence Buck, corresponding secretaries; Rev. Benjamin A. Goodridge and Rev. Eugene R. Shippen, directors. All the other officers were re-elected, including Rev. George W. Cooke as secretary and agent.

Addresses were made by Rev. S. B. Stewart, Rev. Thomas Van Ness, and Rev. Frederic Hinckley. The directors were authorized to secure a representative of the Bureau in every State and conference, who will present its claims and help to secure closer co-operation between it and the local clubs. They were also authorized to invite any persons to meet with them at their monthly meetings who are willing to take an active part in making the work of the Bureau more efficient. Rev. C. R. Eliot suggested that the clubs and guilds might be brought into closer relations to each other, and one organization suffice for them both. A committee, consisting of Rev. C. R. Eliot, Miss Kate L. Brown, and Rev. L. B. Macdonald, was appointed to consider the advisability of uniting the Unity Club Bureau and the Guild Alliance. The following is the report of the secretary and agent:—

The National Bureau of Unity Clubs has never been able fully to accomplish what it set out to accomplish. When it was organized, the expectation was that all the clubs would gladly join themselves with it, and that a strong organization devoted to the promotion of the intellectual life in our churches would be built up. In fact, the clubs have always held off from the bureau, distrusted its efforts, and mostly refused to co-operate with it. It has not gained the strength which would have come from the union of the clubs and their concentration of effort upon common objects and methods. The Unity Clubs seem to have manifested the very quintessence of that individual spirit which is so prominent a factor in Unitarianism.

The Bureau has not been wholly without a mission, however; and it has accomplished a few results for which it was worth while to strive. When it was organized, the club idea and method were criticized on every hand. Such criticism is rarely, if at all, heard at the present time. The clubs have now obtained recognition. Their value is distinctly seen, and their work approved.

The Bureau has during the past year, as in former years, worked to bring the clubs nearer to each other, to make them mutually helpful, and to foster the interests for which they exist. It answers the questions of new clubs as to how to organize, it sends programmes to those which desire to know what other clubs are doing, it procures books for clubs at a distance, and it reports the club work in our periodicals. It is impossible to make this kind of work show largely in a report; but it requires time, patience, and drudgery to attend to its details. That it is of value is shown by the fact that the Bureau is frequently consulted on every kind of topic connected with club work, and from all parts of the country. It is quite safe to say that every club profits more or less fully by the work of the Bureau.

During the past season—that is, since September 1—I have been in Room 11, Unitarian Building, nearly every working day, from nine to five o'clock. That has enabled me to consult more promptly with the persons wishing my help, and to attend at once or with small delay to the correspondence of the Bureau. As a result, the work has been more efficient than in any preceding year.

An additional service rendered has been that of two union conferences held in Channing Hall. In co-operation with the guilds and temperance societies, these meetings have been well attended, and have proven of real help to club workers. Their success has been such as to warrant a continuance of them, and with an effort to make them more efficient and practical, they ought to serve an excellent purpose as a means of normal training in club methods.

It is worth noting, in this connection, that the Bureau took the initiative in bringing about this co-operation of the clubs, guilds, and societies. At first there was more or less of jealousy and friction between them; but now they work most harmoniously together, because it is seen that they are mutually helpful to each other.

This is one result of the establishment of the agency which is supported by and assists all these organizations. The conferences have helped forward their co-operation and cemented their union in a practical way.

It would seem to be a part of the duties of the secretary and agent to make suggestions as to the work which may be done in the future. The Bureau ought to make more effort to meet the needs of the clubs and to justify its own existence. The extreme individualism, self-reliance, and local character of nearly all these clubs make it very difficult for a central organization to secure their support and sympathy. It is quite certain, however, that the moment the clubs see that the Bureau will be of help to them they will rally to its support.

1. The first thing the Bureau should do is to find out the needs of the clubs. This can be done by correspondence, by direct communication with the secretary of every club. To promote this result, as well as to secure a better understanding on the part of the clubs of the work of the Bureau, a person should be found in every conference who will be a medium of communication between the two. For instance, if in the Maine Conference we had such a representative, he could find out the needs of the clubs and report them to the Bureau; he could ascertain what the clubs were doing, what their success, who their officers, and report them to the Bureau; he could speak for the Bureau at the conferences and on other occasions, and interest the clubs in connecting themselves with it. In this way every club might be induced to join the Bureau and to make a contribution to its treasury.

2. To carry out this more extended plan of work, it is necessary that the Bureau itself become more active in its methods. Hitherto the secretary has been obliged quite largely to work alone, with only occasional advice from the directors. If a more aggressive method is to be adopted, a monthly meeting of the officers and directors should be held for planning of work and for devising of methods to make the clubs more efficient instruments of culture and intellectual growth. It would, perhaps, be well to invite all club workers who chose to do so to attend these meetings, that they might become the means of making the clubs vitally helpful to each other.

3. The work of communicating with the clubs, and of making them helpful to each other, would be greatly facilitated by a club directory, which should give the list of officers, time and place of meeting, character of the work done by the club, its number of classes or sections, and the general nature of its programmes for the year. Probably such a directory should be published in connection with the National Guild Alliance and the Unitarian Temperance Society. Each of these organizations needs a similar directory, and the three could be published in one pamphlet to best advantage.

4. It is quite clear that the Bureau needs some way of communicating with the clubs. This can be done, without doubt, in the Christian Register and the Unitarian, and in a more effective way than hitherto; yet this method is not wholly satisfactory. Communications need to be sent directly to each club, as often as possible, in the way of suggestions of work, programmes, outlines of wholesome entertainments, or other helps the clubs are sure to use sooner or later. The expense is the great difficulty in the way here; but, in the end, it seems probable that the larger income will amply justify the larger outlay. How the clubs can be so reached is a problem for the officers and directors to solve at the proposed monthly conferences; but the importance of reaching them is great, if the Bureau would prosper or even continue to live.

5. I would call attention to the Summer School of Unity Club Methods held at Tower Hill, Wis., each summer. A similar school in New England would be of great service to the Bureau. It could be made a very efficient aid to our work in many ways. It certainly would not at first bring together a large number of persons; but, if held in an attractive and inexpensive location, it would prove a stimulating help to many a tired worker. I have for a long time felt that such a school might and ought to be in existence. I can see how it would prove a Godsend to the Unity Club interest in New England by giving it definiteness, character, and power.

These suggestions are put forward as the result of five years' experience. They are based on the conviction that the Unity Club is an important adjunct of our churches, that it is worthy of the effort to improve it, and that the results it has already accomplished are such as to warrant the expectation that it will become a permanent feature of the Unitarian movement.

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

The sixty-eighth anniversary of the Unitarian Sunday School Society was held at King's Chapel Thursday afternoon, May 30, at two o'clock, the president of the board of directors, Rev. Edward A. Horton, having charge of the exercises. There was a very large attendance, some listeners standing. The exercises were varied with singing of familiar hymns, rendered with great vigor. After the singing of the introductory hymn prayer was offered by Rev. A. W. Gould, secretary of the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society. The meeting, on the whole, was considered one of the best for many years. The following report we take from the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

In his opening address Mr. Horton paid an eloquent tribute to the work and efficiency of the woman Sunday-school teacher, the importance of whose work could not be overestimated. He said there could be no substitute in religious work for the Sunday-school, and to abandon it would be suicide. He appealed for funds for the carrying on the work of the society, if the Unitarian denomination was not to die.

Rev. P. R. Frothingham, who spoke of the "Sunday School and Citizenship," began by speaking of the appropriateness of the day to his subject. The problem of securing good citizenship is the problem of the day. The standard of citizenship is lower in our country than in that of any nation on the globe. Europe sneers at us. Earnest men, however, are endeavoring to raise the standard; and Unitarian Sunday-schools have an opportunity to help them. But how? There is no satisfactory textbook. Sunday-school teachers must furnish their own text-book, must supplement the teaching in our public schools. They need not busy themselves on details; but, first of all, they should inculcate a profound reverence for government as a conservator of good order and giving protection. The boys should always be taught that it is the first duty of the good citizen to take an active part in politics. A new meaning should be given to citizenship, and here the pagan idea is superior to the Christian. To serve the State was the Greek idea. It ought to be the American. Then love of native place should be inculcated as a basis for love of country. Still, again, hero-worship is not to be despised. Reverence for types of loyal and devoted citizens is a great factor in making good citizens, and in inculcating this reverence there is an opportunity for developing the imaginative and the sentimental.

Rev. B. R. Bulkeley of Chicago spoke of the sources of enthusiasm in Sunday-school work. There are sources of enthusiasm always in every work worth the doing, and any such work is beset with difficulties. The Sunday-school is worth while, has come to stay, and is surrounded with obstacles and difficulties. Sunday-school work is hard work, and enthusiasm springs out of hard work. There is no enthusiasm in doing things that are easy. The end of Sunday-school work, the formation and development of high character, must be recognized, so that the teacher must be able to say, "This one thing I do." The difficulties in the way are a challenge which must awaken enthusiasm. One source is the personal interest which a teacher must feel in his pupils, not only in school, but also out of it,—in the home, at play, everywhere. Another source, never to be lost sight of, is the value of the soul. This thought gives the teacher the highest uplift. Then the teacher must always have faith that the work in which he is engaged is God's work, not his; and this is the highest source of enthusiasm.

Miss Sarah L. Arnold of Minneapolis spoke of the teacher as an interpreter. Miss Arnold, who has been recently elected as a supervisor of Boston schools, said that the teacher as an interpreter is the important thing, whether in public school or Sunday-school. In nearly all facts there is a symbolism which must be made clear and plain, and the successful teacher is he or she who can make this plain. All great truths are simple, and must be made simple, so that the little children can understand them. No great truths affecting life are unintelligible to children when once wisely interpreted to them. Children are full of patience. It is in answering these questions that the great mysteries and infinite things of life are interpreted to the child mind.

Rev. S. M. Crothers of Cambridge, Mass., argued that the higher criticism is adapted to Sunday-school instruction. The difficulties to-day in teaching the Bible are twofold. One is the uncertainty as to the place the Bible is to hold. It will probably always be a text-book of religion, but it will not always be the sole text-book. The present time is a transitional one. The Bible is not all, but what else is not yet decided. Then, again, the Bible of to-day is a new book. It is a false notion that the Sunday-school is not the place for criticism; that is, in the truest and highest sense of this term. What are the books of the Bible, who wrote them, when were they written, what opportunities had the writer to know concerning that of which he wrote, etc.? These are the questions which intelligent children will ask, and which ought to be answered, if the truth is to be taught. It is doubtful, also, if the Bible can be made interesting unless these questions are answered. The higher criticism shows us in the Bible a natural development of religion, of the search of the soul after God. It shows a real history of real persons, and in this history interprets real life. As well try to teach the geography of America by the maps of the sixteenth century as to teach the real Bible without the higher criticism.

Rev. M. J. Savage discussed the question of Sunday-schools as connected with the Unitarian denominational future. He said that there were two methods of Unitarian growth,—first, by immigration; and, second, by the birth and training of its own sons and daughters. And this latter is something that must be emphasized. Unitarians should train their own children to be loyal to what they believe to be true. Truth is first, and Unitarians must stand for this thought and principle. The sons and daughters of Unitarians should be taught loyalty to truth. There are Unitarians who do not care themselves to train their children into allegiance to anything in particular.

Mr. Savage urged the necessity of a definite church organization to which the children should be taught to have allegiance, and there would come the great opportunity for Sunday-school training. There should be something for the children to join, and this is what Unitarianism lacks to-day.

No good deed, no genuine sacrifice, is ever wasted. If there be good in it God will use it for his own holy purposes, and whatever of ignorance or weakness or mistake was mingled with it will drop away, as the withered sepals drop away when the full flower has blown.—Frederic W. Farrar.

UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The Unitarian Temperance Society held its annual meeting in King's Chapel on Friday evening, May 31. The president, Rev. C. R. Eliot, spoke of the change in time and place of holding the annual meeting, and that it had been made because it was desirable to have the society incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts. The secretary then read his report of work done during the year. The principal items were that the society had become incorporated; that it had received a gift of $1,000, which has been invested as a permanent fund; that three new tracts have been published, and new editions of nearly all the old ones; that the work of the society has been presented at several of the local conferences; and that a goodly number of new memberships have been received. The list of officers elected at Saratoga last fall was re-nominated, and elected without any change.

The first speaker was Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer, who spoke of the social importance of the temperance cause and the value of the pledge as a means of developing temperance conviction and enthusiasm. She also laid emphasis on the importance of social co-operation in behalf of this reform, and of the need of building up total abstinence sentiment.

Rev. C. F. Dole said that he could not accept the dogmatic theory of temperance which made all drinking a sin. He presented the provisional view as the most helpful one, which holds that, on the whole, in this country the evil is so enormous in proportion to the good to be got out of drinking, we should, for sake of personal and social good, take the ground of total abstinence.

Rev. Arthur Little, D.D., of Dorchester said that all temperance people should work together, and not antagonize each other. The people need to be taught to exercise moral judgment, and to be educated for social co-operation. He thought that agitation and education were the two remedies which must be applied to overcome the evil of intemperance.

Mrs. Fanny B. Ames spoke of the charities of Boston, their good and evil side, of the great effort which has been made through many years to improve the condition of people, and of the growth of degradation and degeneracy. She pointed out the corrupting influence of alcohol, and that no one could afford to become a drinker. Total abstinence, she held, was the only true remedy,—the only Christian, philosophic, and practical remedy.

Rev. George L. Perin, D.D., of the Every-day Church thought that people were drawn into the drink habit because of its social side, its element of hospitality. Intemperance is bound up with other causes, among them that of labor and its hard conditions. People go to saloons because their tastes are coarse and animal. Better material and social conditions are needed as a remedy.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF ERASMUS.*

Those who find time and interest in these days of such abounding literature, covering the countless themes of scientific, social, and religious discussions, to read in volumes, magazines, and newspapers the ablest and most judicious contributions made to them in defence and advocacy of the old Church of the Middle Ages, cannot have failed to be impressed with the force and earnestness with which one single plea is set forth and urged. It is this: that the disintegration of Protestantism, with its consequences of confusion, distraction, and unbelief, sets the old Roman Church as an attraction before all serious and earnest persons as an ark of refuge, a religious home, where they can find peace and unity. Much might be said in dealing with this plea as to the reasons with which it is advanced, its plausibility and cogency, and the grounds of hopefulness that any large number of perplexed minds will yield to it. But, as we have read these often kind and earnest pleas, the question comes to us, How can the Roman Church, discredited, humbled, and dismembered as it is in these days, hope to recover a power and sway which it once had and could not keep, when its corruptions and enormities provoked the convulsion of the Reformation? This question retains all its force and pertinency, in view of the fact that the Roman Church, stoutly insisting upon its identity and unchangeable system of doctrine and discipline from age to age, declares that it has no apology to offer, no confession of error in teaching or policy to make, and that it would renew and enforce, if it had the power to do so, whatever it once did in its supreme sway for conscience and human life. As one pursues this train of thought, another searching question presents itself. Why did not the old Church avert its own disruption and humiliation by instituting and perfecting within itself, by its own reserved, sacred, and powerful energy and competent authority, by instituting a thorough and radical reformation of the wrongs and iniquities allowed and fostered in its own bosom?

One who asks this question can find no more helpful or instructive guide in dealing with it than in reading the pages of the volume now in our hands. Mr. Froude, though challenged and sharply criticised for some of his methods and qualities as an historian, has signal excellences and charms as an investigator and a narrator. The method he has chosen in this volume containing his professional lectures at Oxford is one admirably adapted to present his subjects almost autobiographically to us, with all the charms of his personality, his extraordinary career, his learning, versatility, and wit, and his marvellously extended relations to the great and most distinguished men of his day.

Laments abound in all our histories and plays over the lost treasures of literature,—precious writings which we know to have existed, but which have passed into hopeless oblivion. Warm, then, should be our gratitude for the escape from such a doom of some of the richest and most instructive writings of the mediæval times. Foremost among all these are the letters, even above the other works, from the pen of Erasmus. If he did not exceed in the number and spread of his letters any one of his peers in learning and correspondence, the love and admiration felt for him, and the inherent value and interest of his writings, have caused the preservation of them in marvellous volume. They have come to us by scores of hundreds, surviving all the risks of the widest dispersion into many hands and far-separated depositories. There were gleams and qualities in the man himself which prompted all who received a letter from him, even from his earliest years, to guard and cherish them. Indeed, he himself collected and published a volume of them. From the mass of these extant epistles, with all their wealth of learning, their confidential communicativeness, their homely details, their radiance of humor and jollity, and their more serious revelations of the inner man, Mr. Froude, with a few running details of comment, has given us a volume which combines many of the highest charms of literature. Evident it is that Mr. Froude, under some wise limitations, has an admiration and sympathy for his subject. Erasmus has been pilloried in common judgment as a moral coward, a time-server, self-seeker, lover of ease and luxury, fawning upon those high in station, and an obstructor of the mighty convulsion of the Reformation which he did more than any living man to prompt and to excite. More truth is there than in most curt judgments in the saying that "Erasmus laid the egg of the Reformation, and that Luther hatched it."

We write with a view of inducing as many of our readers as we can move to the purpose of indulging and richly instructing themselves by the perusal of this volume. So we will not spoil their enjoyment by offering them any sketch of its contents. They may well accept the help of Mr. Froude in making up a judgment of that marvellously endowed and wonderfully trained man, who has been pilloried, as we have said, as so gifted and mighty, yet for only weak and mischievous results. Every reader will at least be moved to ask himself one question, Why did not the mediæval church reform itself? Erasmus was the ablest and ought to have been the most earnest and effective of that class of men of whom we speak as "reformers before the Reformation,"—men who, though they lived and died in the communion of the Roman Church, deploring and resisting a breach of unity, under one headship, of the whole Christian discipleship, yet spared no stroke of exposure or rebuke, no protest of remonstrance, no appeal of true piety, nor a single teasing weapon from the armory of railleury, satire, and contempt, in denouncing the outrages and iniquities, the hideous vices, and unnamable enormities of a proud and depraved hierarchy,—and in the whole membership, up to the occupants of the chair of Saint Peter.

CONGREGATIONALISTS IN AMERICA. A Popular History of their Origin, Belief, Polity, Growth, and Work. By Rev. Albert E. Dunning, D.D. New York: J. A. Hill & Co.—On the extended title-page of this volume are given the names and the subjects of the contributions of several able writers who have aided the author on some special themes relating to the development and historical application of the principles of Congregationalism. The late Dr. Henry M. Dexter, by his laborious and well-nigh exhaustive researches on the revival of the Scripture and apostolical pattern of a church, after the Reformation had shaken and repudiated the old mediæval hierarchy, has wrought a work which will hardly need to be done again, and which, in most of its details, cannot be done better. Dr. Dexter's own enthusiastic love for and devotion to the principles of Congregationalism, and his continued loyalty to the Calvinistic beliefs with which, not necessarily, but incidentally, that form of church polity was identified in its revival, led him, as we think, into an assumption which seriously misled him. It was, as some of the readers of his noble volume regret to find him in some emphatic pages assert, and which all of them imply, that Congregationalism, which is simply a form of church polity, carries with it, as essential to its identity, a fixed and positive system of doctrine. We find traces of this fundamental error in the well-wrought volume of Dr. Dunning now in our hands. A very pleasing illustration of the agency and efficacy of benevolence and charity in softening and qualifying the heats and the animosities of doctrinal strifes is found in connection with the rupture which occurred when many of the original Congregational churches of Massachusetts were divided into the two classes of Trinitarian and Unitarian, a distinction wholly unknown in the apostolic fellowships. When that critical rupture took place, there were among the then very few charitable organizations of the State two in the service of kindly regard for the widows and orphans of its Congregational ministers. One of these was an unincorporated convention, whose funds came from an annual collection; the other, an incorporated charitable society, which at this day holds by bequests, mostly from the past, a sum of nearly $200,000. By a sort of tacit understanding the common interest which both the branches of the ruptured communion had in these charities was respected. So that representatives of both parties share impartially at this time in the administration and partition of these charities, no question being asked about doctrines. But the humor of the matter lies in this fact: the larger part of the considerable fund to which we have referred, starting from more than a hundred years ago, and before the rupture, was well known to have come from the gifts of that honored class of the laity and merchants of Boston familiarly spoken of as "the liberals." The good Dr. Peirce of Brookline, for many years, when announcing the names of those who were beneficiaries of the charity, gave forth in his stentorian voice the avowal: "Seven-tenths of the principal of this fund came from the liberals. Seven-tenths of the income goes to the orthodox." Dr. Dunning states with admirable force and weight the identity of the principles of revived Congregationalism with the simple methods of the apostolic churches. Here is the strength of the Congregational policy,—a strict and exclusive following of the Scripture pattern. When we leave that for traditions and the Fathers, we commit ourselves, as Milton well said, to a shaky bog. Dr. Dunning rehearses fairly the familiar story of the planting of the New England churches on the Scripture pattern. They departed from it in their synods, their councils, and covenants. Decline was imperfectly resisted by a "Great Awakening." The development of liberalized opinions and of individuality in doctrinal beliefs, was necessarily and vitally inherent in the Congregational system. All attempts at repression have failed, and the strength of Congregational principles is found to-day in those methods of it which alone are Scriptural.

PRINCE BISMARCK. By Charles Lowe, A.M., author of "Alexander III. of Russia," etc. Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.25.—Bismarck has drawn again the attention of the civilized world. He has never proved to be a man who could easily be shelved. The young emperor set him aside, but he could not wholly set aside his influence or the results of his life-work in securing German unity. Ten years ago Mr. Lowe wrote an historical biography of Bismarck in two volumes. Since this time much fresh material has come to life which he has incorporated in the present sketch. In no biography of Bismarck has his whole career as a political chess-player been described with such accurate knowledge of the board and moves. The volume is something more, therefore, than the personal history of Bismarck. It is an important contribution to the political history of Europe. Mr. Lowe calls Bismarck the greatest history-maker of modern times, and he shows us with great skill how step by step the fabric of German unity was built. This is not the record of a dry chronicler, but of a writer who combines the keen interest of the politician with the literary skill of the historian. Emerson might say of Mr. Lowe, as he said of Froude, that he makes history readable. If he brings out in all its proportions the figure of Bismarck, he shows us the exceeding smallness of "Napoleon the Little," otherwise described as a "gambler and land-grabber who is doing his best to fish in muddy and troubled waters." Just how Bismarck stimulated and prodded King William in the war, and how he moderated him when it was necessary to declare peace, is interesting reading. The dramatic and the melodramatic elements in the political situation are presented with theatrical skill, and one might almost think that Mr. Lowe had been a prompter on the stage or a manager with an eye for interesting situations. Though he does not restrain his feelings or smother his sympathies, he writes with an impartiality which might be said to be not passive, but vigorous; for he applies the lash to England and his countrymen very freely. His style is animated, graphic, vigorous.

LOTUS-TIME IN JAPAN. By Henry T. Finck. Illustrated. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—In this bird's-eye sketch of Japan we have another side-light thrown upon the people of the rising sun, who now are exciting the world's attention. On reading the title-page before opening the volume, we supposed that it was to be specially devoted to flower festivals; but, instead, it is rather a printed diary, in which are jotted down the incidents and thoughts of a rapid trip through the country. It is "a convenient bird's-eye view," in which we have traced some of the features in which Japanese civilization is superior to our own. Like many of the tourists and

Price $25.

This Chamber Set will be popular as long as comfort is popular. It will find ready purchasers just as long as men are willing to buy two dollars' worth of convenience with one dollar in money.

Think of your daily pleasure and satisfaction in the possession of such a suit as this, designed in the latest style of the present season, and outfitted with every newest improvement which modern ingenuity can devise.

No man should use furniture that is 25 years old unless he neglects all the other improvements in living of the last quarter century. If you use the telephone, electric light, express train, special mail delivery, and all the other modern conveniences of life, why not enjoy modern furniture?

It is a great mistake to think that furniture has stood still while everything else has gone ahead with leaps and bounds. The comfort and luxury in our latest Chamber Sets is as much ahead of what you are now enjoying as the fast express of to-day is ahead of the slow-going accommodation train of twenty years ago.

*LIFE AND LETTERS OF ERASMUS.—Lectures delivered at Oxford, 1893-94, by J. A. Froude, Regius Professor of Modern History. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

writers on this country, the author has been favorably impressed. He aims to point out "that the Japanese have as much to teach us as we have to teach them, and that what they can offer us is, on the whole, of a higher and nobler order than we can offer them." The book is thoroughly realistic, and gives us a surface picture of the country and its people. Doubtless the descriptions are more correct because the tourist had at his elbow a native travelling companion, whose knowledge was encyclopedic. This book is a readable and interesting sketch. It does not claim to be anything more.

POPULAR SCIENTIFIC LECTURES. By Ernst Mach, Professor of Physics in the University of Prague. Translated by Thomas J. McCormack. Chicago: The Open Court Publishing Company.—Dr. Mach is Professor of Physics in the University of Prague. In these lectures he has endeavored to show the substantial sameness of scientific and every-day thought. He has an original and popular gift for statement; and, if the lecture seems sometimes a little diluted, it is simply expansion or repetition seeking to produce a definite impression. The lectures were evidently given to women, and occasionally there is a condescension of tone and illustration which might lead to the impression that women were not capable of grasping these things in their full complexity. The translation is well made. The author, though he treats many difficult topics, presents them in a fresh and original way. There are added addresses of a more formal character on educational and scientific themes.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS OF SCIENTIFIC PROGRESS, AND OTHER ESSAYS. By William North Rice, Ph.D., LL.D. New York and Boston: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.—The four essays printed here together all bear on the great theme of evolution, and are particularly intended for those who desire to keep the old heritage of faith along with the new treasures of science. Three of these essays have been delivered as lectures before scientific associations. The writer is careful to assert that a reconciliation between Genesis and modern science is unnecessary, and that errors on subjects outside the sphere of morals and religion do not invalidate the claim of their inspiration. Dr. Rice is the professor of geology in Wesleyan University.

Miscellaneous.

Wordsworth and Burns are the two poets who appear in the recent numbers of the "Riverside Literature Series." The selections are well chosen and continue the valuable work of all the set, which includes now seventy-seven books.

The Magazines.

The Magazine of Poetry has been enlarged, and many new features introduced, chief of which is that it will no longer be devoted exclusively to poetry. The "Literary Review" of the opening number contains short personal sketches of prominent people, including Mrs. Cheney, Lucy Stone, Mrs. Catherwood, and others.

St. Nicholas has a Christmas look all the year round,—partly on account of its name, and partly for the bright cover with its scarlet medallions. The articles in the June number, however, fit the season, as some of the titles show, as "To the Robin that sings," "Nesting-time," "Camping," "When Vacation's Nearing," and so on. "Chris and the Wonderful Lamp," the popular story by Albert Stearns, comes to an end; and we are assured definitely that Aladdin's luck is worn out, and the lamp has lost its power henceforth. There is a generous number of stories, illustrations, and bits of talk, balanced by a few more serious articles.

The Commercial Traveller's Home Magazine for May contains an interesting and instructive article on "Gen. Armstrong and Hampton Institute," written by Alice M. Bacon. It is well supplied with over forty illustrations of the school and students, including a fine picture of Gen. Armstrong, which serves as frontispiece for the magazine. Miss Bacon describes Gen. Armstrong's life, showing how his complete indifference to his own comfort and fame allowed him to devote all his time to the Hampton work, and then picturing the cheerful, busy life of the school. There are several interesting articles and stories, both original and selected.

The North American Review for June contains an article on "The Power and Wealth of the United States," in which the writer, Michael G. Mulhall, draws the conclusion from statistical facts that this nation possesses by far the greatest productive power in the world, that this power has more than trebled since 1860, and that the intellectual progress of the people is cared for as in no country in Europe. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge uses the Nicaraguan incident to illustrate the scope and the limitations of the Monroe doctrine; J. J. Henniker Heaton calls vigorously for more freedom of communication by cable between Europe and America, which ought not to be dependent on the policy of private companies; Nordau's "Degeneration" is discussed in three articles; and there is much else of interest in this rich number.

The Forum for June leads off with an article on "The Growth of American Nationality," by Gen. Francis A. Walker, which starts one wondering afresh how this writer, historian, educator, economist, man of affairs, manages his time so as to accomplish such a marvellous amount of work in different directions. "Free Silver" is discussed by W. H. Harvey, author of "Coin's Financial School," and Hon. J. DeWitt Warner of the New York Reform Club. The popular interest in Dr. Nordau's "Degeneration" is echoed in all the magazines this month; and in the Forum it is represented by Dr. Charles L. Dana, in "Are We Degenerating?" in which he comes to the conclusion that, although the number of the invalid and the degenerate is slightly on the increase, there is nothing in that especially alarming; for, while it may increase still more, it is yet not beyond the bounds of future control. "A Rational Correlation of School Studies," by Dr. J. M. Rice, is another article of especial interest.

In the June number of the Popular Science Monthly Dr. Andrew D. White begins the final division of his papers on the "Warfare of Science." He has shown how theologians have been gradually forced to yield their domination in fields outside their own province, and is now about to trace the advance from error to rational views which comes from the new disposition of men to use their reasoning powers on all matter presented to them. Prof. G. T. W. Patrick treats of "The Psychology of Woman," and concludes, after examination of scientific facts, that anthropological studies indicate her closer connection with the life history of the race, her childlike, representative, and typical nature, and her at present arrested or retarded development. These results are only indicated, not proved. Space does not permit mention of all the important articles in this number, among which are Herbert Spencer's continued study of "Professional Institutions," "Survivals of Sun-worship" by Fanny D. Bergen, and others.

Literary Notes.

Prof. Edward Channing of Harvard has written for the "Cambridge Historical Series" a book entitled "The United States of America, 1765-1861," to be published by Macmillan & Co. in the autumn. The aim of the author has been to devote less attention to battles than is customary in works of this kind, and the space thus gained is used to elucidate the deeper causes underlying the great movements in our history.

The directors of the "Old South Studies" in Boston have added to the series of "Old South Leaflets" President Monroe's message of Dec. 2, 1823, in which the famous "Monroe doctrine" was stated. It is fortunate that at this time, when there are such frequent appeals, and often such ignorant appeals, to the Monroe doctrine, the original document is thus made available for everybody. Ignorance, at any rate, is unnecessary, when Monroe's message in its entirety may be had for five cents.

is a periodical of 44 pages published at Tacoma every other month from February to December. It is devoted to the advancement of the NEW IDEAL IN RELIGION; namely, the promotion of Free Spiritual and Universal Religion, frankly independent of Brahmanism, Buddhism, Parsism, Judaism, Christianity, and all other special historical religions which are by nature dogmatic, based on personal leadership and limited in fellowship. No other religious journal in the world is dedicated to this ideal. The FREE CHURCH RECORD is the organ of real Universal Religion; i.e., religion reconstructed on the basis of universal human nature, wholly unsectarian in principle and purely scientific in method, seeking truth in the spirit of love by obedience to the universal laws of thought and the universal facts of the Cosmos.

A Child of Nature.

By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, 50 Cents.
Special gift edition, full gilt, $1.00.

Philadelphia To-day.—One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful.

Minneapolis Journal.—Dr. Shutter has a keen zest for Nature, and a mind to receive lasting impressions from her manifold moods in sky, water, cloud, leaf, grass, and flowers. He makes some charming applications and analogies in this volume, which will be prized by all who love homilies in stones and running brooks.

Toronto Week.—The ideas are so simply and so strikingly expressed that it is a pleasure to read it from cover to cover. The author strikes us as having eyes to see.

THE VANISHED CITY.

BY ALICE GORDON.

There is a legend of a vanished city
Above which ever rolls the ocean wave,
And nevermore the voices of existence
Rise from the silence of its watery grave.

Save that a sound of church bells softly ringing Comes when the restless sea is calm and still;
And sunset rays, the hidden things revealing,
With treasures of the past the sea depths fill.

Of human hearts, though chilled by worldly scheming

And wandered far from simple faiths of old,
Still keep beneath the silent seas of memory
The vanished countries that their youth time hold.

Whence from their childhood's temples, long deserted,

In silent hours forgotten strains are heard;
And sometimes, in the sunset glory dreaming,
Fair visions thrill them as the sea is stirred.

Perhaps the sea-green waves give beauty to it
And soften into melody remembered sound,—
Fair country, ever safe beneath the billows,
Whose shores are girt with happy memories round.

THE DORMOUSE.

BY LUCY T. POOR.

Walter, or Watty, Dennett was a great boy for sleeping. His mother often used to say, "I never had any trouble about Watty's naps." Not that he slept all the time. In pleasant summer mornings he would wake up with the earliest birds, which is very early indeed, and be so lively when other people wanted to sleep that his mother would have been glad if he had been sleepier at that particular time. When he grew old enough, he would dress himself, go softly downstairs, put on his rubbers in the hall, open the front door, and go out to play on the dewy grass, taking care not to run far off if he had left the latch slipped. From all this it may be seen that Watty was an unusually careful boy, and indeed he was.

He never showed his best side to strangers, for with them he was shy and silent; but he had some solid qualities which were best appreciated by his mother and Julia, the children's nurse. He always could take care of himself from the time he could walk alone. And not only did he take care of himself, but, when he was in the nursery, there was no danger of Baby putting toys in her mouth, or crawling over the nursery fender, or doing any of the dangerous things which babies can do. Altogether, he was of much more use in taking care of the little ones and seeing to things in general than his older sister, Amy, who was apt to be lost in a book, and either gave the babies everything they wanted or was so strict with them that they grew naughty, and there was a general uproar in the nursery.

Watty also was an extremely punctual child. He learned to tell time when he was quite a baby, and ever afterward was always looking at the clock. It was a terrible trial to him if the other children delayed their dressing so as to make him late in setting off for Sunday-school; and he would often run on ahead, so as to be sure to be on time. As for day school, if he could not get to that in time, he made every one in the house uncomfortable. At both schools he was wide-awake enough, but, when his mother sometimes took him to church, he never disturbed the congregation, and, indeed, never was seen; for he slept during the services with his head on his mother's lap, so soundly that she did not think the attendance did him much good.

When he was seven years old and invited to a children's party, Watty was much disturbed because his mother would not let him set out in time to reach the Fosdick children's house at the exact moment at which the party was to begin, but wished her children to leave their own house at that time.

"Mamma," he said, "it says on the card 'from four to seven.' It begins at four, and we must be there at four." And he could not understand any of his mother's explanations that it was not good manners to be in too much of a hurry.

His mother had been doubtful about letting him go to the party at all, because the late afternoon was his particular time for sleeping. When he had been out playing, coasting, or skating,—for he was such a careful boy that his father let him have a pair of skates when he was very young,—he would come home and have his early supper at five; and, while he was eating it, he would grow sleepier and sleepier. So that, when it was over, he would curl himself up on the parlor sofa, ask Amy to cover him up just as mamma was covered up when she lay down, then in less than a minute his eyes would close, and he would be sound asleep. He slept so soundly and breathed so noiselessly that once, when Mrs. Fosdick came to make a late call and went to sit on the sofa, not observing that there was anything under the brown afghan, she actually sat upon Watty without waking him up, though she jumped up with quite a loud scream when she perceived she was sitting upon a small, rosy boy, who was not made of wax.

This habit of Watty's was a great disappointment to his mother, for she thought it was very important that children should see something of their fathers; and, when a busy father came home after being in the city all day, she thought his children should be at their brightest to meet him. She always had the older children nicely dressed and in the parlor, their supper being over, so that, when Mr. Dennett opened the front door with his latch-key, he would find Amy of nine years old in her blue frock, reading by the lamp like a grown-up person; and Ronald of five years old in his white woollen suit, looking at a book of pictures; and Walter, who ought to have been one of the group, tucked up asleep on the sofa. His father could do nothing for him but carry him upstairs at his and Ronald's bed-time, when he would be undressed and put to bed without rousing himself up or even moving. The only time Watty could see his father was at the breakfast-table, when papa, who slept late, was in such a hurry to be off, and the children in such a hurry to be helped, that there was no time for any nice, quiet talk; and Mr. Dennett declared that he hardly felt acquainted with Walter, though he was as fond and proud of his eldest son, Walter Dennett, Jr., as he was of any of his other children. Watty was himself ashamed of his sleepy ways, and would like to have seen more of his father, whom he admired so much, though he tried to defend himself by saying that some book said that "night was the proper time for sleep."

"Now, Watty," asked Mrs. Dennett, when the children were getting ready for Frank Fosdick's party, "do you think, if I let you go, you can keep awake? It isn't very polite to go to sleep in other people's houses."

Amy suggested that Watty should carry a large pin with which he could conveniently prick himself if he felt inclined to be drowsy. So his mother gave him a large black-headed one, which could not be easily lost; and Watty, in his usual neat manner, fastened it securely in the inside of his coat.

"I'd sit next to Willie Leslie, and prick him," said Ronald, "because he came on to our place and spoiled our coast yesterday."

"I shan't prick him," said Watty. "He's a wicked boy, but it would spoil the party. I don't want to spoil the party. If I see him coming home, I'll!"

But mamma interrupted the conversation by suggesting that it was of no use to talk of Willie Leslie. They couldn't help his conduct, and she didn't think sticking pins into him would improve him. From this it may be seen that Watty and Ronald, though brothers, were not at all alike, and that Watty was not above sometimes having a scuffle with other boys, though his idea of propriety was so great that he liked to have even his combats at proper times and seasons.

Mrs. Dennett never liked to have her children quarrel with others, but in this case they had good reason for feeling angry. They were so little that they were not allowed to go coasting in the street, and they had made themselves a nice little safe coast in their own yard. Some one had come inside the fence and spoiled their coast by throwing ashes on it, and they were sure that person was Willie Leslie. They were right: it was Willie, though he had not done the mischief because he had any special dislike to the Dennetts, but because he was one of those boys who can keep a whole neighborhood in terror by his general spirit of mischief.

The Dennett children, looking all nice and neat, set off for the party. Their mamma went with them, but could not stay, as Baby had a bad cold. After they had taken off their wraps upstairs, she went down with them to the Fosdick's parlor. They found, sure enough, that they were quite early; for no other child was there, except Frank, but their enemy, Willie, whose mother did not come with him at all, and who had been beforehand with them this time.

"How do you do, my dears?" said Mrs. Fosdick. "Frankie and I are delighted to see you; and here is your little friend, Willie Leslie."

Ronald, who was too little to conceal his feelings for the sake of propriety, would not look at Willie; but Watty followed his mother's example, and said, "How do you do?" to him as politely as if they had always been friends. And in this he showed his good breeding; for nobody, grown up or little, should bring his quarrels into a lady's parlor.

"And what do you think I have got for you?" continued Mrs. Fosdick. "I don't mean the supper that you are all to have or the little remembrances of the party that I want you to take home, but something for Watty particularly. Watty, I have a nice little bed all ready for you in my nursery. So, if you feel at all sleepy, you can go upstairs and lie down just as comfortably as if you were at home."

Poor Watty, who could not but see that Willie Leslie was smiling with secret scorn, colored with shame and confusion, though he did say, "Thank you." He inwardly resolved that he would not go to sleep that evening, at any rate, and gave himself a prick with his pin as a gentle reminder of his resolution. Mrs. Dennett whispered a little advice and a "good-by" to her children, and left them. Watty did not feel at all sleepy when, more children having come, they began to play lively games, such as "poison" and "crambo." There is something pleasant in simply being dressed in one's best and on one's best behavior in another person's house; and all three Dennett children enjoyed it highly, though no one would have supposed that Watty was especially enjoying himself, for he looked as if he thought a party a very serious affair, and went through the games as if he were terribly afraid of making some mistake.

The children all sat down to two long tables in the dining-room, and had a very nice supper; and this, too, they would have enjoyed if it had not been for Willie Leslie, who seemed in a particular teasing mood. When the children were all eating so busily that the room was quiet, he asked in a particularly loud voice from across the table,—

"Watty Dennett, aren't you going to sleep?"

"No," said Watty, indignantly.

"Yes, you are," said Willie: "I saw you nodding and shutting up your eyes just now."

"I wasn't," said Watty, loudly.

"Don't quarrel, boys," said Frank Fosdick's aunt, a young lady who was there to assist in helping the children. "We aren't going to have any quarrels at this party."

She spoke in a cheerful tone; but it made both boys silent, Willie laughing to himself, and Watty so flushed and indignant-looking that Miss Roswell naturally thought he was the boy most to blame.

When the children returned to the parlor after supper, they found all the lights put out, and that they had to grope their way to seats in the rows of chairs facing a white sheet. This pleased them very much, for they knew it betokened a magic lantern. Watty got a back seat, leaving the front rows to the little girls,—not altogether out of politeness, however, but because his natural instinct was to get behind other people. When he sat down, Willie Leslie, to his disgust, came and sat close beside him.

"Hullo, Watty!" he said. "I'm going to keep you awake."

"You aren't going to," said Watty, rising: "I'm going to sit by Amy and Ronald."

So he got up to join his sister, who, being older than himself, he felt would be some sort of a protection; but provoking Willie followed him, and pushed in a chair again close beside him. And, when Watty would have persuaded Amy to get up and make another move, Miss Roswell, who was marshalling the company, told them all to sit still, and not make more confusion by moving about. They were to see some pictures from "Mother Goose," and they must guess what they were.

This seemed a delightful amusement to the simple-minded little Dennetts; but Willie Leslie, besides being a tease, was one of those disagreeable children who try to show how grown up and fine they are by being hard to amuse. And he laughed somewhat scornfully when a very pretty view of Jack and Jill carrying their pail appeared on the sheet, and, when asked to guess what it was, made some of the children round him laugh by calling out that it was a hook and ladder company going to put out a fire. Then, as the scene shifted, he took occasion to say to Watty:—

"Now, Watty, you're going to sleep. I know you are. I hear you snoring."

Watty now began to think that he had borne about enough of Willie's persecutions. He was so provoked that he had never felt wider awake in his life. Moreover, he knew he had a weapon of defence which it would have been hard work not to use. So, when Willie was looking at the next scene of "Little Red Riding Hood," he softly took out his pin and stuck it through Willie's sleeve, till Willie suddenly jumped and gave a little scream, whereupon Watty quickly and silently withdrew the pin, and pretended to be looking at the magic lantern.

"You pricked me," said Willie, as angrily as if he were an entirely innocent person, and had done nothing to provoke Watty.

Watty made no answer, and looked straight before him. Willie then took his arm, and pinched it angrily. Watty, though he was hurt, did not cry out, but waited till the room was dark again to get his pin into proper position for action.

But Amy, though not naturally an observing child, now became aware that a suppressed combat was going on in her neighborhood, and whispered anxiously:—

"Watty, you must behave. You mustn't fight. You haven't got your pin out, have you?"

Watty saw that both Mrs. Fosdick and Miss Roswell were looking reprovingly at him. He only wished that he and Willie Leslie were out in his back yard, and not crowded together so close they could scarcely move, in a room full of people.

"You know," Amy continued to whisper, "mamma said we must be quiet and behave ourselves, if she couldn't stay with us."

Watty looked down with the somewhat sullen expression on his face which it wore when he was told what he ought to do. Amy thought in alarm that he was going to have one of his obstinate fits. She did not know that he was really ashamed of himself, and at that moment was dropping his precious black-headed pin on to the floor. He could not but see that Amy was right. It was no place for an actual scuffle; and he felt also that this was a time in which the better part of valor was discretion, and that he must retreat before his enemy. After kicking his heels against his chair for a moment, he rose, looking very bashful, and, to his sister's great relief, tried in the darkness to slip out of the row of children and out of the room. But at the door, a lion in the path, stood Mrs. Fosdick.

"Why, you dear little boy," she said. "You're sleepy, aren't you? Go up to the nursery, won't you? And my nurse will tuck you up so nicely."

Watty didn't thank her, but did as he was told. He went upstairs and in at the nursery door. The nurse was not there, so he got on to the bed by himself, and in a few minutes, wide awake as he had been, was as sound asleep as a dormouse, with a peaceful look on his face which seemed to show that he had found much better company in his sleep than he had had downstairs. And, though he had gone to sleep meaning to waylay Willie Leslie on the way home, he woke up, when Mrs. Fosdick, Amy, and the two nurses finally succeeded in rousing him, having forgotten almost all about him. And Willie seemed to have forgotten about Watty, for he ran off early in another direction.

The truth was that Mrs. Fosdick had been so disturbed by his impolite, disparaging comments on the children's entertainment that she had publicly and particularly requested him to keep quiet; and none of the older boys had stood by him, so he went home quite crestfallen for the time. I cannot honestly say that this mortification was enough to cure him of his mischief and malice. A little of Watty's convenient talent of sleeping and forgetting would have done him much more good.

"Watty," said his mother, when the children reached home, "you look so bright, I think you must have kept awake all the time."

"No, I didn't, mamma," said Watty. "I really didn't feel much sleepy; but I thought perhaps it would be best to take a nap just as usual."

EDUCATION UP TO DATE.

We teach the children Danish, Trigonometry, and Spanish; Fill their heads with old-time notions, And the secrets of the oceans, And the cuneiform inscriptions From the land of the Egyptians; Learn the date of every battle, Know the habits of the cattle, Know the date of every crowning, Read the poetry of Browning, Make them show a preference For each musty branch of science; Tell the acreage of Sweden And the serpent's wiles in Eden. And the other things we teach 'em Make a mountain so immense That we have no moment left To teach them common sense.

TEDDY'S LESSON.

"Come, Teddy," said Mrs. West. "It's time for the cows to come home."

But Teddy was reading a story about a shipwreck, and did not want to be disturbed just then.

"O mother! Wait a little while," he said.

A little later Hester came to the door.

"Teddy, you ought to get the cows," she said.

"Bother the cows!" replied Teddy, crossly; and his sister went away.

Soon a man's face appeared at the window.

"Edward, the cows!" said Mr. West; and, when his father spoke like that, Teddy lost no time in obeying.

Sulkily, he laid down his book and walked through the kitchen, where his mother and sister were cooking the supper and his father was piling up the kindling-wood for the morning's fire.

"I hate cows!" Teddy grumbled, as he walked slowly across the pine floor. "They're a bother, and I wish we didn't have any. I wish nobody had any. Cows are no good, anyway,—just in the way. I hate cows!"

An hour later the cows were safe in the barn for the night, and Teddy was in a better humor. He was hungry, too, after the walk to the meadow and back in the fresh, bracing air.

A fine round of meat was smoking on the table, but there was none on Teddy's plate.

"This is beef," said Mr. West. "I did not give you any, because you hate cows, Teddy." Teddy opened his mouth, and then closed it again without a word.

"I won't give you any butter, Teddy," said Mrs. West, "because we get our butter from the cows; and you hate them so." Hester poured out the milk for the other children, but to Teddy she gave a glass of water.

"Cows are such a bother," she said soberly. "I know you don't want any milk."

Teddy looked wistfully at the plate of creamy cheese, but it was passed to every one but him. But, worst of all, when the custards were brought in, sweet and brown in their little white cups, Teddy was passed by.

"Of course, you wouldn't eat custards, for they are made mostly of milk; and cows are no good," said Aunt Hetty.

Teddy looked as if he would cry. "I—I haven't had anything to eat," he blurted. "Just bread without any butter and potatoes and water. I wish I hadn't said those things about the cows."

Everybody smiled then, and no one objected when Hester slyly passed to him a cup of custard.—Ella Randall Pearce, in Youth's Companion.

LITTLE SALLY'S ANIMAL STORY.

"Do you know any stories?" was the first thing Jimmy said to his little cousin visitor.

"I do," said Sally, smiling. "What kind do you like best?"

"All the kinds," said Jimmy, promptly. "Do you know any about animals?"

"I do," said Sally. "I know a first-rate one about my own cat."

"Tell it now," said Jimmy.

"I will," said Sally. "I will begin it right now."

Jimmy came around in front where he could "see every word." "Begin!" said he.

"I am beginning," said Sally. "My cat is just as old as I am. We were kittens together. Mamma says she used to rock us in the cradle. One of the first things I remember, Jimmy, is my cat. She is a very big gray cat, with a ringed coon tail."

"Got a name?" asked Jimmy.

"She has,—Big Betsey. Big Betsey goes to the country in summer. Mamma wouldn't think of leaving her behind to look out for herself. And we think, Jimmy, that Big Betsey always knows on what day we shall start. We think, Jimmy, that she understands a great many words that we say."

"Last summer she had a very smart, handsome kitten, a great pet with us all; and we think Big Betsey understood us when we said we did not think the kitten could be taken, too. The morning we were to start, when mamma went upstairs, there in one of the trunks lay Big Betsey's kitten, and there Big Betsey stood packing her as nicely as possible, standing up on her back feet and tucking her in with her paws. Did you ever hear of such a thing, Jimmy?"

"No," said Jimmy, "I didn't. Did the kitten go?"

"She did," said Sally.

"In the trunk? Oh, I hope she did. Please, Cousin Sally, please say she did!" entreated Jimmy.

"She'd have smothered, Jimmy, all locked in where she couldn't get any fresh air to breathe. She and Big Betsey went in a basket, and had part of my seat. This is the end, Jimmy."

"It's a very nice animal story," said Jimmy.—Babyland.

THE WORD "CHICAGO."

Mr. Kirkland, in his book just published, "The Story of Chicago," comments on the much vexed question of Chicago's name, which he derives from the Indian term for a wild and hardy leek or onion that once grew luxuriantly between Chicago Avenue and Twenty-second Street. "Chickagou" is the original. "Che-cau-gou," in Hennepin's story of La Salle's expedition; "Chicagua," by a French historian; "Chikagu," by St. Cosme, a visitor in 1699; "She-caugo," meaning "playful waters"; "Choc-cago," meaning "destitute"; "Shegahg," meaning "skunk"; and "Gitchi-kago," meaning in the Illinois dialect a "thing great or strong,"—are some of its sources of derivation. Mr. Kirkland takes comfort of the word for the reason that all these variations have probably a single radical meaning. They "denote something 'strong,' whether like a giant or like a leek is not important." Chicago's friends will attach their own interpretation to this word, and what enemies may do is not material.—Chicago News.

TOPSY-TURVYDOM.

Cats without tails may not be new; but how would you like to see horses that stand in their stalls with their heads to the streets? What do you think of people who water their gardens from a little bucket with a wooden spoon, and who squeeze their own hands, and not yours, when you and they happen to meet? These are some of the things which the Japanese do, and which are described in "The Street of Human Habitations."

The little girls often bear the names of favorite objects in nature, "Cherry-blossom," "Snow," "Summer." Truth compels me to add that, as it is the custom to name them after the first object the mother casts her eyes on after the little one is born, they run equal risk of having a very inappropriate, not to say ugly, appellation. "Frying-pan" and "Dust-brush" are the names of two such pretty little maidens over the way. The Presbyterian.

THE FIRST SAW.

"What a funny thing!" said little Tom, taking up brother John's saw.

"It's only a saw, silly," said John.

"But who made it? who found out the funny thing?" persisted Tom, as the saw worked backward and forward, separating the hard wood which no knife could cut.

"Oh, all carpenters have it," said John, disdainfully.

Still little Tom watched and wondered. Then the big brother spoke.

"I know, little lad. I'll tell you. Long, long ago, a Greek sculptor, called Dædalus, divided a piece of wood with the toothed bone of a serpent; and it answered so well that he imitated the teeth in iron. This was the way the first saw was made."

"Is that true?" asked John.

"Quite true, I believe," said the big brother, in answer.

"Very funny," said little Tom.—Selected.

TROUT.

In Pike County, Pennsylvania, there are many trout-brooks. A gentleman who owns the land on either side of one of these brooks for some distance caught in his brook four beautiful baby trout in a net, and put them into a spring. This spring came up through the bottom of a rock that had been hollowed out. The sides were covered with beautiful green moss, and a fringe of moss fell over the top. It was beautiful. The trout showed their most beautiful colors in this lovely home, and grew very fast and very large. The owner would allow no one to feed them but himself. The moment he came to the spring, and the trout heard his voice, they would rise to the surface, expecting a grasshopper or some trout dainty. Others could go and call, but the trout never rose. In fact, they seemed to hide in the heavy moss or under the jagged rock at the bottom.—Exchange.

The yearly production of peanuts in this country is about 88,000,000 pounds, Virginia, Georgia, Tennessee, and North Carolina harvesting the most, in the order named. TO E. P. O.*

Roll gently, flying years, above this head!
Flow smoothly, circling moons; be slowly sped!
Ye days, so careless of your varying moods,
Here pause; and, blending as when twilight broods
Above a lingering sunset in the west,
Lend all your charms to lengthening hours of rest!
For here we greet one whom we would not lose,
For whom a path, softer than springtime strews
With violets before the feet of May,
We'd make,—a path to tempt her still to stay.
A sky for her we'd have like angel wings,
Or like the softened rays that moonlight flings
Upon a southern sea, where never cloud
Should come nor air be chill nor tempest loud.
A chaplet, such as this, a wreath of friends,
Should ever, with a love that never ends,
Be, for her brows, the bay! Her halo bright
Reflected radiance of her own pure light.
Not Milton Hill alone, with its fringed nest
Of foothills mothered on that iris breast
Where, morn and eve, the shades of love
Fall blue, as ruffle on the mated dove;
Nor can the valley where Neponset ends
Nor Dorchester's wide arms hold half the friends,
Whose lips to-day with quick responses stir,
And cry, "Faith, Hope, and Love we owe to her."
As God restores the light of summer suns
Long sped, in new-born power that freshly runs
From secret stores of life, so here revives
In her, to strengthen us, such insight wise,
Such eloquence of speech, such purpose strong,
Such nobleness of soul, such hate of wrong,
As Ellery's patriot speech unfurled,
And Channing's genius flashed upon the world.
Her "kindling thoughts" have set our hearts aflame,
While her sweet patience turns our haste to shame,
Only with her, a touch more chaste than theirs,
The holier breathing of a woman's prayers!

O God! our God! be patient thou above!
And let us keep this leader of our love.

LIBERAL CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.

A Conference of the Unitarian, Universalist, and Independent Churches of Michigan was held at Ann Arbor on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 28 and 29. Nearly thirty churches were represented. The conference began with an address of welcome on behalf of the Ann Arbor Society from Prof. W. H. Pettee of the university. The first paper was read by Rev. A. G. Jennings of Toledo, Ohio, on "A Religion to bridge the Gulf between the Rich and the Poor." The essayist thought such a gulf to exist, and to be serious in its import. He believed the Church had great responsibility in the matter. He discussed the remedies for poverty which are proposed by socialism, and pronounced them to be largely illusive, because they are merely external: they do not aim at improving internal conditions. But it is in such internal conditions as pride, selfishness, envy, jealousy, and ignorance that alienation between the rich and the poor has its roots. The greatest evil of poverty does not lie in its physical effects, but rather in its influence upon the minds of the poor in crushing their hope, their aspiration, and their self-respect. There is no need so great as that of a religion which will impart to the rich a sense of responsibility and a desire to use their wealth for noble ends, and to the poor a constant re-enforcement of hope and courage, and a feeling that a life may be in a very high degree successful, even if it does not accumulate much material wealth. These few words in no sense do justice to the strength, wisdom, and penetration of the paper. A vigorous, earnest, and very helpful discussion followed, led by Prof. F. M. Taylor of the Chair of Political Economy in the university.

On Tuesday afternoon there were two addresses upon "Woman's Work,"—(1) "In Universalist Churches," by Rev. Olivia J. Carpenter of Lansing; and (2) "In Unitarian Churches," by Mrs. Eliza R. Sunderland of Ann Arbor. These were followed by three addresses on "Young People's Organizations and Work,"—(1) "In Universalist Churches," by Rev. E. C. Andrus of Tecumseh; (2) "In Orthodox Churches," by E. E. Watson of Ann Arbor; and (3) "In Unitarian Churches," by Rev. Florence Buck of Cleveland.

In the evening there was a platform meeting. The general topic was "The Kind of Religion the World needs." The sub-topics and speakers were as follows: (1) "A Religion in Harmony with the Teachings of Jesus," by Mr. Giles B. Stebins of Detroit; (2) "A Religion in Harmony with Reason and with Growing Knowledge," by Rev. George W. Buckley of Sturgis; (3) "An Unsectarian Religion, to harmonize the Sects and Churches," by Rev. W. L. Gibbs of Concord; and (4) "A Religion that cannot be overturned or outgrown," by Rev. T. B. Forbush of Chicago.

Wednesday began with a well-attended and very inspiring devotional meeting, led by Rev. J. Merrifield of Manchester. Next came an hour devoted to five-minute speeches on "The Printed Page as a Missionary Agency." Rev. W. L. Swan of Marshall spoke of the great value of tracts in awakening inquiry and setting people thinking, and named what he regarded as the best four tracts setting forth the Universalist faith. Rev. Mr. Forbush urged the value of tracts as a Post-office Mission agency, and named what he regarded as the four best Unitarian tracts. The other subjects presented were "The Best Three Books popularly setting forth the Universalist Faith," "The Best Three Books popularly setting forth the Unitarian Faith," "The Best Sunday-school Lessons and the Best Adult Class Manuals on the Bible," "The Best Popular Books on the Bible," "Universalist Periodicals," and "Unitarian Periodicals." These speeches brought out many practical suggestions of value to missionary workers.

The paper that called out the warmest discussion of the conference was by Rev. Charles Legal of Lansing, on "The Future of the Liberal Churches." The essayist believed that the steady progress and final triumph of liberal Christian thought is certain. How largely this is to be reached through the agency of the churches organized distinctly as liberal, and how largely through the liberalizing of the orthodox churches, is a question the answer to which rests largely with the liberal churches. If the liberal churches prove themselves equal to the magnificent leadership that is offered them, a very great future is before them. The discussion was opened by a stirring speech from Rev. W. A. Taylor of Jackson, and was participated in by a considerable number of ministers and laymen.

In the afternoon a paper of rare poetical beauty was read by Rev. Reed Stuart, on "Why Religion prevails." This was followed by a very able and instructive address by Dr. V. C. Vaughan, dean of the medical department of the university, on "Sanitation and Public Health," and a scholarly paper by Prof. J. A. Craig of the Chair of Semitic Languages, on "Assyriology and the Bible."

The conference closed on Wednesday evening with a platform meeting. The general subject was "Salvation." Rev. Dr. C. E. Tucker of Bay City spoke on "The Salvation of the Individual"; Rev. George A. Sahlin of Benton Harbor, on "Probation after Death"; Rev. T. W. Illman of Grand Rapids, on the question, "Can anybody be saved unless All Men are saved?" and Rev. Lee S. McCollester of Detroit, on "The Salvation of Society."

At the close of the conference resolutions were passed giving expression to the feeling of all that the experiment of a convention bringing together representatives of all the liberal Christian churches of the State had been a great success; that the spirit manifest throughout all the sessions had been most harmonious and fraternal; that nobody could tell from any theological utterance of any speaker whether the speaker was Unitarian, Universalist, or Independent; that the conference had been an occasion of great mutual quickening; and that all would return home to work with more courage and heart in their respective churches and in connection with their respective denominations because of their two days of contact with this larger comradeship. A committee, consisting of Rev. Charles Legal of Lansing, Rev. W. L. Gibbs of Concord, Rev. A. G. Jennings of Toledo, and Rev. W. A. Taylor of Jackson, was appointed to arrange for a similar conference next year.

Nothing but Dirt

is taken away by Pearline. It won't make black white—it gives you a clean black, instead of a dirty black, that's all. Colors are restored and freshened by it, and look just as they did when new. They are cleaned, but they are never altered or changed.

Safety comes first in washing. The easiest and cheapest way to get things clean safely is to wash them with Pearline.

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers. Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

A SONNET.

'Tis true, one-half of woman's life is hope,
And one-half resignation. Between these lies
Anguish of broken dreams, doubt, dire surprise;
And then is born the strength with all to cope.
Unconsciously sublime, life's shadowed slope
She braves; the knowledge in her patient eyes
Of all that love bestows and love denies,
As writ in every woman's horoscope!
She lives, her heart-beats given to others' needs,
Her hands to lift for others on the way
The burdens which their weariness forsook.
She dies, an unrecognized doer of good deeds.
Remembered? Yes, as is for one brief day
The rose one leaves in some forgotten book.
—Mary Ashley Townsend.

MACEDONIAN ATROCITIES.

Before long there is likely to be a Macedonian as well as an Armenian question. Macedonia also has a subject Christian population, and the Mohammedans regard that population everywhere as lawful prey. A Daily Chronicle correspondent shows how Turkish lawlessness works out in Macedonia. It is the familiar story of brutality, brigandage, and shameful outrage. Foreign travellers are discountenanced, and people who serve them are thrown into prison or exiled. A long list of cases of outrage of women and girls, and beating or murder of husbands or fathers who sought to protect them, is given. To seek justice at the legal tribunals is worse than useless. The accused are not only not punished, but the accusers become marked men. We give a sample case. The mayor of Leskovitse, in the district of Istib, learned that some Turks were planning to abduct his daughter. He took counsel with the village priest and schoolmaster, and got the girl sent away by night. Two days later the priest was seized and beaten by three Turks, and publicly insulted. He complained at Istib, but the accused were not punished. While the powers are active, why do they not compel the Turk to redeem his pledges for good government in Macedonia?—Exchange.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY.

Commencement reports are so much alike, it is not easy to beguile the reader's eye on to the close; but, be assured, this twenty-sixth anniversary has unusual features. For the first time two young women were graduated from the college course. Except one in 1886, none have ever before persevered beyond the normal course. These two helped confirm the proverb, "Genius knows no sex"; for one took the first honor, and the other read so good an essay that ex-Gov. Bullock, a trustee of the school, put in the hands of President Bumstead a twenty-dollar bill to present to her, as he awarded the diplomas. Both these young women have been urged by Mr. Booker Washington to accept positions as teachers in Tuskegee Institute. Again, this year is eventful in that an alumnus had the honor of giving the commencement oration. It was spoken by Richard R. Wright, graduate of the first college class in 1876, and now president of the State Industrial School in Savannah. The oration was a scholarly production, stating his investigations in regard to the discovery of New Mexico and the Zuni Indians. Mr. Wright has had a long and large correspondence with Justin Winsor, Sir Henry Harris, and other noted historians in this and other countries; and he believes the above discovery belongs to a Negro.—Stephen Dorantes. The oration was received with a storm of applause from his spellbound audience of seven hundred, who had been sitting in the heat of a Georgia summer day for three long hours. Then followed the presentation of diplomas to six normal and four college Seniors. President Bumstead was most happy in his earnest words, comparing the days of "town and gown riots" in New Haven with these days of college settlements and municipal reform, and congratulating them that they could begin their life-work of beneficence at a time when the wealth as well as the learning of the land was being so freely spent in lifting the lowly and equalizing social opportunity. The event of the day, however, was the memorial service connected with unveiling the monument to Atlanta University's first president, Edmund Asa Ware. A boulder was brought from Mr. Ware's home in Massachusetts, and placed over his remains lying in the campus. Inserted in one face of the boulder was a bronze tablet, the entire expense of the monument being cheerfully borne by the two hundred and seventy-five graduates. The loving devotion of these students to their pioneer teachers is most touching and hopeful. The memorial address was made by another alumnus of the class of 1876, W. H. Crogman, now professor in Clark University, Atlanta. The address was so tender, so fitting, and so altogether beautiful, it made one feel there was no grandeur on earth compared with such a life, of which such glorious words could be truthfully spoken.

MARY LITTLE CHASE.

Spirit of the Press.

The Christian Work comments sensibly on the action of a New York Park Commissioner, saying:—
If Park Commissioner James A. Roosevelt is opening up more grass territory in Central Park to pedestrians, he is doing a good thing,—better, perhaps, than he is aware. It is only here in America that grass plots are preserved to be looked at: the feet must not press the velvet sward at all. It may not be generally known, but Lord Palmerston fought this battle for the people when it was attempted to make the frequenters of the public parks "keep off the grass." He showed that parks were for occupancy and pleasure, and not for sight-seeing. Parliament took his view, and ever since the grass plots of the London parks have been as free to the people as the air. The old Park Boards never could grasp this idea: we rejoice that one Park Commissioner, at least, is seeing these matters in Bacon's white light.

The National Christian Citizenship League, organized in Chicago in 1894, asks all ministers to preach on the subject of "Christian Citizenship" June 30, just preceding the Fourth of July.
The twenty-fifth annual convention of County Superintendents of the Poor of the State of New York meets at Ogdensburg June 18, 19, and 20. Mr. Homer Folks, Miss Arria S. Huntington, W. B. Tice, Mrs. C. R. Lowell, and others.
The Immigration Restriction League has published a little pamphlet, entitled "The Educational Test as a Means of Further Restricting Immigration," which shows the need of having such a test added to our laws at once. Immigration is likely to increase soon, and even now the numbers of immigrants of the most destitute and undesirable classes are becoming larger.

The Greenacre Conference of Evolutionists will be held at Eliot, Me., July 6 to July 13, under the direction of Dr. Lewis G. Janes, president of the Brooklyn Ethical Association. The conference affords opportunity for interchange of views among scientists with regard to the ethical, social, and religious problems of our time, and will emphasize and illustrate the constructive implications of the doctrine of evolution. Prof. Cope will give the opening address; and there will be papers by Herbert Spencer, John Fiske, Dr. Bixby, Dr. Janes, Prof. Morse, and Mr. Henry Wood.

Pleasantries.

A Dublin doctor lately sent in a bill to a lady which ran thus: "To curing your husband till he died."—Exchange.

Man (at front door): "I want to see the boss of the house." Houser: "Walk right up to the second story back, and tell the nurse to show you the baby."—Presbyterian Journal.

Watts: "Just look at that fellow on the bicycle, will you? What in the world is the use of him humping over so?" Potts: "He must be trying to put his shoulder to the wheel."—Parish Visitor.

A Good Thing for a Rainy Day.—Mrs. De Brush: "What a peculiar portière! What is it made of?" Attendant: "That is made of fine Japanese rice strung on strings,—only one dollar." Mr. De Brush: "Better buy that, Louise. When the exchequer gets low, we can make soup of the portière."

A puzzled mother made inquiry of a kindergarten recently: "What does my boy mean by singing all day long in a dirge-like way, 'See, 'tis so so that he sows his body and feet'?" The kindergarten thought earnestly, and at last recalled the song of the farmer, and explained that the boy must have misunderstood the words "sows his barley and wheat."—Kindergarten Magazine.

All travellers are amused by Japanese signboards. Miss Bickersteth, in "Japan as we Saw it," records a few which she noted in Tokyo. "Wine, beer and other medicines"; "A shop, the kind of umbrella, parasol or stick"; "The shop for the furniture of the several countries"; "Prices, no increase or diminish"; "All kinds of superior sundries kept here"; "Skin maker and seller" (portmanteau shop); "Ladies furnished in the upstairs"; "Washins and ironins carefully done."—Youth's Companion.

A little boy who is just learning to read gave a somewhat original rendering the other day to a verse in the Bible. In his eagerness to pronounce big words he reads too fast, and jumps at their meaning from a glance. So he read to the astonished household: "And the priests went before bearing the holly and vegetables and all the Congregationalist came after." Some holly had just been received by the family, which may explain why he turned "holly vessels" into "holly and vegetables."—The Congregationalist.

An excellent though unconscious criticism of the incoherent manner in which too many congregations perform their part of the "responsive reading" was made by a small boy on his return from his first attendance at church. "Mamma," he remarked, "the people don't like the minister, do they?" "Why, certainly, Harold: what made you ask such a question?" was the reply. "Well," said Harold, sturdily, "he'd read something, and then they'd all grumble, and then he'd read some more, and they'd all grumble again."—The American.

An anecdote from Mrs. Fields's "Shelf of Old Books" delightfully shows the character of Scott's mind and the charm of his conversation. An old man in Glasgow told Mr. James T. Fields that he had once carried a law case to Sir Walter Scott for adjustment. "How did he manage it?" asked Mr. Fields. "Oh, beautifully!" returned the old client. "He told me a bonny story about a coo and a calf in Dundee; and then he sent me over the way to a brither lawyer, who, he told me, had a larger head for sich affairs than himself. But it was a braw story that he told me about the cattle o' Dundee, and it makes me laugh to this day when I think on't!"

A USEFUL MINISTER.

Rev. Mr. Bedell, who used to preach Methodist doctrine in Calhoun County, Georgia, was what is called "a jack of all trades." While he was living at Newton, it is related of him that a young runaway couple, seeking to get married, came to the ferry at that place, and called for the ferryman, when Bedell responded to their call, and put them across the river. While doing so, the young man inquired for a blacksmith, as he wanted some repairs made on his buggy. Bedell replied,—

"I am a blacksmith, and will repair it."

The young man next inquired for a hotel to stop at. Bedell replied:—

"Come with me. I keep the hotel, and will entertain you."

The next inquiry was for the clerk of the Court of Ordinary, in order to procure a marriage license. Bedell answered:—

"I am the clerk, and can issue you a license."

He finally inquired for a minister to perform the marriage ceremony. The man of many occupations was again equal to the emergency, and informed the would-be bridegroom:—

"I am a minister, and will perform the ceremony for you."—Atlanta Journal.

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the Standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does. I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

Editorial.

A CASE has recently occurred in Western Massachusetts which shows that the orthodox Congregationalists still hold to their old principle of the need of an educated and trained ministry. Arrangements were made to ordain George W. Solley, who had been supplying the pulpit at Hampden for a year. The preparations were all made and the various parts were assigned, the congregation had gathered; and, as the council met, it was supposed, as a matter of course, that it would vote at once to proceed with the ordination. On the examination of the candidate he was found to be sound in his doctrinal belief and satisfactory in character, but that he lacked in theological training. For more than four hours the council wrestled with the question, while the waiting congregation wondered at the delay. As the candidate had not, in accordance with the established polity, appeared before an association of ministers to be "approved," and fell short of the required educational standards, it was resolved not to proceed, but that the candidate be asked to make further preparation, and to conform to the established Congregational policy. It is said that the candidate will comply with this recommendation. The design of this action was to emphasize the need of a more thorough training, and to protest against "short cuts to the ministry." Thus the council proved loyal to some of the best traditions of New England Congregationalism.

THE sudden death of Dr. Miner brought to a close a valuable and useful life. His public career was varied, and distinguished for its ability and fidelity to high principles. He was a man of strong and striking personality. Endowed with indomitable will, tireless energy, and unusual intellectual capacities, he naturally became a leader of men. The sphere of his activity was wide-spread. He was one of the foremost Universalists of his time, and, as president of Tufts College and in many other ways, served the interests of education. Every cause which seemed to him right and true—and they were many—he threw himself into with intensity of purpose. But he was most widely known as the champion of temperance, especially that of prohibition. He pleaded for this with all his might, both in season and out of season. A half-hearted faith he could never tolerate, and held to his own convictions with so great positiveness that he could not understand why others did not see as he did, and was therefore sometimes sharp and one-sided in his judgment of their motives. He struck hard blows, which often provoked the assailed to strike back; but in the sharpest contests even his bitterest opponent could not fail to recognize the sincerity of his convictions. A thorough Puritan in spirit, his courage never failed; and in the formation and expression of his opinions he was not influenced by fear or favor. No one was ever in doubt where he stood. A man with his strength of purpose and high aims, of course, has left a marked impress upon his times. Whatever may be said as to the correctness of his opinions or the wisdom of his methods, he was always straightforward in declaring them; and his supreme desire was to stand for high ideals in politics and religion. The death of such a man will be felt in the community; and only the most bitter partisan opponent can fail to recognize his power or to be grateful for what he has done to promote purer politics, public education, a higher moral standard, and the spread of a purer religion.

By invitation of Mr. Smiley a conference was recently called at Lake Mohonk to consider the subject of international arbitration. The following declaration of principles was adopted: "The feasibility of arbitration as a substitute for war is now demonstrated. In the last seventy-nine years at least eighty important controversies between civilized nations have been peacefully adjusted in this mode. Thirteen of these were controversies between the United States and Great Britain. Arbitration is now the American practice. To perpetuate peace, a formal act should make it henceforth the rule of national life. The present time is ripe for such a step. In 1887 an English delegation of thirteen men, all prominent in public life, brought to this country a memorial signed by two hundred and thirty-three members of the House of Commons, addressed to the President and Congress of the United States, expressing the wish that all future differences between the countries be settled by arbitration. In response to this memorial, our Congress in 1890 unanimously requested the President to open negotiations to this end with all countries with whom we have diplomatic relations. In the same month the republics of North, South, and Central America, by their representatives in the International American Conference, declared their adoption of arbitration as a principle of American international law in the settlement of controversies between these republics. And in October of the same year a treaty drafted by that conference was submitted by our State Department to the governments of all the civilized nations for their consideration and concurrence. In June, 1893, the British House of Commons unanimously expressed its approval of the movement. In taking the next step forward, the United States should lead. Our country is free from foreign entanglements, is strong and prosperous in the result of its peaceful policy; and the world knows that we are not moved to it by fear. It is for those nations whose peaceful position is strongest, and whose strength is most conspicuous, to take the initiative; and it is time for Great Britain and the United States to act. Expressing, as we believe, the judgment of the American people, we urge the government of the United States to negotiate a treaty of arbitration with Great Britain."

THE Dean of Canterbury, F. W. Farrar, in the June Contemporary Review, deals very vigorously with the pope's letter on "Unity." It is a strong tonic to those ritualists who are charmed with the dulcet tones of the Vatican, and, if heeded, will break the spell of fascination which the Mother Church has over them. While treating the pope in a kindly spirit, Dean Farrar is very clear and unequivocal in his position and arguments. He combats the assertions, not to say assumptions, of Leo XIII. with the force of truth and facts. He draws a sharp distinction between the ideas of a church as held by the Papist and the Protestant. Speaking from the standpoint of an Anglican, he says, "Our conception of a church differs fundamentally from that of modern Ultramontanes." "The Church," he adds, "meant to the apostles all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth. To modern Romanists it means only those who belong to a body of less than one-third of living Christians." The reply made to the pope regarding the assumption that the unity of the Church under himself and his successors is "divinely constituted" applies with equal force to the Anglican High Churchmen, together with his assertion that the assumption "is without a syllable of demonstration." Space will not permit a full outline of this reply to the pope. It will have a wholesome effect on Anglicans of every stripe. "If we accept the pope's amiable invitation, what pledge will he give us that none of his infallible successors will not act like so many of his infallible predecessors? . . . If not, how can he expect us to intrust ourselves to such tender mercies of infallible priests?" The article closes with this quotation from Bishop Thirlwall: "Great as is the evil of division, let us be sure that it is incomparably less than that of such spurious, hollow, artificial unity as is held out by the see of Rome,—unity purchased by the subjection of reason and conscience to the arbitrary decrees of self-styled infallible human authority."

THE London Inquirer also prints several "Projected Addresses" from the Unitarians to the pope. The first of these informs him that he has been deceived as to the desire on the part of the English people to seek unity on the basis he proposes: "Your appeal was sent to us at Easter-tide,—a sign, we would believe, of the rising again of the spirit of Christ in the hearts of men, and especially in your own. We reply at the feast of Pentecost, being animated by a belief in the ever-coming, ever-conquering Life of God in the life of men. It is to the unity of brethren, sympathetic in practical aims, however different in theological conceptions, that we pray that Life to lead us, when the wiser among us shall teach the simple concerning the deep things of the spirit, and the love of Christ shall be the holy fire wherein all our pride and self-seeking—faults sadly prevalent among churches and sects—shall be consumed." One writer gives a sketch of the history and principles of the Unitarians, and calls the attention of his holiness to the fact that as Protestants of Protestants they could not accept the unity he proposes without being false to their essential principles and larger faith. Again, another, knowing that the pope is somewhat of a poet, thus falls into verse:—

"How soft this Lion's wooing is! How faint,
How far the echo of that ominous roar
That thundered doom upon our land of yore!
With murmuring meekness now and fond complaint,
On Tiber's bank enthroned, the weary saint
Spreads forth his hands to this inviolate shore,
Beseeching England's race to bow once more,
This race of Protestants, to Rome's restraint.
Old Lion, take thy rest! Thou mayst as well
Attempt the last of all impossible things,—
Bid the broad oak in acorn cup to dwell,
Roll back the river to its mountain springs,
Or seek to compass in the empty shell
The happy bird that skyward soars and sings."

LITERATURE FOR CHILDREN.

A most important object of school training is to give the child a desire to go on in the same lines after he has left the school. The college graduate who closes his books when he has obtained his degree may in ten years be intellectually less alive than one with far less information stored in his brain, who yet lets slip no opportunity to refresh himself with a new idea and reach out after a new truth. This object can be attained better perhaps by the study of literature than in any other way; and, if children gain nothing else from school life, they should at least know something of good books, and have certain standards of literary excellence in their minds.

Yet, of all our studies, that of literature has been often most neglected. Twenty-four years ago the master of a suburban school planned a brief course of English literature for his older pupils. In the way he conducted it, it was then almost an innovation, and little time was allowed for it; but it remains to-day, after nearly a quarter of a century, the most lasting of all school influences in the minds of many pupils. One may forget how to solve a problem or how to state the laws of Kepler, but he never forgets the hours spent in discussing the plays of Shakspere or the lasting delight that dawned with his first intelligent introduction to Palgrave's "Golden Treasury."
